Mr. COPELAND. Oh, no; it exactly carries out that view. It provides for the use of State organizations, and the Federal Government simply coordinates by securing certain service from State organizations.

Mr. KING. My objection was based upon my understanding that the bill was not in harmony with views of the Secretary of Labor. If she has approved of this bill, of course that alters the situation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On the contrary, she was the first and most ardent advocate to appear before the committee on behalf of the bill.

Mr. WAGNER. Exactly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I say to the Senator from Utah, if the Senator from New York will permit me, that not only in conjunction with the present situation so far as unemployment is concerned, but particularly in connection with any program for its stimulation, this measure is of vital importance in order that the necessary information and service may be rendered to those seeking opportunities for work in connection with any reemployment program. I sincerely hope, therefore, that the Senator from Utah will not insist upon his objection.

Mr. KING. I stated that my opposition was based upon the assumption that the measure was not in harmony with the views of the Secretary of Labor; but if she has put her O.K. upon it, I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with amendments, on page 4, line 4, after the word "act", to insert "If the legislature of any State has not made provision for accepting the provisions of this act, the Governor of such State may, insofar as he is authorized to do so by the laws of such State, accept the provisions of this act and designate or create a State agency to cooperate with the United States Employment Service until 6 months after the adjournment of the first regular session of the legislature in such State following the passage of this act"; on page 4, line 15, after the word "appropriated", to insert "(1)"; in line 16, after "1934", to strike out "and" and insert "(2)"; in line 18, after "1938", to insert "(3) and thereafter such sums annually as the Congress may deem necessary"; and on page 6, line 23, after the word "legislature", to insert "or its Governor, as the case may be", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) in order to promote the establishment and maintenance of a national system of public employment offices, there is hereby created in the Department of Labor a bureau to be known as "the United States Employment Service", at the head of which shall be a director. The director shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary at the rate of $8,500 per annum.

(b) Upon the expiration of 3 months after the enactment of this act the employment service now existing in the Department of Labor shall be abolished; and all records, files, and property (including office equipment) of the existing employment service shall thereupon be transferred to the United States Employment Service; and all the officers and employees of such service shall thereupon be transferred to the United States Employment Service created by this act without change in classification or compensation, but the term of office of any person transferred by this section to the United States Employment Service, and who was not appointed subject to the provisions of the Civil Service laws, shall expire upon the expiration of 6 months from the date of enactment of this act.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of Labor is authorized, in accordance with the Civil Service laws, to appoint and, in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to fix the compensation of one or more assistant directors and such other officers, employees, and assistants, and to make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of Government and elsewhere, and for law books, books of reference, and periodicals) as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. (a) It shall be the province and duty of the bureau to promote and develop a national system of employment offices for men, women, and juniors who are legally qualified to engage in gainful occupations, to maintain a farm placement service, to maintain a public employment service for the District of Columbia, to cooperate with the Veterans' Administration in securing employment for veterans and, in the manner hereinafter provided, to assist in establishing and maintaining systems of public employment offices in the several States and the political subdivisions thereof. The bureau shall also assist in coordinating the public employment offices throughout the country and in increasing their usefulness by developing and prescribing minimum standards of efficiency, assisting them in meeting problems peculiar to their localities, promoting uniformity in their administrative and statistical procedure, furnishing and publishing information as to opportunities for employment and other information of value in the operation of the system, and maintaining a system for clearing labor between the several States.

(b) Whenever in this act the word "State" or "States" is used it shall be understood to include the Territory of Hawaii.

SEC. 4. In order to obtain the benefits of appropriations apportioned under section 5, a State shall, through its legislature, accept the provisions of this act and designate or authorize the creation of a State agency vested with all powers necessary to cooperate with the United States Employment Service under this act. If the legislature of any State has not made provision for accepting the provisions of this act, the Governor of such State may, insofar as he is authorized to do so by the laws of such State, accept the provisions of this act and designate or create a State agency to cooperate with the United States Employment Service until 6 months after the adjournment of the first regular session of the legislature in such State following the passage of this act.

SEC. 5. (a) For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby authorized to be appropriated (1) the sum of $1,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, (2) $4,000,000 for each fiscal year thereafter up to and including the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, (3) and thereafter such sums annually as the Congress may deem necessary. Seventy-five percent of the amounts appropriated under this act shall be apportioned by the director among the several States in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the States of the United States according to the next preceding United States census, to be available for the purpose of establishing and maintaining systems of public employment offices in the several States and the political subdivisions thereof in accordance with the provisions of this act. No payment shall be made in any year out of the amount of such appropriations apportioned to any State until an equal sum has been appropriated or otherwise made available for that year by the State, or by any agency thereof, including appropriations made by local subdivisions, for the purpose of maintaining public employment offices as a part of a State-controlled system of public employment offices; except that the amounts so appropriated by the State shall not be less than 25 percent of the apportionment according to population made by the director for such State for the current year, and in no event less than $5,000. The balance of the amounts appropriated under this act shall be available for all the purposes of this act other than for apportionment among the several States as herein provided.

(b) The amounts apportioned to any State for any fiscal year shall be available for payment to and expenditure by such State, for the purposes of this act, until the close of the next succeeding fiscal year; except that amounts apportioned to any State for any fiscal year preceding the fiscal year during which is commenced the first regular session of the legislature of such State held after the enactment of this act shall remain available for payment to and expenditure by such State until the close of the fiscal year next succeeding that in which such session is commenced. Subject to the foregoing limitations, any amount so apportioned unexpended at the end of the period during which it is available for expenditure under this act shall, within 60 days thereafter, be reapportioned for the current fiscal year among all the States in the same manner and on the same basis, and certified to the Secretary of the Treasury and treasurers of the States in the same manner, as if it were being apportioned under this act for the first time.

SEC. 6. Within 60 days after any appropriation has been made under authority of this act the director shall make the apportionment thereof as provided in section 5 and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the treasurers of the several States the amount apportioned to each State for the fiscal year for which the appropriation has been made.

SEC. 7. Within 60 days after any appropriation has been made under the authority of this act, and as often thereafter while such appropriation remains available as he deems advisable, the director shall ascertain as to each of the several States (1) whether the State has, through its legislature or its Governor, as the case may be, accepted the provisions of this act and designated or authorized the creation of an agency to cooperate with the United States Employment Service in the administration of this act in compliance with the provisions of section 4 of this act; and (2) the amounts, if any, which have been appropriated or otherwise made available by such State and by any agency thereof, including appropriations made by local subdivisions, in compliance with the provisions of section 5 of this act. If the director finds that a State has complied with the requirements of such sections, and if plans have been submitted and approved in compliance with the provisions of section 8 of this act, the director shall determine the amount of the payments, if any, to which the State is entitled under the provisions of section 5, and certify such amount to the Secretary of the Treasury. Such certificate shall be sufficient authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to make payments to the State in accordance therewith.

SEC. 8. Any State desiring to receive the benefits of this act shall, by the agency designated to cooperate with the United States Employment Service, submit to the director detailed plans for carrying out the provisions of this act within such State. In those States where a State board, department, or agency exists which is charged with the administration of State laws for vocational rehabilitation of physically handicapped persons, such plans shall include provision for cooperation between such board, department, or agency and the agency designated to cooperate with the United States Employment Service under this act. If such plans are in conformity with the provisions of this act and reasonably appropriate and adequate to carry out its purposes, they shall be approved by the director and due notice of such approval shall be given to the State agency.

SEC. 9. Each State agency cooperating with the United States Employment Service under this act shall make such reports concerning its operations and expenditures as shall be prescribed by the director. It shall be the duty of the director to ascertain whether the system of public employment offices maintained in each State is conducted in accordance with the rules and regulations and the standards of efficiency prescribed by the director in accordance with the provisions of this act. The director may revoke any existing certificates or withhold any further certificate provided for in section 7, whenever he shall determine, as to any State that the cooperating State agency has not properly expended the moneys paid to it or the moneys herein required to be appropriated by such State in accordance with plans approved under this act. Before any such certificate shall be revoked or withheld from any State, the Director shall give notice in writing to the State agency stating specifically wherein the State has failed to comply with such plans. The State agency may appeal to the Secretary of Labor from the action of the director in any such case, and the Secretary of Labor may either affirm or reverse the action of the director with such directions as he shall consider proper.

SEC. 10 (a) The director shall establish a Federal Advisory Council composed of men and women representing employers and employees in equal numbers and the public for the purpose of formulating policies and discussing problems relating to employment and insuring impartiality, neutrality, and freedom from political influence in the solution of such problems. Members of such council shall be selected from time to time in such manner as the director shall prescribe and shall serve without compensation, but when attending meetings of the council they shall be allowed necessary traveling and subsistence expenses, or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law for civilian employees in the executive branch of the Government. The council shall have access to all files and records of the United States Employment Service. The director shall also require the organization of similar State advisory councils composed of men and women representing employers and employees in equal numbers and the public.

(b) In carrying out the provisions of this act the director is authorized and directed to provide for the giving of notice of strikes or lockouts to applicants before they are referred to employment.

SEC. 11. The director, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 12. The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to extend to the United States Employment Service and to the system of employment offices operated by it in conformity with the provisions of this act, and to all State employment systems which receive funds appropriated under authority of this act, the privilege of free transmission of official mail matter.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER BRIDGE, OGDENSBURG, N.Y.

The bill (S. 1577) creating the St. Lawrence Bridge Commission and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Ogdensburg, N.Y., was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that Order of Business 87, House bill 5329, be substituted for this bill. It is an identical bill which has passed the House, but I wish to offer an amendment to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 5329) creating the St. Lawrence Bridge Commission and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Ogdensburg, N.Y., which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to facilitate international commerce, the St. Lawrence Bridge Commission (hereinafter created, and hereinafter referred to as the "Commission") and its successors and assigns, be, and are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the St. Lawrence River at or near the city of Ogdensburg, N.Y., at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters", approved March 23, 1906, subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act, and subject to the approval of the proper authorities in the Dominion of Canada. For like purposes said Commission and its successors and assigns are hereby authorized to purchase, maintain, and operate all or any ferries across the St. Lawrence River within 5 miles of the location which shall be selected for said bridge, subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act, and subject to the approval of the proper authorities in the Dominion of Canada.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the Commission and its successors and assigns all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use such real estate and other property in the State of New York as may be needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State of New York, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation of private property for public purposes in such State; and the Commission and its successors and assigns may exercise in the Dominion of Canada all rights, powers, and authority which shall be granted or permitted to the Commission by the proper authorities of the Dominion of Canada or of the Province of Ontario, including the entering upon lands and acquiring, condemning, occupying, possessing, and using such real estate and other property in the Dominion of Canada as may be needed for such location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge.

SEC. 3. The Commission and its successors and assigns are hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge and such ferry or ferries in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. 4. The Commission and its successors and assigns are hereby authorized to provide for the payment of the cost of the bridge and its approaches and the ferry or ferries and the necessary lands, easements, and appurtenances thereto by an issue or issues of negotiable bonds of the Commission, bearing interest at not more than 6 percent per annum, the principal and interest of which bonds and any premium to be paid for retirement thereof before maturity shall be payable solely from the sinking fund provided in accordance with this act. Such bonds may be registerable as to principal alone or both principal and interest, shall be in such form not inconsistent with this act, shall mature at such time or times not exceeding 30 years from their respective dates, shall be in such denominations, shall be executed in such manner and be payable in such medium and at such place or places as the Commission may determine. The Commission may repurchase and may reserve the right to redeem all or any of said bonds before maturity in such manner and at such price or prices, not exceeding 105 and accrued interest, as may be fixed by the Commission prior to the issuance of the bonds. The Commission may enter into an agreement with any bank or trust company in the United States as trustee having the power to make such agreement, setting forth the duties of the Commission in respect of the construction, maintenance, operation, repair, and insurance of the bridge and/or the ferry or ferries, the conservation and application of all funds, the safeguarding of moneys on hand or on deposit, and the rights and remedies of said trustee and the holders of the bonds, restricting the individual right of action of the bondholders as is customary in trust agreements respecting bonds of corporations. Such trust agreements may contain such provisions for protecting and enforcing the rights and remedies of the trustee and the bondholders as may be reasonable and proper and not inconsistent with the law and also provisions for approval by the original purchasers of the bonds of the employment of consulting engineers and of the security given by the bridge contractors and by any bank or trust company in which the proceeds of bonds or of bridge or ferry tolls or other moneys of the Commission shall be deposited, and may provide that no contract for construction shall be made without the approval of the consulting engineers. The bridge constructed under the authority of this act shall be deemed to be an instrumentality for international commerce authorized by the Government of the United States, and said bridge and ferry or ferries and the bonds issued in connection therewith and the income derived therefrom shall be exempt from all Federal, State, municipal, and local taxation. Said bonds shall be sold in such manner and at such time or times and at such price as the Commission may determine, but no such sale shall be made at a price so low as to require the payment of more than 6 percent interest on the money received therefor, computed with relation to the absolute maturity of the bonds in accordance with standard tables of bond values, and the face amount thereof shall be so calculated as to produce, at the price of their sale, the cost of the bridge and its approaches, and the land, easements, and appurtenances used in connection therewith and, in the event the ferry or ferries are to be acquired, also the cost of such ferry or ferries and the lands, easements, and appurtenances used in connection therewith. The cost of the bridge and ferry or ferries shall be deemed to include interest during construction of the bridge, and for 12 months thereafter, and all engineering, legal, architectural, traffic surveying, and other expenses incident to the construction of the bridge or the acquisition of the ferry or ferries, and the acquisition of the necessary property, and incident to the financing thereof, including the cost of acquiring existing franchises, rights, plans, and works of and relating to the bridge, now owned by any person, firm, or corporation, and the cost of purchasing all or any part of the shares of stock of any such corporate owner, if, in the judgment of the Commission, such purchases should be found expedient. If the proceeds of the bonds issued shall exceed the cost as finally determined, the excess shall be placed in the sinking fund hereinafter provided. Prior to the preparation of definitive bonds the Commission may, under like restrictions, issue temporary bonds or interim certificates with or without coupons of any denomination whatsoever, exchangeable for definitive bonds when such bonds have been executed and are available for delivery.

SEC. 5. In fixing the rates of toll to be charged for the use of such bridge the same shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of depreciating, maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to pay the principal and interest of such bonds as the same shall fall due and the redemption or repurchase price of all or any thereof redeemed or repurchased before maturity as herein provided. All tolls and other revenues from said bridge are hereby pledged to such uses and to the application thereof hereinafter in this section required. After payment or provision for payment therefrom of all such cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating and the reservation of an amount of money estimated to be sufficient for the same purpose during an ensuing period of not more than 6 months, the remainder of tolls collected shall be placed in the sinking fund, at intervals to be determined by the Commission prior to the issuance of the bonds. An accurate record of the cost of the bridge and its approaches, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected, shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested. The Commission shall classify in a reasonable way all traffic over the bridge, so that the tolls shall be so fixed and adjusted by it as to be uniform in the application thereof to all traffic falling within any such reasonable class, regardless of the status or character of any person, firm, or corporation participating in such traffic, and shall prevent all use of such bridge for traffic except upon payment of the tolls so fixed and adjusted. No toll shall be charged officials or employees of the Commission or of the Governments of the United States or Canada while in the discharge of their duties.

SEC. 6. Nothing herein contained shall require the Commission or its successors to maintain or operate any ferry or ferries purchased hereunder, but in the discretion of the Commission or its successors any ferry or ferries so purchased, with the appurtenances and property thereto connected and belonging, may be sold or otherwise disposed of or may be abandoned and/or dismantled whenever in the judgment of the Commission or its successors it may seem expedient so to do. The Commission and its successors may fix such rates of toll for the use of such ferry or ferries as it may deem proper, subject to the same conditions as are hereinabove required as to tolls for traffic over the bridge. All tolls collected for the use of the ferry or ferries and the proceeds of any sale or disposition of any ferry or ferries shall be used, so far as may be necessary, to pay the cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and any residue thereof shall be paid into the sinking fund hereinabove provided for bonds. An accurate record of the cost of purchasing the ferry or ferries, the expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 7. After payment of the bonds and interest, or after a sinking fund sufficient for such payment shall have been provided and shall be held for that purpose, the Commission shall deliver deeds or other suitable instruments of conveyance of the interest of the Commission in and to the bridge, that part within the United States to the State of New York or any municipality or agency thereof as may be authorized by or pursuant to law to accept the same (hereinafter referred to as the "United States interests") and that part within Canada to the Dominion of Canada or to such Province, municipality, or agency thereof as may be authorized by or pursuant to law to accept the same (hereinafter referred to as the "Canadian interests"), under the condition that the bridge shall thereafter be free of tolls and be properly maintained, operated, and repaired by the United States interests and the Canadian interests, as may be agreed upon; but if either the United States interests or the Canadian interests shall not be authorized to accept or shall not accept the same under such conditions, then the bridge shall continue to be owned, maintained, operated, and repaired by the Commission, and the rates of tolls shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management, until such time as both the United States interests and the Canadian interests shall be authorized to accept and shall accept such conveyance under such conditions. If at the time of such conveyance the Commission or its successors shall not have disposed of such ferry or ferries, the same shall be disposed of by sale as soon as practicable, at such price and upon such terms as the Commission or its successors may determine, but in making any such sale preference shall be given to the Canadian interests and thereafter to the United States interests before any sale except to such respective interests.

SEC. 8. For the purpose of carrying into effect the objects stated in this act there is hereby created the St. Lawrence Bridge Commission, and by that name, style, and title said body shall have perpetual succession; may contract and be contracted with, sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, complain and defend in all courts of law and equity; may make and have a common seal; may purchase or otherwise acquire and hold or dispose of real estate and other property; may accept and receive donations or gifts of money or other property and apply same to the purposes of this act; and shall have and possess all powers necessary, convenient, or proper for carrying into effect the objects stated in this act.

The Commission shall consist of Walter Willson, George W. Sisson, Jr., John Bird, James C. Dolan, Albert P. Newell, Charles Steger, Franklin R. Little, Felix Hulser, Arthur Belgard, Robert H. McEwen, and Julius Frank. Such Commission shall be a body corporate and politic constituting a public-benefit corporation. Any vacancy occurring in said Commission shall be filled by a majority vote of the remaining members of the Commission, and notices of elections to fill vacancies and of acceptances thereof shall be filed with the county clerk of St. Lawrence County, N.Y. Each member of the Commission and their respective successors shall qualify by giving such bond as may be fixed by the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture, conditioned for the faithful performance of all duties required by this act. The Commission shall elect a chairman and a vice chairman from its members, and may establish rules and regulations for the government of its own business. Five members shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business: Provided, however, That if there be less than five members of said Commission on account of vacancies, the remaining member or members may fill such vacancies.

SEC. 9. The Commission shall have no capital stock or shares of interest or participation, and all revenues and receipts thereof shall be applied to the purposes specified in this act. The members of the Commission shall be entitled to a per diem compensation for their services of $10 for each day actually spent in the business of the Commission, but the maximum compensation of the chairman in any year shall not exceed $2,500 and of each other member shall not exceed $500. The members of the Commission shall also be entitled to receive traveling expense allowance of 10 cents a mile for each mile actually traveled on the business of the Commission. The Commission may employ a secretary, treasurer, engineers, attorneys, and such other experts, assistants, and employees as they may deem necessary, who shall be entitled to receive such compensation as the Commission may determine. All salaries and expenses shall be paid solely from the funds provided under the authority of this act. After all bonds and interest thereon shall have been paid and all other obligations of the Commission paid or discharged, or provision for all such payments shall have been made as hereinbefore provided, and after the bridge shall have been conveyed to the United States interests and the Canadian interests as herein provided, and any ferry or ferries shall have been sold, the Commission shall be dissolved and shall cease to have further existence by an order of the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads made upon his own initiative or upon application of the Commission or any member or members thereof, but only after a public hearing in the city of Ogdensburg, notice of the time and place of which hearing and the purpose thereof shall have been published once, at least 30 days before the date thereof, in a newspaper published in the city of Ogdensburg, N.Y., and a newspaper published in Prescott, Ontario. At the time of such dissolution all moneys in the hands of or to the credit of the Commission shall be divided into two equal parts, one of which shall be paid to said United States interests and the other to said Canadian interests.

SEC. 10. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize or permit the Commission or any member thereof to create any obligation or incur any liability other than such obligations and liabilities as are dischargeable solely from funds provided by this act. No obligation created or liability incurred pursuant to this act shall be an obligation or liability of any member or members of the Commission, but shall be chargeable solely to the funds herein provided, nor shall any indebtedness created pursuant to this act be an indebtedness of the United States.

SEC. 11. All provisions of this act may be enforced, or the violation thereof prevented by mandamus, injunction, or other appropriate remedy brought by the attorney general for the State of New York, the United States district attorney for the district in which the bridge may be located in part, or by the solicitor general of the Dominion of Canada in any court having competent jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties.

SEC. 12. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 11, it is proposed to strike out lines 3 to 24, both inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The Commission shall consist of 11 persons appointed by the Governor of New York. Such Commission shall be a body corporate and politic constituting a public-benefit corporation. Any vacancy occurring in said Commission shall be filled by the Governor. Each member of the Commission and their respective successors shall qualify by giving such bond as may be fixed by the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture, conditioned for the faithful performance of all duties required by this act. The Commission shall elect a chairman and a vice chairman from its members, and may establish rules and regulations for the government of its own business. Five members shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, Senate bill 1577 will be indefinitely postponed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1286) to increase the efficiency of the Veterinary Corps of the Regular Army was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

OCHOCO NATIONAL FOREST, OREG.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 285) to authorize the addition of certain lands to the Ochoco National Forest, Oreg., which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, That the following described public lands are hereby included in and made a part of the Ochoco National Forest, Oreg., subject to all the laws and regulations applicable to national forests, but such inclusion shall not affect any entry or vested rights acquired under the public land laws prior to the passage of this act: The west half southeast quarter and the southwest quarter section 7; the southwest quarter northeast quarter, the northwest quarter northwest quarter, the south half northwest quarter, the north half southwest quarter, the southeast quarter southwest quarter, the north half southeast quarter, and the southwest quarter southeast quarter section 17; the north half northeast quarter, the southwest quarter northeast quarter, the west half southeast quarter, and the west half section 18; and all of section 19; all in township 13 south, range 24 east, Willamette meridian.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the fact that some of us are receiving petitions to exclude or withdraw lands that have been incorporated within the forest reserves upon the ground that it was not necessary to do so and that their incorporation is injurious to the people living contiguous to the forests, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] what is the necessity now of enlarging the boundaries of this forest.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I think there is no objection to this particular item of extension. The land involved is high mountain land, forming the divide between the headwaters of two small river systems. It is contiguous to the national forest; it is a part of the public domain, but has been withdrawn from entry for a great many years—I think at least 10 years.

The application for this extension was made sometime ago by the Department of Agriculture, and was submitted to the Interior Department, which, of course, controls this land. Both Departments are desirous that the bill be enacted. The report discloses that the present Secretary of the Interior reported favorably upon the bill. The Secretary of the Interior prior to this administration favored the bill. The Secretaries of Agriculture in this and in the prior administration, I understand, both favored the bill. There is no settlement here. There is no private ownership involved. There is a total of 1,800 acres of land which it is thought should be logically a part of the national park.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This bill is the unfinished business.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Let it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

LOANS BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION TO CLOSED BUILDING-AND-LOAN ASSOCIATIONS

The bill (S. 1648) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, to provide for loans to closed building-and-loan associations, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like an explanation by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] as to the necessity and wisdom of this measure.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act as originally passed gave the Corporation authority to make loans to banks, savings banks, and building-and-loan associations, among other institutions. The original act gave the Corporation authority to lend to closed banks. A subsequent amendment gave the Corporation the authority to lend to closed savings banks; but no authority has yet been given to lend to closed building-and-loan associations. It is believed that the theory of the original act will be carried out by extending the authority to lend to closed building-and-loan associations exactly the same as to closed banks or closed savings banks.

Another change in the law that is made by this bill is with respect to the limitation of all loans to closed institutions. The original act contained a limitation of $200,000,000, and the attorneys for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are not certain whether that limitation is an absolute limitation or whether the $200,000,000 constitutes a revolving fund. The bill as reported by the committee would raise that limit to $300,000,000, and make it clear that it is a revolving fund.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is it recommended that there should be an increase of $100,000,000 for this purpose?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation recommended that all limit be removed, but the committee thought it wise to leave a limit of $300,000,000, with a provision that it shall be considered as a revolving fund.

Mr. KING. Has not the Senator received a number of communications—I know I have received six or seven—to the effect that some building-and-loan associations which are practically insolvent are unloading and want to unload upon the Federal Government, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, some of their unsound and wholly unliquid assets, and to free themselves from the bad situation in which they find themselves because of bad loans and of frozen assets?

Mr. BULKLEY. I have no doubt that many owners of bad securities, both building-and-loan associations and banks and other institutions, would be glad if they could unload their bad securities on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or on anybody else; but I submit that that has nothing to do with the matter now before us. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is required to take adequate security for each and every loan made, and it is not presumed that any bad loans will be made under this measure.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator whether he believes it is wise that the Federal Government should get behind the building-and-loan associations in their distress and make advances to them up to this tremendous sum?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the Congress has taken the view that the Government should get very liberally behind financial institutions, savings banks and other banks, to save them from closing, and also to help them to reopen, and to help them to get dividends paid to depositors. I submit that exactly the same principle applies to the building-and-loan associations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 15, to strike out "$250,000,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$300,000,000", and in line 19, after the word "liquidation", to insert a comma and the words "and such sum shall constitute a revolving fund for such purposes", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. To aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry, including facilitating the exportation of agricultural and other products, the Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans, upon such terms and conditions not inconsistent with this act as it may determine, to any bank, savings bank, trust company, building-and-loan association, insurance company, mortgage-loan company, credit union, Federal land bank, joint-stock land bank, Federal intermediate credit bank, agricultural credit corporation, livestock credit corporation, organized under the laws of any State or of the United States, including loans secured by the assets of any bank, savings bank, or building-and-loan association that is closed or in process of liquidation, to aid in the reorganization or liquidation of such banks or building and loan associations, upon application of the receiver or liquidating agent of such bank or building-and-loan association, and any receiver of any national bank is hereby authorized to contract for such loans and to pledge any assets of the bank for securing the same: Provided, That not more than $300,000,000 shall be used for the relief of banks (including savings banks and building-and-loan associations) that are closed or in the process of liquidation, and such sum shall constitute a revolving fund for such purposes."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DILL subsequently said: Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate passed this morning the bill (S. 1648) to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, to provide for loans to closed building-and-loan associations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Washington will be entered.

RELIEF OF HOME OWNERS

The bill (H.R. 5240) to provide emergency relief with respect to home mortgage indebtedness, to refinance home mortgages, to extend relief to the owners of homes occupied by them and who are unable to amortize their debt elsewhere, to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, to increase the market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, that bill should go over. A number of Senators want to speak on it and to offer amendments to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

NAVAL AIR STATION, PENSACOLA, FLA.

The bill (S. 1103) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with certain public works at the Naval Air Station, Pensacola, Fla., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to construct additional buildings, structures, roads, utilities, and appurtenances, and to remove, relocate, replace, remodel, and extend existing buildings, structures, roads, utilities, and appurtenances at the naval air station, Pensacola, Fla., at a cost not to exceed $6,955,000, and said sum is hereby authorized to be appropriated.

NAVAL AIR STATION, PENSACOLA (CORRY FIELD), FLA.

The bill (S. 1104) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with certain public works at the Naval Air Station, Pensacola (Corry Field), Fla., was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I withhold the objection.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, this bill provides an authorization, not an appropriation, for the building of hangars and of some other minor improvements at the landing field at Pensacola, Fla. The object of the bill, particularly at this time, is that there may be an authorization so that if the President and the Budget Director see proper to include this in the public-works program, it may be included. Otherwise, there would be no expenditure made at all, and that rests in the sound judgment of the President and the Director of the Budget. The bill itself does not carry an appropriation but merely an authorization.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. KING. If I had not had my attention distracted, I should have objected to the consideration of calendar 101, Senate bill 1103. A joint committee of the House and of the Senate are now engaged in hearing testimony with respect to the question of dirigibles, trying to ascertain the cause of the disaster to the Akron, as well as to the Shenandoah, and other dirigibles constructed by the Government, and to determine whether or not there is any utility in the construction of these airships.

May I ask the Senator whether Senate bill 1103 is for the purpose of obtaining nearly $7,000,000 for the purpose of making ready for the reception of airships, when we may not construct them?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the purpose of it is to provide sufficient housing and facilities at the naval air station at Pensacola, Fla. Of course, that is not a station where they use dirigibles at all. It is a heavier-than-air station, and is used exclusively for the training of student flyers for the Navy. Air drills for trained pilots are carried on at the station located in California. The station at Pensacola is one of the major air stations of the country, and it is here that students are sent to learn to fly. The lighter-than-air planes have never been used, and such operation is not contemplated. Unless the President should decide to use the authorization here proposed in a public-works program, the appropriation would not be made. Of course, the bill does not carry any appropriation.

The Government has about 80 planes at this training field on the average, and those planes are exposed to the weather. They have been so exposed for years and years, and the principal part of the expense involved in this measure would be for the building of hangars to protect those planes in the interest of economy and in the interest of increased protection to the flyers. Exposed as they are, the planes deteriorate much more rapidly than if in hangars, and there is much more danger of defects resulting from the exposure as well as a greater expense for upkeep. The Navy Department for 2 or 3 years or 4 years has called attention to the necessity of these hangars and other facilities at this field. However, it all reverts back to the question of the authority of the President and of the Budget Director as to whether anything shall be done under the provisions of a public-works program. I know the improvement called for in the bill is very necessary and I believe well merits being taken care of in the public-works program. In this connection this legislation is exceedingly desirable, and I urge its passage.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the bill which ought to command the largest opposition was passed during the time I was called to another part of the Chamber, and if that becomes a law, obviously the pending bill should be enacted. In my opinion, however, neither of them at this particular juncture should have received the approval of the Congress or of the Senate. We have been insisting that there should be a reduction of 25 percent, and when we make a reduction of 25 percent in one line we increase it by 50 or 100 percent in some other. Instead of there being reductions and economies, with the profligate manner in which we are passing many of these appropriation bills, I venture the prophecy that there will be no reduction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to construct additional buildings, structures, roads, utilities, and appurtenances, at the naval air station, Pensacola (Corry Field), Fla., at a cost not to exceed $1,053,500, and said sum is hereby authorized to be appropriated.

PRACTICE OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES BEFORE DEPARTMENTS

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 54) limiting the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Arkansas explain why this is necessary?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this measure is affected with emergency considerations. It is the desire of the Secretary of Agriculture and others who are charged with responsibility for administering the Farm Act recently passed by the Congress to secure the services as attorney of Mr. Lee, whom every Member of the Senate well knows. Mr. Lee has, without compensation, collaborated with Members of both Houses of Congress, and with the committees having jurisdiction of the legislation, in the preparation of the bill.

In addition to that fact, he is familiar with all relief legislation pertaining to agriculture passed by the Congress during recent years. He is a member of a law firm here consisting of two persons, and is unwilling to surrender his connection with the law firm for mere temporary employment in the Department of Agriculture, as the legislation referred to contemplates. The Department is anxious to have his services.

There are two precedents for this proposed legislation—one in the case of former Senator Pomerene and Mr. Roberts, now Associate Justice Roberts, when they were employed under the resolution of the Senate in connection with the litigation pertaining to oil lands owned by the United States, and the other in connection with Mr. Huston Thompson.

There is a provision in the pending measure which denies to the attorney and his subordinates the right to practice before the Department of Agriculture. I shall place in the RECORD, with the consent of the Senate, the statutes which are involved in this measure, and the statements of fact, more elaborately gone into than I have gone into them.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. KING. I noticed in the paper yesterday that Mr. Lee has been employed by the Governor of the State of Maryland for the purpose of presenting a claim of the State of Maryland to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, as I understood it, or to some governmental agency, in order that that State might obtain a considerable part of an appropriation made by Congress. I was wondering whether, being employed by the State to present a claim against the Government, it would be quite consistent that he should receive employment along the lines indicated by the Senator. Knowing Mr. Lee so well and having such confidence in his integrity personally, I would trust him with employment on both sides of a case.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, there is no proposal here that Mr. Lee shall be employed on both sides of any case. The proposal is that the general rule established by the statute, that no person in the employ of the Government shall be permitted to practice law before any department, is relaxed for the reasons I have stated.

This does not interfere with Mr. Lee or his associate in taking cases of the nature described by the Senator from Utah. It has no relationship to that subject.

The representatives of the Government desire the services of Mr. Lee. As every Senator who hears me knows, the Farm Act is an exceedingly complicated statute. It requires the advice of counsel, in its proper administration, familiar with the legislation, and with preceding legislation having relation to similar purposes and effects.

I think there is nothing further I desire to say.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That nothing in sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code (U.S.C., title 18, secs. 198 and 203) or any other act of Congress forbidding any person in the employ of the United States from acting as attorney or agent for another before any department (other than the Department of Agriculture) or branch of the Government, or from receiving pay for so acting, shall be deemed to apply to any counsel or other officer of the Department of Agriculture if designated by the Secretary of Agriculture at the time of appointment as entitled to the benefits of this resolution: Provided, That not more than three such officers shall hold such exemptions at the same time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask leave to place in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, a copy of the statute and statements referred to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTIONS 109 AND 113 OF THE CRIMINAL CODE

Whoever, being an officer of the United States, or a person holding any place of trust or profit, or discharging any official function under, or in connection with, any executive department of the Government of the United States, or under the Senate or House of Representatives of the United States, shall act as an agent or attorney for prosecuting any claim against the United States, or in any manner, or by any means, otherwise than in discharge of his proper official duties, shall aid or assist in the prosecution or support of any such claim, or receive any gratuity, or any share of or interest in any claim from any claimant against the United States, with intent to aid or assist, or in the consideration of having aided or assisted, in the prosecution of such claim, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both. Members of the National Guard of the District of Columbia who receive compensation for their services as such shall not be held or construed to be officers of the United States, or persons holding any place of trust or profit, or discharging any official function under or in connection with any executive department of the Government of the United States within the provisions of this section (Criminal Code, sec. 109).

Whoever, being elected or appointed a Senator, Member of or Delegate to Congress, or a Resident Commissioner, shall after his election or appointment and either before or after he has qualified, and during his continuance in office, or being the head of a department, or other officer or clerk in the employ of the United States, shall, directly or indirectly, receive, or agree to receive, any compensation whatever for any services rendered or to be rendered to any person, either by himself or another, in relation to any proceeding, contract, claim, controversy, charge, accusation, arrest, or other matter or thing in which the United States is a party or directly or indirectly interested, before any department, courtmartial, bureau, officer, or any civil, military, or naval commission whatever, shall be fined not more than $10,000 and imprisoned not more than 2 years; and shall, moreover, thereafter be incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States (Criminal Code, sec. 113).

STATEMENTS

The proposed resolution does not alter the maximum salary of $10,000, less 15 percent under the Economy Act, as authorized by the farm bill, nor does it otherwise affect the salary situation. What the proposed resolution does provide is that the designated appointee may be employed by the Secretary of Agriculture without having to surrender his connection with his own law firm or his private practice before any department or agency of the Government, other than the Department of Agriculture. During the tenure of the employment, however, practice before the Department of Agriculture could not be engaged in.

There are two precedents for the proposed resolution. One is the joint resolution of December 21, 1928 (45 Stat. 1067), covering the cases of Owen J. Roberts and Atlee Pomerene; the other is the act of December 24, 1931 (Public, No. 1, 72d Cong.), covering the case of Huston Thompson. The language of the proposed resolution is substantially the same as that of the above-cited resolution and act, except that under these practice was permitted to be continued before all Departments and agencies of the Government, without exception. The act covering the Huston Thompson case, for instance, reads as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That nothing in sections 109 and 113 of the act entitled 'An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States,' approved March 4, 1909, as amended (U.S.C., title 18, secs. 198 and 203), or of any other act of Congress forbidding any person in the employ of the United States or acting in any official capacity under them from acting as agent or attorney for another before any department or branch of the Government or from receiving pay for so acting shall be deemed to apply to counsel serving in the case of the Appalachian Electric Power Co. against George Otis Smith and others, now pending in the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Virginia."

Frederic P. Lee, whom it is understood the Secretary of Agriculture will designate under the proposed joint resolution, is a member of the firm of MacCracken & Lee, with offices in the National Press Building in this city. There are only two members of the firm. Unless the benefits of the proposed resolution were given him he could not accept appointment for service in the Department of Agriculture as he cannot afford to give up his private practice and withdraw from his firm.

Mr. Lee is a resident of Maryland and a member of the New York and District of Columbia bars. He was legislative counsel of the Senate from 1923 to 1930, and assistant legislative counsel in the House of Representatives from 1919 to 1923. During this period he drafted and prepared legal arguments, memoranda, and reports concerning a large majority of the farm-relief measures considered and acted upon by the two Houses. As a result he became familiar with most of the legal and economic problems involved in the farm-relief legislation.

For approximately 2 weeks last November, he aided in developing a farm-relief legislative program at the request of Mr. Moley. This service was volunteer service without compensation. During December, January, and February last, Mr. Lee was retained by the national farm organizations in connection with the drafting and legal phases of their legislative program for farm relief and agricultural credits. He also appeared on behalf of the farm organizations at the hearings before the House Committee on Agriculture. This retainer expired on March 4. Immediately thereafter Mr. Lee was commandeered by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace to serve as special counsel in connection with the farm relief bill just passed. He served the Secretary and the committees of Congress in the framing of the legislation and represented the Secretary on numerous occasions before committees and Members of Congress. Up to a few days before the measue was signed by the President, Mr. Lee gave his full time to this work. This service was without compensation from the Government or any other source.

The Secretary of Agriculture and the administrator of the Farm Relief Act desire again to commandeer Mr. Lee's services in handling for the Department of Agriculture the legal problems arising under the act. They believe his services are necessary because of his exceptional familiarity with farm-relief legislation, its legal phases, legislative history, and subject matter; and because of his knowledge of departmental legal procedure and other legal activities of the Government.

WATER CHARGES ON DAMAGED LAND

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1536) giving credit for water charges paid on damaged land, which had been reported by the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation with amendments, on page 2, line 9, to strike out the word "districts" and insert the word "district", and on line 12, strike out the word "districts" and insert the word "district", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That all construction charges heretofore paid by owners on lands to be conveyed to the United States of America pursuant to the act of Congress approved March 23, 1933 (S. 156, 73d Cong.), shall be transferred as a credit to the lands to be so patented by the United States, and all payments of operation and maintenance charges with penalty and interest heretofore made on such of the lands to be conveyed as were not, in the determination of the Secretary of the Interior, during the period for which payment was made, susceptible of successful cultivation by reason of seepage, alkalinity, or other causes not within the control of the owners of such land, shall be allowed as credits on future construction, operation, and maintenance charges on the lands retained or those to be patented by the United States pursuant to the act of Congress approved March 23, 1933 (S. 156, 73d Cong.). Like credit shall also be given the irrigation district for all the charges heretofore paid by it on such lands and for which the owners of said lands have not in turn reimbursed the irrigation district.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MENOMINEE TRIBE OF INDIANS, WISCONSIN

The bill (H.R. 4494) authorizing a per capita payment of $100 to the members of the Menominee Tribe of Indians of Wisconsin from funds on deposit to their credit in the Treasury of the United States, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 506) conferring upon the President the power to reduce subsidies, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

LOANS TO IRRIGATION DISTRICTS

The bill (S. 1738) authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to irrigation districts for certain purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, to irrigation districts organized under the laws of any State, and operating under contract with the United States, to aid in the payment of their operation and maintenance charges and to provide funds for the installation and operation of necessary works, upon the same terms and conditions, and subject to the same limitations, as are applicable in the case of loans to financial institutions as specified in section 5 of such act, as amended; except that such loans may also be made to any such irrigation district to aid in refunding or refinancing its obligations outstanding on the date of enactment of this act.

SEC. 2. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

(b) The amount of notes, debentures, bonds, or other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to have outstanding at any one time under section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is increased by such amount as may be necessary to enable the Corporation to obtain funds for the purposes of this act.

FRANK W. MAHIN

The bill (S. 696) to authorize Frank W. Mahin, retired American Foreign Service officer, to accept from Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands the brevet and insignia of the Royal Netherland Order of Orange Nassau, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Frank W. Mahin, retired American Foreign Service officer, be, and he is hereby, authorized to accept from Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands the brevet and insignia of officer of the Royal Netherland Order of Orange Nassau, which has been tendered to said officer, through the Department of State, in appreciation of services rendered the people of Holland.

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S.J.Res. 56) to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

PAYMENT TO SURPLUS GRADUATES OF NAVAL ACADEMY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 5012) to amend existing law in order to obviate the payment of 1 year's sea pay to surplus graduates of the Naval Academy, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, after the word "discharge", at the end of line 10, to insert the following proviso: "Provided, however, That one half of 1 year's sea pay as heretofore provided by law shall be paid to each of said surplus of graduates who shall graduate in the class of 1933 who do not receive an appointment", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of the act of August 5, 1882 (22 Stat. 285, ch. 391), as is contained in the proviso at the end of section 1057, title 34, United States Code, is hereby amended by repealing the words "and 1 year's sea pay", so that the said proviso will read as follows: "Provided, That if there be a surplus of graduates, those who do not receive such appointments shall be given a certificate of graduation and an honorable discharge: Provided, however, That one half of 1 year's sea pay as heretofore provided by law shall be paid to each of said surplus of graduates who shall graduate in the class of 1933 who do not receive an appointment."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Florida if the report on the bill is unanimous?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It is a unanimous report, 11 members of the committee participating in it.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. TRAMMELL subsequently said: Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment to the bill (H.R. 5012) to amend existing law in order to obviate the payment of 1 year's sea pay to surplus graduates of the Naval Academy, ask for a conference with the House of Representatives, and that conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer (Mr. POPE in the chair) appointed Mr. TRAMMELL, Mr. MCGILL, and Mr. HALE conferees on the part of the Senate.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO WEDNESDAY

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the desire has been expressed on the part of many Senators that the Senate at the conclusion of its labors today shall take a recess until Wednesday next. It is my opinion, from a study of the situation, that we will well be able to do that, in the event that the unfinished business, which is the independent offices appropriation bill, shall be disposed of during the present calendar day.

SALARY SCHEDULES OF BANKS, PUBLIC UTILITIES, ETC.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, at this time I desire to ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Resolution 75, as modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the resolution by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A resolution (S.Res. 75) calling for salary schedules of executive officers of certain banks, railroads, and electric and power corporations.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield.

Mr. MCNARY. When this resolution came before the Senate on three different occasions during the past week I objected to its consideration and it went to the calendar. I do not understand that it is necessary for the Senator from Colorado to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution. I think it comes up automatically after the conclusion of the call of the calendar.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If that be so, I hope the resolution may be considered at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution (S.Res. 75), submitted by Mr. COSTIGAN on May 8, 1933, and modified on May 16, was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board is requested to prepare and transmit to the Senate as soon as practicable a report showing the salary schedule of the executive officers and directors of each Federal Reserve bank and member bank of the Federal Reserve System; be it further

Resolved, That the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is requested to prepare and transmit to the Senate as soon as practicable a report showing the salary schedule of the executive officers and directors of each bank not a member of the Federal Reserve System to which loans or advances have been made by the Corporation; be it further

Resolved, That the Federal Power Commission is requested to prepare and transmit to the Senate as soon as practicable a report showing the salary schedule of the executive officers and directors of each public-utility corporation engaged in the transportation of electrical energy in interstate commerce and of all other corporations licensed under the Federal Water Power Act; and be it further

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is requested to prepare and transmit to the Senate as soon as practicable a report showing the salary schedule of the executive officers and directors of each corporation engaged in interstate commerce (other than public-utility corporations) having capital and/or assets of more than a million dollars in value, whose securities are listed on the New York Stock Exchange or the New York Curb Exchange.

For the purposes of this resolution the term "salary" includes any compensation, fee, bonus, commission, or other payments, direct or indirect, in money or otherwise, for personal services.

Mr. COSTIGAN subsequently said: Mr. President, following today's proceedings whereby Senate Resolution 75 was adopted, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article from this morning's Washington Post indicating certain possibilities of Executive and legislative action based on the requested information.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, May 29, 1933]

FANCY CORPORATION PAY CUT BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION—BORROWERS ARE COMPELLED TO SHOW THAT SALARIES ARE NOT EXCESSIVE

Executives of corporations who obtain loans for their companies from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation hereafter must take reductions in salaries or prove that their compensation is not excessive.

This rule, an outgrowth of efforts in Congress to require limitation of salaries paid by companies which receive Government loans, was laid down yesterday by Jesse H. Jones, chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It was applied last week in the case of the Southern Pacific Co., which received loans totaling $23,200,000.

The Southern Pacific, always noted for paying handsome salaries to its officers and executives, who operate one of the greatest transportation systems in the country, was required to reduce executive salaries by from 10 to 60 percent.

The scale of reductions as laid down by the corporation in this specific case was 60 percent, including previous reductions, for all salaries of $100,000 or more per year; 50 percent for salaries from $50,000 to $100,000; 40 percent from $25,000 to $50,000; 25 percent from $15,000 to $25,000; 15 percent from $10,000 to $15,000; and at least 10 percent for salaries and wages from $4,800 to $10,000. Reductions already made in salaries and wages are to be included in the reductions required by the Corporation.

Contracts of the railroad brotherhoods and other unions which deal with the Southern Pacific, which runs, besides its railroad and steamship lines, a number of bus lines and a hotel system and has other interests, are not affected. Higher-salaried officials of the Southern Pacific already have taken cuts of approximately 25 percent.

The Southern Pacific agreement provided that in the event Congress passed a law requiring a limitation of salaries of officers of corporations borrowing from the Reconstruction Corporation, the reduction in salaries of officers would be put at whatever limitation Congress imposed from June 1.

The Southern Pacific agreement also required that the company go to bankers and the public for funds to repay the Government as soon as the money market would permit. Salaries cannot be increased during the life of the loan.

Hale Holden, of New York, is chairman of the executive committee of the company. It was reported in railroad circles yesterday that the reduction agreed upon would cut his salary from $150,000 a year to $60,000, including any reduction already made.

Other high officials of the company include H. W. DeForest, chairman of the board; Angus D. McDonald, vice chairman of the executive committee; and Paul Shoup, of San Francisco, president of the company.

"While the Southern Pacific Railroad loan is the first in which these salary reductions have been required", Mr. Jones said yesterday, "it will be the policy of the Corporation to impose similar conditions in all future loans to railroads or other corporations paying excessive salaries."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the calendar.

COST OF ELECTRICAL DISTRIBUTION

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to bring up at this time for immediate action Senate Resolution No. 80. It is my understanding that the respective party leaders on both sides of the Senate Chamber have no objection to such immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 80, submitted by Mr. COSTIGAN on the 15th instant, as follows:

Whereas growing interest is manifest throughout the Nation on the part of householders, both urban and rural, as to present and future uses of electricity and reasonable rates chargeable therefor; and

Whereas a considerable, if not controlling, factor in the cost of rural and domestic electric service is reported to be the expense of distributing transmitted current between local substations and the customers' meters; and

Whereas it is responsibly alleged by engineers that the service companies keep no record of this important distribution cost and that the subject has never been discussed before any engineering society; that technical literature does not deal with it; and that only rarely has it been considered in electric rate cases:

Resolved, That the Federal Power Commission is hereby requested to furnish the Senate with a report summarizing such information as may be available indicating the cost of electrical distribution expressed in cents per kilowatt-hour under varying service conditions, as contrasted with the more widely known costs of electrical generation and electrical transmission.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Colorado to say that the resolution is now satisfactory to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY].

Mr. COSTIGAN. I may say to the able Senator from Michigan that the Senator from Oregon has stated to me today that he has no objection to action on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD, in connection with the resolution and informative as to its purposes, an editorial in the Electrical World of March 7, 1931, and an article in the New Republic of December 21, 1932, dealing with the subject matter of the resolution. The article was prepared by a distinguished authority in this field, Mr. Morris Llewellyn Cooke, of Philadelphia.

There being no objection, the editorial and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Editorial from the Electrical World for Mar. 7, 1931]

TURN MORE LIGHT UPON DISTRIBUTION COSTS

Segregation of distribution costs is needed more than ever before because the public does not comprehend why these costs are relatively high compared with others. Although many companies have used itemized costs of this character to determine the expense of serving different classes of business and to guide moves for economy, these costs have not had the publicity that has been given to production costs, and since the public hears of nothing but the low values of the latter it is no surprise that it reaches the conclusion it does.

When the public hears more frequently about systematic analyses of distribution costs and knows that they are being used to establish the most equitable tariffs, political agitation will have less weight. Political attacks are not due to the divulging of generating costs but to failure to give equal emphasis to distribution costs—domestic, commercial, and industrial. Of course the intermingling of services prevents absolutely accurate allocation of costs, but it does not eliminate the relative value of data apportioned, according to the best knowledge obtainable.

Sufficient study already has been made of cost allocation to show that this is a difficult problem to solve by a single method or plan. But the general basic principles should be determined and the influence of local modifying elements, such as quality of service and territorial conditions, ascertained. If these topics were discussed as thoroughly in committees and conventions as other economic engineering topics have been, a consensus of opinion might be developed on how to make analyses more accurate and more generally applicable. If this task is not initiated and carried to fruition by the industry, sooner or later commissions will prescribe the details of cost allocation and methods for ascertaining values.

Insistently the public asks: "Why the spread between generating and customer cost?" Publicity on analyses of distribution costs is the only answer. Incidentally these analyses may show where economies can be effected. If economies are found possible, the industry may be trusted to do as popular a job as it has with production costs.

[From the New Republic for Dec. 21, 1932]

PAYING TOO MUCH FOR ELECTRICITY

By Morris Llewellyn Cooke

It seems clear that the American people are definitely of the opinion that retail electric rates are excessive. Householders are asking why they are compelled to pay, say 7 cents per kilowatt-hour for current which their neighbor, the big industrialist, purchases for, say, 7 mills to operate his blast furnaces, mines, and railways. The merchant, the farmer, and the city councilor negotiating a contract for street lighting also question the rates charged them.

Our Ambassador to Germany, the Honorable Frederick M. Sackett, gained Nation-wide popularity for his remark at the World Power Conference in Berlin 2 years ago to the effect that he knew of no other manufacturing industry where the sale price of the product to consumers is 15 times the actual cost of production. In my opinion the Ambassador overestimated the spread. On the other hand the rejoinder of the spokesmen for the industry was unsatisfactory. The next day George N. Tidd, at Berlin, and J. F. Owens, of the National Electric Light Association, then in convention in San Francisco, both explained that the apparently excessive price to domestic users for electric service was due to the high cost of distribution. Bananas, they said, were cheap off the plants in Central America, but necessarily cost many times more in a grocery store in New York. The gentlemen were quite right. It does cost more per unit to deliver electric energy in small quantities to a house on a side street than in huge volume to a great industrial plant—but how much more? That is what they failed to state and what the American people, and presumably Mr. Sackett himself, would like to know.

The surprising thing is that had Ambassador Sackett put this question to his critics they could not have answered him, because they did not know. The whole electrical industry could not have answered him, because it does not know. Its executives can tell you to the fraction of a mill what it costs to generate electricity, or what it costs to transmit current over high-tension lines for 10 miles, or 350 miles. But they do not know what it costs per kilowatt-hour to distribute energy from a local switchboard or the step-down station at the end of a transmission line to houses, stores, and streets—a distance usually not more than 5 miles.

They have not investigated or discovered this important fact about their business in all the 50 years of its existence. Had Mr. Sackett gone to the libraries, even the engineering libraries, he would have found no light on this subject. Had he turned expectantly to the great engineering societies, he would have been no better off.

The electric-service companies do not claim to keep cost accounts on distribution by such methods as are employed in every phase of the steel, clothing, paper, and other industries. Only a few years ago every operating company in Pennsylvania officially advised an investigating commission that cost-keeping in the domestic field was not attempted. Mr. Alex Dow, president of the Detroit Edison Co., recently testified to the same effect. The Electrical World, recognized organ of the industry, in its leading editorial for the issue of March 7, 1931, "Turn More Light on Distribution Costs", frankly admitted the entire absence of these data and emphasized their public importance.

This indifference to distribution costs has been studied and deliberated. It is well known that the uniform classification of accounts required of electrical companies by State public-service commissions originated with the National Electric Light Association. It provides no possibility of cost-finding on distribution. As a result the regulators know nothing of this matter. The absence of distribution-cost data has barely attracted their attention. Further, the rate research committee of the National Electric Light Association has studiously avoided the question.

The upshot is that while the householder and commercial manager are told that their higher rates are primarily due to the high cost of distribution, there are absolutely no scientific data upon which such costs are based. The importance of the issue here raised becomes apparent when we consider that while the national electrical bill for 1931 was $2,000,000,000, 70 percent of this amount, or $1,400,000,000, was paid by the retail consumers. The energy they used possibly cost the companies $400,000,000 to generate and transmit to local substations. Therefore the retail users paid $1,000,000,000 for local distribution. The item is impressive.

In the absence of a proper engineering, cost-finding technique we are compelled to resort to other methods in an effort to determine whether the above estimated distribution-cost figure is excessive and, if so, to what degree. The cost of distribution is a matter of concern to three classes of electric service: (1) domestic, including rural; (2) commercial light and power, retail; and (3) municipal, largely street lighting. The current consumed by each class, the revenue derived therefrom, and the average rates paid in 1931 as reported by the National Electric Light Association, were as follows:

	Kilowatt-hours (in billions)	Revenue (in millions)	Average rate per kilowatt-hour
			Cents
Domestic	11,785	$686	5.82
Commercial light and power	13,837	569	4.11
Municipal and street lighting	2,793	108	3.87
Total	28,415	1,363	4.80

To determine what part of this total charge for retail service belongs to distribution we may assume that the "transmitted current" costs on the average one and a half cents per kilowatt hour, including return on invested capital. The national average rate paid for wholesale transmitted power in 1931 was 1.48 cents per kilowatt-hour.

There are municipalities owning their distribution systems, but buying current at wholesale, who pay for it in the neighborhood of 1 cent per kilowatt-hour. That part of the sales price, therefore, which may be said to be attributable to the total national consumption of 28,415,000,000 kilowatt-hours would be not more than $426,225,000. Subtracting this from the $1,363,000,000 of total revenue, there remains $936,775,000 to be justified as the cost, including profit, of distribution, or nearly one half the revenues of the industry. A distribution overcharge of major proportions is here clearly indicated. This overcharge, as before stated, cannot be exactly determined. It can, however, be roughly approximated.

There is support for the statement that "the whole cost of distribution is approximately $7.50 per year per domestic consumer for 500 kilowatt-hours of service, or 1½ cents per kilowatt-hour." If, then, the cost of current ready for delivery is 1½ cents per kilowatt-hour and the distribution cost is 1½ cents, a fair average price to the domestic consumer would be 3 cents per kilowatt-hour with a fair profit left to the industry. But reports show that in 1931 the national average collected by the industry was 5.82 cents. Subtracting, we arrive at a suggested excess charge of 2.82 cents. Apply this to the nearly 12,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours used in domestic service for that year and we arrive at an estimated unjustifiable charge of $330,000,000 for distribution expense. Even allowing 2 cents for distribution, the overchange will still total $275,000,000.

In commercial service the average use per customer is much higher than domestic use, and other factors are more favorable. Allowing 1¼ cents for cost of current and the same for distribution, the overcharge in this field would be over $200,000,000. Even using the same cost figures as for domestic service, an overcharge of $150,000,000 is indicated. As for municipal service, no approximation of overcharge is possible because of varying local conditions and contracts. Hence, until we have some definite cost data scientifically determined to the contrary, the estimate of $400,000,000—possibly $500,000,000—annual overcharge on distribution seems justified and conservative, this despite the possibly misleading character of general averages when applied to certain special local conditions. The figures here used, however, are well within the facts for a great majority of urban situations.

Substantial support is given these estimates by the unexplained differences between the general level of rates charged by private and by the public plants. In Ontario, Canada, for instance, in the year 1930–31, the householders in 289 cities, towns, and hamlets paid just a little over 1½ cents per kilowatt-hour. In Seattle, where the public plant is in competition with a private plant, the average domestic cost is 2.8 cents and in Tacoma 1.72 cents per kilowatt-hour. In Winnipeg and Fort William it was 8 mills; in Ottawa 9 mills. Thus our national average cost per kilowatt-hour is more than three times that of Ontario and well over double that in several American cities having public plants. This difference in rates, though not an accurate measure of the difference in costs, is far too large to be accounted for by taxes and profits paid by private companies, charges which public plants customarily do not have to meet. The discrepancy is further emphasized by the fact that the capital outlay of public plants both in Ontario and the United States is being amortized, so that in time the people will own the plants outright. Under private ownership no such deduction is made, so that a return must be paid indefinitely by the public on the capital invested.

In spite of the dramatic drop in electric costs during the last 10 years, rates for the great majority of small consumers have remained practically stationary. The average rates reported have fallen because a small percentage of the more well-to-do customers have received the advantage of the lower rates in stepped-rate schedules. In many places the changes in demand charges, service charges, minimum charges, etc., have actually raised rates for large numbers of consumers.

Notwithstanding this discrimination in rates, however, the consumption of electricity in our homes is slowly increasing. In 1926 the average domestic revenue stood at $29.70 and at $33.70 in 1931. Yet the industry has doubtless obtained a greater profit both per domestic consumer and per kilowatt-hour used in domestic service with each drop in the national average of rates paid. The principal added expense to the companies has been for the current itself. If we compute the cost of this current at 1½ cents per kilowatt-hour, we find that in each of the last

5 years the cost of the added current is only about half the added revenue received. Normal business usage in other lines suggests a smaller profit per unit as the number of units sold increases. In view of the fact that increased consumption at lower rates not only ensures larger net profits to the industry but removes the public feeling that it has an antisocial attitude, it is puzzling to understand why the industry has so persistently fought to maintain high-rate levels.

That low rates result in greatly increased consumption is easily demonstrated. In the United States the average family consumption is less than 600 kilowatt-hours per year; in Seattle it is nearly 1,200; in Ontario as a whole, 1,600; in Winnipeg, over 4,000 kilowatt-hours per year. It is clear that if we abandon our present topsy-turvy rate structure based on "all the traffic will bear" and replace this by one based on actual cost plus a fair profit, our present domestic use can speedily be trebled.

As a by-product a much better feeling on the part of the public toward the industry will be engendered. The people are now aware, from the revelations of the Federal Trade Commission investigation, that misleading propaganda, political activities and other antisocial practices sponsored by the National Electric Light Association and other agencies of the industry are largely paid for out of profits yielded by high rates to retail consumers.

To understand how the electrical industry has ignored modern cost accounting in the field under discussion one must go back 50 years to the time when electricity was used almost exclusively for lighting during a few hours at night. To succeed it was necessary to put the plant at work in the daytime. Hence the urge to sell current to factories for industrial purposes. This technically was called improving the load factor. It seemed, and was, at that time, more important to find customers who could use electricity in off-peak hours for plants designed primarily for night lighting. This absorbed the attention of the engineers and the executives, and little attention was paid to distribution. But now that about half the revenue received is from distribution amounting to $1,000,000,000 annually—$8,000,000,000 in the last 10 years—through the tremendous growth of domestic usage, there is an obligation on the industry to give retail consumers the benefit of scientific cost-finding in respect to distribution already given to other consumers in the field of generation and transmission.

The importance of the domestic business as a financial stabilizer has, during the depression, been impressed upon the industry. While industrial use has materially decreased, household consumption of electricity has increased, and the total earnings show a decline of but 1.2 percent. Again the load factor in domestic use compares favorably with that of industry. A study by the Commonwealth Edison Co., of Chicago, disclosed it to be 31 percent. The old arguments seeking to justify discrimination against the retail consumer are disappearing. As a matter of fact, the most promising load builder for the immediate future lies in increased domestic use. But that result will not follow to the desired extent if the industry continues to penalize its customers in the home.

If it is objected that the further extension of the accounting classifications will burden the industry by an added expense, the answer is that the expense will not be increased because it is proposed to substitute for the present meaningless and cumbersome system a truly scientific system which will prove profitable both to the industry and to the consumers. To date, accounting in the industry has been developed almost wholly by accountants who knew nothing of the necessary engineering techniques. The time has come when the engineer must be called in, for the reason that, in order to practice effective cost-finding, expenses must be subdivided in accordance with the plant and work units involved. Each unit must have its standard, and comparisons must be made between the units and actual costs progressively as the work goes forward. It is not a question of further subdivision of accounts, or more elaborate distribution of general and overhead expense, but better organization of accounts and a more obvious tie-in of costs with the general books.

It is not hoped to obtain costs which are absolutely correct, but to obtain comparable costs under different conditions and in different localities for the light which these costs will throw upon the relative value of different devices, methods and administrative policies.

It is pertinent here to take note of a recent decision by the Indiana Public Service Commission in the Martinsville-Wabash electric case, now before the United States Supreme Court. The commission fixed the domestic rate by first ascertaining the cost of "transmitted current" at the city limits. To this was added only the local distribution expense incurred within the city limits. This simplifies rate-making procedure. The significance of this case lies in the fact that a commission has recognized that retail costs consist of two factors: The one the cost of transmitted current, which is now generally known within reasonable limits; the other, local distribution costs, a scientific method of determining which must be devised.

The appliances of distribution, however much they may vary in size and number, are always the same. Everywhere and always we have poles, wires, transformers, meters, and sometimes underground ducts. These factors are so constant that the day is not far off when, given a few easily obtained facts about a given community, the rates for retail electric service will be quickly determined on a slide rule. Such a development, however, would throw into the discard every retail rate schedule in the United States. By eliminating many present wasteful practices based on guesswork, as well as unjust overcharges on distribution, costs will be obtained which will drive drudgery out of the home and off the farm. The ledger balance of the commercial houses will be removed farther from the red and the tax levy for street lighting will be lessened. Another result of importance to investors and promoters will follow: The temptation will be materially lessened to form holding companies, whose chief reason for existence has been to provide reservoirs in which to drain off, and so conceal, the unjustified profits taken from retail consumers by operating companies.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think that under the parliamentary situation I am now entitled to proceed for a few moments.

Mr. McKELLAR. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the unfinished business automatically come before the Senate, and may it not be laid before the Senate, and then the Senator from Michigan may proceed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not until 2 o'clock. Without objection, however, the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate and be considered pending. Is there objection to that being done?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

THE ST. LAWRENCE DEEP-WATERWAY PROJECT

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire at this time to present the affirmative case to the Senate in behalf of the St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty between the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada.

Opponents intermittently and sporadically testify against the treaty and—from my viewpoint—thus invite unwarranted prejudice.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the able Senator from Michigan if it is his purpose in connection with his presentation to press the subject for a vote today?

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is not.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield now, but I desire to proceed without interruption.

Mr. LONG. I merely desire to say to the Senator from Illinois that the Senator from Michigan has more intelligence than that.

Mr. LEWIS. I grant the intelligence of the Senator from Michigan, though I do not know to what particular subject the compliment properly addressed to him relates.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The chief reason that I find it necessary to intrude upon the time and attention of the Senate is the fact that just such persistent prophecy of the treaty's defeat as we heard a moment ago has created a prejudice and miscalculation regarding the Senate's attitude which in fairness to 40,000,000 people who have a stake involved in this proposition can no longer be left without an affirmative case in behalf of the pending treaty.

It would not be fair for this process—and I refer to the process to which I have just adverted—to continue without the present submission of what we believe to be the compelling reasons, grounded in public welfare and in sound public policy, for the immediate ratification of the pending treaty which has twice been favorably reported by the Foreign Relations Committee, the last time by a vote of 16 to 2.

Strenuous efforts have been made to aline a Senate majority against consideration of the treaty at this present extraordinary session of the Senate. It is openly stated that these efforts are pledged to success, despite the fact that the President of the United States authorized a statement in his behalf last week that he desires ratification at the present session. I am hopeful that he will make his attitude clear in a direct message. The success or failure of the movement obviously depends upon his action in this respect; but, be that as it may, the hopes and aspirations of 40,000,000 people in the United States call upon those of us who believe in the President's stated position to present to the Senate and the country what we believe to be the compelling reasons for affirmative action before this session shall draw to a close.

I shall undertake to demonstrate that this present action is part and parcel of the emergency objectives to which this administration and this special session are dedicated.

First. Because it offers direct and specific encouragement to the economic welfare of the great American mid-continent;

Second. Because it is a practical and primary contribution to farm relief;

Third. Because it is a practical and primary contribution to the recapture of American export trade.

Fourth. Because it is one of the greatest make-work projects which can be dedicated to our war upon unemployment; and it seems to me that it would be nothing less than a travesty to dedicate $3,300,000,000 to a public-works program and not place this St. Lawrence project within reach of that great prospectus.

Fifth. Because the criticisms of the undertaking are always more apparent than real, and no remote offset to the stupendous advantages involved can be claimed to lie within these criticisms.

A sixth reason might well find itself in the aspirations of the New York power authority to extend to the great northeastern section of the Nation another of the great public-power developments which may have within it such vast advantage for the people.

Mr. President, in bringing the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty to the attention of the Senate, I first crave the privilege of a memorial word respecting the silenced sponsor who was always its greatest, its most loyal, and its most irresistible proponent in this Chamber. I speak reverently, and with deep significance, of the late Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh.

Those of us who now take up this treaty sponsorship where he laid it down, in an hour of irreparable loss to the Republic, are conscious of our own limitations compared with the commanding genius and the contagious conviction which he dedicated to this cause. But we are the more consecrated to our tasks by the recollection of his attitudes and his allegiance. We are the surer of our ground because of the knowledge that we plead an objective which he deemed necessitous and paramount. We are the more convinced because of his convincing allegiance to this challenging enterprise.

The last public responsibility which the late Senator from Montana discharged was to speak for some 2 hours in the Foreign Relations Committee in behalf of the favorable report which he had personally written to recommend this treaty's ratification. The last senatorial appeal which he addressed to his colleagues was his plea in committee which successfully brought the treaty to the Senate Calendar.

It was his anxiety not to leave the Senate, in anticipation of the prospective Attorney Generalship which he never lived to occupy, without putting this treaty as far forward as it could go in the Seventy-second Congress. As a faithful member of the subcommittee which held long and comprehensive hearings, he never missed a meeting or a witness in the broad and probing survey which we devoted to this inquiry. Prior thereto, for many years, his eloquent voice was always and implacably lifted in behalf of this stupendous adventure. He saw in this seaway, Mr. President, the economic salvation of the land-locked Middle West. He saw in it the most practical formula for farm relief in all the agricultural prospectus. He saw in it, as a by-product, the most gigantic hydroelectric development of modern times. He saw in it new ties of mutually beneficent fraternity between Canada and the United States. It was his dream—and I do not run from the word, because dreams always have preceded great achievements. It was his dream. In ultimate completion it shall be his monument.

I do not recall the late Senator from Montana as my preliminary witness in behalf of the treaty's ratification with any desire to invoke the emotions of his erstwhile colleagues. He would himself reject any such appeal, because he was a realist and preeminently the logician. I recall him solely on these latter counts. Because I feel my own relative incompetence to do justice to the cause of which he was the master, I am submitting at the outset—as a reason for the Senate's friendly and responsive ears—that since he found this seaway completely practical and this treaty entirely worthy of ratification, the Senate should give my own address in this behalf a credence beyond anything which I might alone deserve.

At any rate, Mr. President, the first words spoken for the pending treaty should be the commendations of it as they would have come from our late lamented friend if he were here to urge that the Senate shall advise and consent. In historic justice, lest republics forever be ungrateful, I have wanted the preface to my own observations to speak thus of the seaway's historic "first friend", the late Senator from Montana. Nor could anything else be more cogent or persuasive as an argument.

With these initial, favorable presumptions upon my side, I proceed to my own analysis of this problem now at the Senate's bar.

Mr. President, 200 years of pioneering, 30 years of long-range planning, and 12 years of research, investigation, and examination into the economic, engineering, and international aspects of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway have culminated in the pending treaty between the Governments of Canada and the United States. If the treaty be ratified by us, and then by the Canadian Parliament, immediate construction will be instituted upon the greatest transportation project since Theodore Roosevelt bisected Panama. Then in 7 or 8 years the seaway will be completed; and when it is, the Great Lakes will join the oceans in a common traffic which will unlock this vast American midcontinent and its 40,000,000 people to favorable trade and commerce with the earth.

The possibilities of subsequent developments and advantages stagger the imagination. The asset values to the Nation are well-nigh incalculable. This prospectus does not lie in idle speculation. There are solid reasons for this faith and for these expectations. These are not snap judgments. On the contrary, they are supported by long-sustained studies by international commissions of high experts. Nor are these judgments partisan. The present Democratic President of the United States recommends this treaty precisely as did his Republican predecessors.

Again, these judgments are not sectional. On the contrary, 23 States of the Union have expressed, by executive or legislative action, their deep concern that the seaway shall be built. This is the roll: California, Colorado, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Ohio, Oregon, South Carolina, Utah, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. Very recently, Mr. President, resolutions favoring this seaway treaty and its consideration and ratification at the present session of the Senate have been adopted by the Legislatures of Arkansas, Indiana, Michigan, Montana, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wisconsin. Resolutions similarly favoring action upon it at this session of the Senate have been adopted by one body of the State Legislature of Ohio and one body of the State Legislature of Nebraska. In other words, we are bringing to the Senate an appeal that has behind it a more fundamental sweep of aspiration across a great section of the American people than any other single appeal that has been laid at the bar of the Senate this year.

Typical, Mr. President, of the resolutions that are being adopted not only by State legislatures but by municipal authorities throughout this great area, is the following resolution adopted unanimously by the Common Council of the City of Detroit, Mich., which I ask unanimous consent may be inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

By Councilman Bradley

Whereas the Michigan-St. Lawrence Waterway and Great Lakes Harbors Association, in convention assembled in Detroit today, thanked the President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt, for his earnest and courageous support of the treaty between the United States of America and Canada for the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway, and expressed the hope that he would be able to use his great influence to secure its approval at the present session of Congress; and

Whereas it is reliably stated that opponents of the treaty are making desperate efforts to defeat the will of the President, alleging the Lake States have lost interest in the project; and

Whereas the city of Detroit and State of Michigan have taken a leading part in forwarding this great project, and few, if any, of our prominent citizens or public officials have expressed any sentiments against it; and

Whereas the sentiment in favor of this project is more pronounced in Detroit and the State of Michigan, and the demand for its early consummation is greater at the present time than ever before; and

Whereas the treaty is now before the United States Senate for its ratification: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Common Council of the City of Detroit express its thanks to the President of the United States for his great interest in the ratification of the treaty, and we respectfully petition the two Members of the Senate from the State of Michigan to support it with their votes and also to use their influence to secure its approval at the present session of Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to His Excellency the President of the United States and to Senators COUZENS and VANDENBERG.

Adopted as follows:

Yeas: Councilmen Bradley, Castator, Couzens, Hall, Lindsay, Lodge, and president pro tempore—7.

Nays: None.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Nor is this all. For example, New England has registered a deep concern, first in a favorable report by a committee representing six States and headed by Col. Charles R. Gow, of Cambridge; more recently by the contemporary endorsement of Mr. Henry I. Harriman, now president of the United States Chamber of Commerce. Again, New York, speaking through its power authority, as well as through its distinguished ex-Governor, now President of the United States, supports this fraternity of action.

Furthermore, if there is any validity and integrity in political promises given to the American people in political campaigns, there is a fundamental contract between the people and both Republican and Democratic parties, a contract written at the polls last November which calls for validation in action upon this treaty before this session of the Senate adjourns. Here is what the Republican members of this body are committed to under the terms of their national platform, their contract with the 15,000,000 voters who sustained them. I read:

The Republican Party stands committed to the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway. Under the direction of President Hoover, negotiations of a treaty with Canada for this development is now at a favorable point. Recognizing the inestimable benefits which will accrue to the Nation from placing the ports of the Great Lakes on an ocean base, the party reaffirms its allegiance to this great project and pledges its best efforts to secure its early completion.

That is the contract under which Republican Senators, on their word and faith, must approach this proposed ratification.

Now what about the dominant Democratic Party in this same aspect? I will confess there was a little mystery about the attitude of the Democratic Party at the Chicago National Convention. The subcommittee on platform reported a platform with a plank which unequivocally endorsed the St. Lawrence Treaty project.

When that platform was submitted to the full convention, however, that particular plank seemed to have disappeared and in the platform as subsequently published in behalf of the convention the plank was mysteriously absent. But a few days later, Mr. President, to wit, on the evening of July 30, 1932, the distinguished Democratic nominee for the Presidency spoke over the air from his executive chambers in Albany and undertook to tell the American people what was in the Democratic national platform. In that address he told them that "The Democratic platform promises the completion of the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes seaway." So, I assume that whatever mystery may have attached to the slippery convention itself in this respect, we have the final commitment of the candidate himself that it is the purpose of the party to carry on in behalf of this undertaking.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Is there not a later aspect where at a later time the President called attention to the mystery of which the Senator speaks?

Mr. VANDENBERG. If there is, I missed his particular reference to the matter, but I am referring to the fact that there is no question whatever about the President's attitude in regard to the proposition. I hope there is nothing I have said that has indicated any lack of faith on my part in his attitude. I am sure he does not intend to duplicate the Chicago mystery in respect to his own connection with the treaty.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator will find that at a later date the President-elect called attention to the fact that on perusal of the platform as adopted this clause was not found in it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Whatever he subsequently said in that respect, Mr. President, he himself promised the American people to build the St. Lawrence seaway. There was no equivocation about the promise either. The great former Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh, to whom I have recently referred, went into the heart of the middle Northwest as ambassador of the Democratic candidate for President and promised those people, who have no greater aspiration in this world than the completion of this treaty, promised them in behalf of the Democratic nominee for President, that under his auspices this great adventure would carry on. Now is the time to validate the promise.

I want to repeat that I think the President stands at this hour precisely where he undertook to say he stood then. I think he wants the treaty ratified before the adjournment of this session of Congress, and I only regret that he has not thus far seen fit to step squarely forward with an affirmative recommendation. Nevertheless, I am perfectly confident that before the session is concluded the Senate will have heard from the President in no uncertain terms.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COSTIGAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield, although I prefer to proceed.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Texas, however.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas declines to interrupt the Senator from Michigan under the circumstances.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have been speaking about the various general credentials which this project enjoys and about the attitude of the President in particular. We have a still more specific exhibit upon this latter point.

A few days ago a telegram went out of a group meeting in Chicago, which only one or two governors were able in person to attend, but which in substantial numbers was attended by their authenticated representatives. A telegram went out of that group meeting addressed to the President of the United States, praying for ratification of this treaty at the present session and signed by the following chief executives:

William A. Comstock, Governor of Michigan; Alfred M. Landon, Governor of Kansas; George White, Governor of Ohio; A. G. Schmedeman, Governor of Wisconsin; Floyd B. Olson, Governor of Minnesota; Clyde L. Herring, Governor of Iowa; William Langer, Governor of North Dakota; Paul V. McNutt, Governor of Indiana; I. C. Blackwood, Governor of South Carolina; James Rolph, Jr., Governor of California; Charles W. Bryan, Governor of Nebraska; C. Ben Ross, Governor of Idaho; F. H. Cooney, Governor of Montana.

I submit that this of itself is a formidable challenge to the attention of the Senate. I want to read the telegram which was sent back to that conference from the White House, a message signed by Stephen Early, assistant secretary to the President:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D.C., May 16, 1933.

To A. O. MOREAUX,
Chairman Executive Committee,
Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association,
Stevens Hotel, Chicago:

The President requests acknowledgment with thanks assurances your whole-hearted cooperation bring St. Lawrence Treaty to fulfillment by ratification. Only crushing pressure business prevents the President extending personal greetings your gathering and wishing your movement complete, certain success.

STEPHEN EARLY,
Assistant Secretary to the President.

That is the last word we have on this subject from the White House. It is dated May 16, 1933, and it says to those who plead for the ratification of this treaty at this session of the Congress that the President of the United States wishes this movement "complete, certain success." I hope he will say it to the Senate itself in that same conclusive fashion, which always brings results when he wants results.

It is a national undertaking, just as truly as was the Panama Canal. I beg of Senators to view it in this broad light. A provincial or parochial decision on a project of this far-flung magnitude would be a reflection upon our willingness and our ability to think in terms of a united America.

I beg of Senators also to understand, at the outset, that it is a thoroughly practical undertaking which has the warrant of the most searching preliminary inquiries ever addressed to a project of this character. No enterprise ever came to the Senate with more formidable credentials. Fair play and truth will decline to permit it to be self-servingly scorned as an unsound fantasy. It is inevitable that differences of opinion should exist in respect to so gigantic a contemplation. But that it should be derided as an impracticable and sterile aspiration would belie the facts. The seaway has the unqualified approval of every public inquiry which has put it under a decade of scrutiny. The facts and all official authority are on its side.

First an International Joint Commission, existing by virtue of the treaty of 1909, held protracted hearings on both sides of the international boundary, from Boston to Calgary, and reported to the Congress in 1922. The report was an enthusiastic recommendation that Canada and the United States should proceed to develop this St. Lawrence seaway. The report stamped the project, without qualification, as economically practicable and as sure of a traffic sufficient "to justify the expense involved."

Mr. President, the chief official of the International Joint Commission at that time was the Honorable Obadiah Gardner, of the State of Maine, previously an honored Member of this body. I wondered the other day whether ex-Senator Gardner had changed his mind with respect to this convincing report which he signed as one of the officials sponsors; so, in company with my able friend the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], we addressed a telegram to Mr. Gardner and asked him whether he had changed his mind; whether he did not still think that New England had a stake in this proposition quite as great even as the stake of the Middle West. I quote from a telegram of May 23 from ex-Senator Gardner, who, I remind you again, was chairman of this initial International Joint Commission:

Am more firmly convinced than ever of the great economic benefit to this country as a whole by the development of the St. Lawrence waterway as projected. I know of no other contemplated project which in my judgment would result in as great a benefit to the people of the United States.

I commend that testimony to those Senators from New England who are willing to give an open-minded, fair consideration to this tremendous opportunity for the advantage of the Nation.

After this International Commission had done its work, a special commission was ordained to study further into this prospectus. It was headed on the American side by Herbert Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce; and on the Canadian side by George P. Graham, then Dominion Minister of Railways and Canals. The Commission had the advice of the most eminent engineers and economists in the New World. It reported to the Congress in 1926. The report contained the plans and estimates upon which it is contemplated that we shall now proceed. I particularly ask the Senate's attention to the following brief summary in the Commission's report:

The conclusions of this Commission are therefore:

First. The construction of the shipway from the Great Lakes to the sea is imperative—both for the relief and for the future development of a vast area in the interior of the continent.

Second. The shipway should be constructed on the St. Lawrence route, provided suitable agreement can be made for its joint undertaking with the Dominion of Canada.

Third. That the development of the power resources of the St. Lawrence should be undertaken by appropriate agencies.

Fourth. That negotiations should be entered into with Canada in an endeavor to arrive at agreement upon all these subjects. In such negotiations the United States should recognize the proper relations of New York to the power development in the international section.

Mr. President, I stand upon those conclusions which rest for their validity upon the best and surest engineering and economic talent in North America. Pursuant to these conclusions, negotiations proceeded as rapidly as possible to bring Canada and the United States into agreement upon a contract of construction. These negotiations speeded up in 1931. Our State Department, acting particularly through American Minister MacNider and through Assistant Secretary James Grafton Rogers, and ably supported by ex-Senator Henry J. Allen, of Kansas, as special commissioner, concluded its agreement with representatives of the Dominion Government on July 18, 1932. President Hoover promptly submitted the proposed treaty to the Senate with his urgent recommendation that it be ratified. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee authorized a subcommittee, headed by the distinguished Senator from Idaho, Mr. BORAH, to open the entire subject to searching investigation. I had the honor to sit upon that subcommittee. It devoted many weeks to many witnesses. It finally recommended the treaty to the full committee, with a single reservation dealing with a purely domestic diversion problem in New York. The full committee thereupon recommended the treaty to the Senate. And thus we come to the present zero hour in the life of this magnificent aspiration. The Senate must decide whether the Government of the United States shall reject the fruition of these pregnant plans or whether the Government shall be released to develop one of the modern wonders of this modern world.

It is this international contract which now impends in treaty form. Frankly acknowledging my personal prejudice of many years' standing in favor of this objective, I propose now to summarize the case for the treaty, to assess the oppositions to it, and to submit my reasons for believing it would be a sad and tragic error to void this superb opportunity for the common weal. This is my incorrigible text: We of the mid-continent must reach the sea, and the achievement of this aim is everlastingly to the national advantage.

The first thing that Senators should realize is that when we speak of building the St. Lawrence seaway we are not talking about the new creation of a totally new and virgin water route. On the contrary, we are talking about the culmination of a transportation program long since initiated under the joint auspices of nature and of man. We are talking about the maximum utilization of investments and facilities long since created upon a grand scale. We are talking about an enterprise to link up and correlate a series of already existing waterways which must always have been intended to form a united route from the heart of the continent to the ocean. We are talking about creating a uniform depth of 27 feet in these interlocked and connecting lakes and river and channels—thus to admit 88 percent of all the cargo ships upon the oceans to commerce on the Lakes. In particular, we are talking about removing the last remaining major barrier to this continuity of water service, namely, the elimination of the St. Lawrence Rapids over a 48-mile so-called "international section" in the St. Lawrence River. The amazing thing is not that so much, but that so little remains to be done, and the still more amazing thing would be that, after approaching so near to the final goal, we should decline the culminating step. It would be wantonly unsound economy.

The truth of the matter is that both Canada and the United States, wittingly or otherwise, have been building this seaway piecemeal for many years. I refer, for example, to our locks at the Soo and to Canada's magnificent new Welland Canal. Now the time has come to put the pieces together. I repeat that the only major task remaining is in the "international section" where $275,000,000 of the total expenditure—and I shall refer to these expenditures in detail later—will be made upon two gigantic dams and their flanking locks. It is fair analogy to translate this remaining problem into a question which I put to Senators in all earnestness and candor. If we had a superb transcontinental highway 1,500 miles long, which had been painstakingly improved for all but a single, impassable stretch of 48 miles, how long would it take us to complete this final 48 miles and open the highway to use from end to end? What would we say of any legislative judgments which would shun so obvious a duty? The pending treaty asks a verdict in kindred common sense, and nothing else.

Senators should realize another important fundamental in thinking of this problem. We are proposing a seaway in fact as well as name. It is not a mere series of canals. It must not be confused with barge transportation. It is a seaway in all that this name implies. It is for ocean ships of 25 or 26 feet draft. They will use the seaway almost as freely as they use the sea itself. Over the distance of 1,677 miles from the head of Lake Superior to the Gulf of St. Lawrence there will be but 16 locks and only 40 miles of canal section. Do not overlook that fact, because it is a major one—only 40 miles of canal section out of a total of 1,677 miles. This means that 97 percent of the route is either open water or through channels no more restricted than the entrance channels to most of our ocean ports. The detention to a ship due to these locks and canals will not cause a delay of more than 12 hours in traveling time as compared with open water. There is not another inland prospectus for water-borne commerce to compare with this opportunity anywhere else on earth. The Senate's decision upon the pending treaty will determine whether, in America's name, this unprecedented opportunity shall be declined. I respectfully suggest that the relatively petty objections to the treaty, as we shall subsequently frankly meet them, be viewed in perspective against the background of this vision.

Perhaps the quickest and surest way to visualize the seaway, in its maximum stretch, is to imagine ourselves on an ocean vessel entering the mouth of the St. Lawrence River and bound for Duluth at the head of Lake Superior. In quick sketches the journey would proceed as follows:

Now you are about to take a journey the length of the proposed St. Lawrence seaway; and let us see what it would be.

1. Plain sailing in the river to Montreal. This stretch already has a mean depth of 30 feet, and Canada, on her own account, is making it 35 feet. Thus for 340 miles.

2. Three miles of canal around the Lachine Rapids. This canal is now 14 feet deep. It will become 27 feet in depth.

3. Now through deep Lake St. Louis for a distance of about 16 miles.

4. Fifteen miles through the Beauharnois Channel, where nearly three fourths of the route already has a 27-foot depth.

5. Twenty-six miles through Lake St. Francis.

6. Down the 48-mile international section, where there will be 27-foot channels flanking two of the largest dams in the world, with three 30-foot locks and 8 miles of canals. This is the major link to be wrought within the purview of the treaty.

7. Emerge at the source of the St. Lawrence River, where its waters pour down out of the Great Lakes among the picturesque and famous Thousand Islands. Here the United States already has practically completed a 27-foot channel 67 miles long.

8. Lake Ontario.

9. Through the magnificent new Welland Canal, 25 miles long and 27 feet deep, which Canada has completed at her own expense. The cost was $128,000,000. No finer canal exists on earth. It has seven lift locks 820 feet long, 80 feet wide, and 30 feet deep.

10. Lake Erie.

11. Up the Detroit and St. Clair Rivers and through Lake St. Clair. Here the United States is now completing the deepening of connecting channels to 27 feet.

12. Lake Huron.

13. Chicago traffic, or Michigan's west-shore traffic, now turns through the Straits of Mackinac and into Lake Michigan. Duluth traffic proceeds on through the St. Marys River and the Soo locks. The United States will deepen the river 2 additional feet and build new 30-foot locks at the Soo. These Soo locks already handle twice as much tonnage in a normal year as Panama, Suez, and Manchester combined.

14. Lake Superior.

I want to linger on that statement for a moment, for the benefit of those who seem to think or fear that perhaps there cannot be developed in these inland waters a sufficient commerce to justify this aspiration that would join us with the sea. I say to you again that now, within a restricted calendar, twice the commerce passes through the locks at the Soo that passes through the locks of the Pamana Canal, the Suez Canal, and the Manchester Canal combined.

We are not dealing merely in an idle dream for tomorrow. We are dealing in the development and the further promotion of a great institution of transportation which already has challenged the admiration of the world.

Such is the seaway. Of the entire distance which a ship will have traveled when the waterway is completed, all but 286 miles is already open on seaway specifications; or, if the destination is Chicago, all but 211 miles. Of these remaining distances, as previously stated, only the 48 miles of the international section present a major engineering and fiscal problem.

This, then, is the undertaking to which the Governments of Canada and the United States have pledged their faith. It is the sort of thing which appeals to the imagination of brave peoples. It is the sort of thing which justifies governments and serves nations. It is the contemplation now waiting for a Senate verdict.

Such an enterprise, no matter how romantic, cannot justify itself however—particularly in these days of economic realism—by a mere appeal to the imagination, although I should dislike to rob it of its colorful perspective and confine its assessment exclusively to the mathematics of commerce. But this commercial justification must tangibly exist, and I shall presently deal with this commercial phase in respect to transportation. Meanwhile, however, while we are getting our initial grasp of the magnitude and the romance—yes; and the commerce—of this great enterprise, it is advisable also to realize that the seaway deals not alone in transportation but also in hydroelectric energy upon an equally grand scale. It is not only a gigantic navigation project. It is equally a gigantic power project. It contemplates the development of 2,200,000 horsepower of electricity in the so-called "international section" where the St. Lawrence River drops 92 feet in 48 miles. Half of this power, which exceeds Hoover Dam and Muscle Shoals combined, will come to the United States and will be delivered to the Power Authority of the State of New York in return for New York's payment of that portion of the total cost of the enterprise which is properly allocatable to power. This share of power is 1,100,000 horsepower, and the allocatable cost has been tentatively agreed upon between the War Department Board of Engineers and the Power Authority of the State of New York as $89,000,000. Congress subsequently will govern the contract which will be made upon this score.

Suffice it to say at the moment that this new and expectedly cheap power will be quite as great a benediction upon New York and New England as this new transportation facility will be to the mid-continent. It will be developed in the heart of the busiest industrial section of the United States. It is eagerly desired by the Power Authority of the State of New York, which unreservedly recommends the ratification of the pending treaty. It represents 6,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity per year—a power equal to nearly half the total amount of power used in the State of New York in 1929. This natural resource now runs to waste. It can be harnessed only by international agreement with our neighbor to the north. Here is the treaty which achieves this end. It is for the Senate to determine whether the waste shall end and whether these waters hereafter shall labor for mankind.

It is well known that I am not an advocate of Government in business. But, Mr. President, when so stupendous a public power project invites fruition as a by-product of an equally stupendous navigation project, I submit that the dual challenge permits but one rational answer. To reject nature's bounty under such auspices would appear to me as social and economic sabotage.

I said that New York State will pay $89,000,000 for this power. As I understand the mathematics, this is the total cost of all works exclusively chargeable to power and half the cost of the works that serve both power and navigation. The Government of the United States is accordingly relieved of $89,000,000 of the total treaty project cost.

The total treaty project cost, based upon unit costs in 1926, will be $270,976,000 for Canada and $272,453,000 for the United States. But a portion of the latter cost, which represents a multitude of links in the chain, is already appropriated for work that is either completed or is now under way in connection with our own regular rivers and harbors program. The principal credit accruing to the United States attaches to work prosecuted by us in the waters connecting Lakes Superior and Huron and Lakes Huron and Erie, while the principal Canadian credit involves Canada's expenditure of $128,000,000 on her magnificent new Welland Canal which was built on seaway specifications.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, if the Senator wants to yield, I was just going to ask the Senator, if he would permit, this question: I believe he stated that there would be $89,000,000 coming from New York State. I desire to ask whether that is not a cheap price for New York to get for its port?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan has made request of the Senate, particularly of us who oppose this treaty, that he be not interrupted, and I am sure the able Senator from Louisiana did not understand the request. I ask that the Senator from Michigan be not interrupted.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I should be glad to be interrupted at any time after I shall have completed an affirmative presentation of the case. Before I have finished, I will submit to the Senate a complete answer to every bit of misinformation that has been submitted by the senior Senator from Louisiana upon this proposition.

Mr. President, I was speaking of the cost to the United States of this undertaking. Without stopping for details, which are all set out voluminously in the hearings, we finally reach a net cost figure of $221,000,000 over a period of 7 years, according to General Pillsbury, Assistant Chief of Engineers. This does not include accrued interest during construction if the project shall be funded as was the Panama Canal. But Colonel Markham, division engineer for the Great Lakes Division, declares that construction undertaken at present prices will more than underrun the 1926 estimates to the extent of absorbing any such carrying charges during construction.

It may be advisable at this point to advert to some of the fantastically higher estimates of cost which have been submitted by other and external engineers in support of criticism against the seaway. General Pillsbury's testimony demolished all of them. He stood upon the proposition that the seaway can be built well within the official estimates, significantly pointing out that the $29,000,000 project for deepening connecting channels between the Great Lakes—part of this whole prospectus which is already under way—will be completed for less than two thirds of the estimate. Meanwhile Colonel Markham committed himself to the following unequivocal statement at the hearings:

> As the matter stands today, I regard the estimates as being very greatly in excess of what will be the likely cost of that improvement if undertaken during the period of conditions such as obtain today or at anywhere moderately up the incline.

This could lead one to observe that one of the persuasive reasons why the seaway should be started at once is that present price levels are lower than they are calculated to be a few years hence, and that the launching of these tremendous construction projects will provide one of the greatest possible reservoirs of work for the unemployed.

Our total cost figure, to recapitulate, is $221,000,000. There is no question about it, unless we want to impeach our own rivers and harbors engineers, and our own War Department. There is no color of fact to support the constantly reiterated nonsense submitted by the senior Senator from Louisiana to the end that this is a $600,000,000 project, so far as the people of the United States are concerned. It is nothing of the sort, by any color of calculation that can be justified.

I repeat, our total cost figure is $221,000,000. The power offset is $89,000,000. The ultimate Federal investment thus does not exceed $132,000,000. The calculations reported by the late Senator Walsh put the figure at $125,000,000; $125,000,000 for this great adventure, less than we are proposing to spend to plant saplings. We are asking for less than is proposed to dedicate and plant saplings during the next 12 months, in order to unlock 40,000,000 people in the midcontinent of this Nation, give them fair and adequate and equitable access to the sea. If paid out of pocket in the course of the 7 years estimated to complete the work, the annual pro prata cost would be about $18,000,000. No fantastic $600,000,000 estimate; on the contrary, an estimate of between eighteen and twenty million dollars a year for 7 years. Let that figure challenge the attention of the Senate; instead of thinking prejudicially in terms of a staggering burden upon the Treasury, let us think of this adventure in terms of annual reality. Eighteen millions. Eighteen million dollars a year, for 7 years, to complete the greatest waterway on earth. The St. Lawrence was "the river that has no end", as it was described by the Indians to Jacques Cartier when he first sailed into the Straits of Belle Isle in the summer of 1534. "The river that has no end" of golden possibilities under the prospectus conjured by this pending treaty—at a price of $18,000,000 for 7 years. Unlock the American midcontinent. Join the oceans and the Lakes. Set seaports in the heart of the Nation. Endow agriculture and industry with new outlets to the markets of the earth. Eighteen million dollars. The bargain of the ages. Nothing like it has been offered to the Senate in modern times.

Some Senators may think I deal in hyperbole. But facts are available to justify this apostrophe. International commissions have not been in a perpetual trance when they have planned this undertaking. Presidents have not ignored realities. Twenty-three States and 40,000,000 people have not been dreaming idle dreams. Economists and engineers have not surrendered to a myth. The Senate's committee, which heard the case argued at exhaustive length, did not grasp a shadow and avoid the substance. On the contrary, proofs abound to verify the faith which impels those of us—both American and Canadian—who urge that this pending treaty contemplates a project incalculably worth while. I earnestly urge the Senate's open-minded attention to a few of these specific considerations. The printed hearings abound in kindred details.

The seaway, of course, must be susceptible of actual profitable use if it shall justify itself. We built the Panama Canal primarily as a national-defense measure for the purpose of making one fleet mobile in two oceans. Although little has been said about this phase, the new St. Lawrence seaway would itself have a great defense value. At least Mr. Julius Barnes, former president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and in a position of large executive responsibility in respect of food during the World War, recently told our Senate Foreign Relations Committee: "It is my profound conviction that if we had only had the seaway, America's part in the war would have been much simplified"—with particular reference to food blockades. In this connection, also, it should be noted that the fact of international auspices for the seaway would not delimit its defense utility, because the pending treaty gives us irrevocable right of navigation through its Canadian sections. The only jeopardy to this right would be in the event that the United States and Great Britain and Canada were directly at war with each other. But in that event our border waters would be unnavigable—treaty or no treaty. Furthermore, anyone who can imagine a war between these two English-speaking peoples across the American-Canadian border has imagination enough to envision the end of civilization. The seaway will be just one more tie of Canadian-American fraternity to help make this war calamity still more remote along 3,000 miles of boundary upon which there is not a single fort or gun.

But this sort of utility alone is not enough. Critics of the seaway have a right to demand proofs of its specific commercial utility. Happily such proofs are amply available. Total tonnage available for the seaway is variously estimated. Dr. Moulton, an opponent, admits 10,500,000 tons. Dr. MacElwee, a proponent, says 20,000,000 tons. Mr. Alfred H. Ritter, transportation specialist of the United States Government, says 30,000,000 tons. The United States Department of Commerce says an average of 21,000,000 tons. The grand average of all these estimates is 20,000,000 tons. This is only 30 percent less than Panama in its present development. Such a prospect is unanswerably worth while. The ultimate use may be more, because these Great Lakes will be open to 88 percent of all the cargo ships in all the world; and, again quoting Julius Barnes:

> History shows that transportation projects were always used to a far greater extent than could be foreseen ahead of time.

But even tonnage of itself is not a justification. It must be carried at a substantial economy under existing facilities. Here again the proofs are thrilling. For example, an automobile traffic expert from Detroit has told our Senate committee that, based on the previous 5-year average we could expect 375,000 cars to be annually exported via the seaway, at a transportation saving of at least $22.50 per car; that an additional saving of $20 per car can be effected by eliminating crating and instead driving the cars on shipboard at Detroit; that these two items alone respecting this one commodity represent nearly $15,000,000 per annum; and that it will be the greatest single factor in expanding or recapturing our export trade. This is but one industrial commodity out of many. My own State of Michigan has been the fourth largest exporting State in the Union, despite the fact that it is a thousand miles from the sea. Since water transportation axiomatically is 10 times cheaper than rail transportation, this new facility for exports cannot fail to be an incalculable boon. The motor exhibit but typifies the general opportunity.

South Haven, Mich., has had 56 foreign ships of less than 14-foot draft in its harbor during 1932. Despite the difficulty of negotiating all existing St. Lawrence shallow channels, these little tramps have brought in 64,000 tons of pulp or kaolin this past season, at a proven saving of from $1.50 to $2 per ton over use of an Atlantic port. This has not only helped the port of South Haven; it has equally helped the paper industry in the Kalamazoo Valley. The saving would be substantially larger if larger and more economical ships use the new seaway. The point is that the potential trade does exist and so do the potential traffic savings.

There is not only great opportunity in transoceanic trade; there is equal opportunity in intercoastal trade. It now costs $1.72 to send a motor engine by rail from Muskegon to San Francisco. The cost via St. Lawrence seaway is estimated at 86.8 cents. It costs $325 to bring a car of canned fruit from California to Michigan. The cost via seaway is estimated at $240. The saving on Pacific coast lumber into Michigan—and we bring in 80 percent of our consumption from the outside—is estimated at from $6 to $8 per thousand feet. There are 55,000 tons of butter, cheese, eggs, and dressed poultry sent from the agricultural Northwest to three main Atlantic ports annually at a transportation cost of $19.50 per ton, as compared with an estimated $12 via the prospective seaway—a saving in one casual item of more than $400,000.

These are random exhibits. They could be multiplied indefinitely. But they suffice to personify the prospectus. The hearings are full of them, and anybody who suggests we are proceeding in the absence of adequate economic surveys, I submit, simply has not familiarized himself with the available official literature. I repeat that these exhibits could be multiplied indefinitely, but the ones referred to suffice to personify the prospectus. As a matter of fact, all of the imports consumed in the midcontinent and now necessarily transshipped from the seaboard could come into our Great Lakes ports direct, and all of the exports originating in the midcontinent could leave from our own wharves. I do not speak literally when I say "all." But I speak of such tremendous potentialities that even a small average of actual traffic diversion through the new seaway would be of vast value—and the prospective trade is reciprocal, which is to say that it offers shiploads both in and out.

Mr. President, the States directly tributary to the seaway account for 44 percent of our meat exports, 18 percent of our wheat-flour exports, 42 percent of our export in farm machinery, and 17 percent of our export in iron and steel sheets. These same States account for 65 percent of all the crude rubber brought into the United States, one third of all the coffee and tea, and 60 percent of Canadian pulp products. A careful study a few years ago showed that 38 percent of all our exports and 24 percent of all our imports may be termed potential traffic for the seaway route.

The greatest potential export crop of all to be served by the seaway is grain from the land-locked Northwest, which is demanding ratification of the pending treaty on the plea that it is the only export hope for this vast granary. There is no place in the world except America's interior where an heretofore prosperous agriculture has existed 1,500 miles from the sea. Russia raises wheat, but the port of Odessa is only 300 miles from her concentrated wheat-producing area. Rumanian wheat fields are 200 miles from Constanza. Argentine centers of agricultural production are only 300 miles from Buenos Aires, Rosario, and Bahia Blanca. Our own American granary can no longer survive against the handicap of its land-locked location. The greatest of all practical farm relief measures is to put the seaway at the disposition of the midcontinent's land-locked surpluses.

Much is made by seaway opponents of the fact that under existing distress water rates it is possible to ship a bushel of grain from the lakehead at Duluth to Liverpool for 8 cents a bushel; and they argue, plausibly, that the seaway certainly cannot cut from 6 to 10 cents a bushel from this contemporary 8-cent rate. But this contemporary rate is one of the transient byproducts of these fatefully depressionistic times. Ship operators frankly testify that the ships soon must cease to operate if these cutthroat rates persist. Any such rates, as a permanent thing, are possible only in larger ships which make unbroken transit. In other words, they are possible only when such a facility as the St. Lawrence seaway is provided. This is the significant fact. The average cost for 7 years from 1924 to 1931 to handle grain between Duluth and Liverpool via Montreal was 16.2 cents. The average cost via New York was 16.83 cents. The average all-rail cost to New York and thence by water was 28.97 cents. These averages are the appropriate criterion for comparisons. They are not peaks; they are not valleys; they are averages. Against these averages it is correctly estimated that the seaway will normally save from 6 to 10 cents a bushel in grain-carrying charges from Duluth to Liverpool or from Chicago to Liverpool. The estimate of the Department of Commerce is 6½ cents. The estimate of Mr. F. S. Keiser, traffic manager for the Duluth Board of Trade, is a minimum of 8 cents. The grain thus available for export via the St. Lawrence is estimated by the Department of Commerce at 96,000,000 bushels annually. Even the hostile Dr. Moulton, the chief economist in opposition, estimates a saving of $5,000,000 annually upon this one score—and it is a sum of money poured into the pocketbook of American agriculture. Upon the basis of this and kindred scores, I have heard the late Senator Walsh, of Montana—a man not easily misled—repeatedly exclaim that the completion of the seaway is the greatest and most practical "farm relief" upon which America can embark.

There are hundreds of pages of testimony supporting the utility of the seaway in the record made last December by the Senate committee and in the voluminous economic surveys theretofore concluded. The prospective benefits are enormous and are easily identified in countless different directions. Modern industry develops on cheap transportation lanes. Otherwise it cannot permanently meet modern competition. When the midcontinent is joined at tidewater with the Atlantic Ocean, it at last becomes eligible for the most highly competitive industrial development to serve both foreign and domestic markets. The seaway will feed this development, and the development in turn will feed the seaway. All of these movements contribute to the sum total of national prosperity, because we are an integrated Union and a stimulus to one member is a stimulus to all.

This is peculiarly true when it is enhanced export trade that wins this stimulus. I want to iterate and reiterate that the export factor is of particular importance, especially at a moment when we universally recognize the need for recaptured world trade. The International Joint Commission discussed this phase in its initial report from which I quote the following significant paragraph:

> The conclusion is obvious that if countries that had for the most part to import their raw materials from abroad were able to build up a great foreign trade because of their ready access to the sea, the region economically tributary to the Great Lakes, with its limitless resources, its raw materials within easy reach, its facilities for industrial expansion, can hardly fail to become an even greater factor in the world's markets than it is today, if given a practicable and efficient water route to the sea.

We are not dealing in idle dreams. We are dealing in conclusions urged upon us by the best available engineers and economists in both the United States and Canada. Let me trespass upon your attention, even at the risk of repetition, with a paragraph from the recommendations of the Department of Commerce:

> In the Midwest, the territory tributary to any of these projects, the economic situation is considerably distorted; there is much agricultural distress and incessant demands for remedial legislation. This situation to a large extent has been brought about by transportation changes. Increases in railway rates since the war force the Midwest farmer to pay from 6 to 12 cents more per bushel to reach world markets than before the war. Foreign farmers produce close to ocean ports and pay but little, if any, more than pre-war costs, because shipping rates are substantially at pre-war levels. While it is true that these rate increases apply only on the exports of grain, nevertheless the price which the farmer receives in foreign markets is the principal factor in determining his return upon the whole crop, not alone the export balance. It is this transportation differential that is, unquestionably, one of the most important causes for our present agricultural depression.

That final line is directly reminiscent of the conclusions of the late Senator Walsh, to which I have previously adverted. Here is another important paragraph from that same report of the Department of Commerce. Speaking of modern transportation developments, the Department says:

> All of these influences have had a very far-reaching effect, certain classes of industry have migrated to the seaboard, agriculture has been greatly depressed, and through the increasing separation of agriculture and manufacture both have been affected adversely. The net result has been to accentuate one of our present-day evils—the concentration of industry and population in urban communities.
> The waterway project under consideration offers a measure of relief for these conditions. Transportation has brought about economic distortion; in the proposed waterway we have an instrument which will have a beneficial effect and tend largely to restore the former satisfactory economic situation. The Panama Canal cannot be closed, the railroad rates cannot be reduced without impairing disastrously the usefulness of our carriers, but a Great Lakes-to-the-ocean waterway offers the Midwest a substantial rate advantage which will enable it to compete successfully once more in the world markets.

I beg of Senators to get the full impact of that last line: the Mid West can compete successfully once more in the world markets. Is not that an economic aspiration to which the Nation is prayerfully committed? Will not its achievement bring diffused dividends to all our people? Yes; and even to our railroads, which will be fed by the collateral traffic which this new trade will engender.

Former Gov. J. P. Goodrich, of Indiana, was one of the many persuasive witnesses urging this viewpoint on the committee.

Without reading, I ask that a brief quotation from his testimony may be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The quotation referred to is as follows:

> We believe that the opening up of this waterway will greatly facilitate the growth of industry in our State, and we are looking forward to the time when we are to have a balanced production, enough industry, and men working in factories and offices to consume the products of the farms, which would be, from my viewpoint, an ideal situation. We know that the opening of this waterway will greatly aid our manufacturers in exporting their products. We are not guessing at it. There was a shipload of automobiles sent out of South Bend to the South American trade last year. It went out in a ship that brought into Michigan City in the north end of our State, about 7 miles from South Bend, some clay products that we need in manufacturing; and it saved in freight $25 on each automobile shipped, besides the facility of handling. It avoided the expense of crating and of storage charges in New York and other expensive terminal charges in that city. We were able to load them at Michigan City and send them to their destination.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, testimony available upon this score is a veritable encyclopedia. It is by no means confined to the immediate midcontinent benefits. Let me quote but one more authority in respect to what this treaty holds for New England. The spokesman is Henry I. Harriman, formerly president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, now president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. Mr. Harriman's benediction upon this seaway and this treaty is as follows:

> I am convinced that the St. Lawrence seaway is of as great importance to New England as to the Middle West, and that New England should unitedly, heartily, and enthusiastically support the project.
> The seaway means to New England—
> 1. Lower transportation costs on much of its food supply, hence a lower cost of living;
> 2. Lower freight rates on many of the raw materials required by its industries;
> 3. Lower freight rates to many markets for its finished products.
> 4. A supply of export grain and flour at prices as low or lower than can prevail in other North Atlantic ports, hence a revival in the export business of the port of Boston and other New England ports;
> 5. The removal of the handicap of rail differentials due to water competition via the St. Lawrence; and
> 6. A reasonable supply of cheap power.

Those are not my conclusions respecting the benefits for New England inherent in this project; that is the testimony of one of the most seasoned and dependable business leaders of New England itself.

I shall not weary the Senate with all the available repetition of these cogent exhibits. There never was a more complete and exhaustive survey made of any project than that which Dr. Roy S. MacElwee, internationally famous expert, made for the Senate's committee and submitted in convincing detail. It is printed in full in the hearings. Senators who retain lingering doubts respecting the utility or the practicality of the seaway owe it to themselves and the welfare of their country to read Dr. MacElwee. They owe it to candor and to the justice of the verdict which the Senate will return in respect to this pending treaty. They owe it to themselves to escape the status of an earlier statesman who, when the first Soo Canal was projected, contemptuously ridiculed the project, saying that it "would serve in the future as an objective to which the Ojibway Indians would paddle down in their canoes to gaze upon the utter folly of the white man." That was the same Soo Canal which now passes twice as much tonnage in an average year as Panama, Suez, and Manchester combined. That was the same Soo Canal which is a major link in the chain of the projected seaway. The "folly" was that of the statesman who declined to look ahead. May history acquit the statesmen of 1933 of kindred flaw.

One further affirmative contemplation is worth passing emphasis. The new water route from the mouth of the St. Lawrence to the seaway terminii, whether at Duluth or Chicago, will be one of the most interesting and unique and spectacular excursion journeys for summer tourists in all the world. There is no more colorful water journey anywhere on earth. Substantial tourist passenger traffic is inevitable. This particular section of the mid-continent is the summer playground of the Nation. Here will be a new and vital feeder to this tourist trade, even as it will contribute to the usefulness of the seaway itself, and to the pleasure and the recreation of our people.

Now, Mr. President, I want to deal with the main body of the opposition to this treaty and this seaway. Already we have pursued its economic phases pro and con. Already we have resolved all doubts respecting the economic utility involved. We have found the estimates of cost reliable. With these prior criticisms dismissed, I want now to search the question whether the main body of the opposition—the real sources of hostility—are of a substance entitled to weigh against the need and the anxiety of the mid-continent to reach the sea and the markets of the earth. Some of this opposition is local. A little of it is sectional. A portion is vocational. None of it, I venture to assert, can claim for itself any such well-nigh national aspect as pleads for the project's support. Some of it is skeptical. Much of it capitalizes relatively casual considerations—perhaps, occasionally, through unwillingness or inability to meet the real issue face to face. None of it, I shall undertake to prove, is entitled to preponderate.

I claim no monopoly either of good faith or of wisdom in behalf of those who urge this undertaking. In some instances there are solid and well-buttressed adverse arguments, which, however, invariably fall before the whole truth and the full facts. Indeed, I am persuaded that if most of those persons who have been led to believe they are opposed to the seaway could have sat with the subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee and heard all the witnesses and confronted all the realities, they would hesitate a long time before taking the responsibility for a hostile commitment. I beg of any Senator who finds his inclinations running in an adverse current to study these hearings. They convinced the distinguished chairman of our committee, the able senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I think I am entitled to say, and convinced him against an initial adverse prejudice. I am content to believe that they will have a kindred authority with any judicially minded student.

Let me hastily sketch some of the lesser arguments in opposition and indicate how readily they surrender to proved facts.

There are, for example, the physical aspects of the St. Lawrence route. It is said that the route is ice-bound 5 months in every year, and therefore is impractical. The answer is that the major contemplated traffic is already similarly seasonal or can readily be made so by regimented commodity production. A further answer is that despite this same winter handicap the Great Lakes already have developed a traffic which represents 35 percent of all the water-borne commerce that travels under the American flag. Evidently this particular complaint is more fancied than real.

But it is said the St. Lawrence is fog-bound so much of the time that navigation is hazardous and the lane therefore is impractical. One answer is that Montreal has but 100 fog-hours per year and Toronto has but 440 fog-hours per year, and the Detroit River has but 311 fog-hours per year; whereas the great and successful port of New York has an average of 1,064 fog-hours per year. The truth of the matter is that there are no serious physical handicaps attendant upon the route, and most experienced navigators agree upon this score.

It is said, nevertheless, that ships and shipping will not regularly penetrate this route. The first answer is that world trade already is limping past the barriers to a free contact between the Lakes and tidewater. Ships of shallow draft already, despite all handicaps, are pioneering this full journey, and with profit to all concerned. The second answer is that ship operators frankly look forward to this unfolding opportunity. For instance, the dean of American ship operators, the late Robert Dollar, for whom my able and distinguished friend from New York [Mr. COPELAND] joins me in the utmost respect—at one time a lumberman in upper Michigan—wrote before his death as follows:

> You ask whether ocean-going ships would be willing to go to the upper Lakes for cargo. I can answer you without fear of contradiction by saying that ships will certainly go to the Lakes for cargo; in fact, ships will go anywhere and everywhere to get cargo. We have big ocean-going steamers running 1,000 miles up the Yangtze River, where the current is very swift and navigation quite difficult, far more difficult than it would be going to Lake Superior from Montreal. Bulk cargoes would be available on the Lakes and of the kind that would attract shipping. There is no question that full cargoes of general merchandise would also be obtained going inward.

It is said that these inward-bound cargoes represent a facilitation of imports and, therefore, a hazard to protected American industry. One answer is that much of the anticipated traffic will be in noncompetitive imports. The other answer is that competitive imports will be governed by protective tariffs; and these tariffs can always be made adequate.

It is difficult to meet both attacks at the same time, one that there is not going to be enough traffic to justify the seaway and the other that there is going to be so much traffic that it will destroy our internal domestic trade.

Then, Mr. President, there is another group of opponents who speak largely out of fear that the seaway will dislocate and divert existing port business and thus work to the disadvantage of existing eastern port facilities. This, undoubtedly, is a thoroughly human viewpoint. Yet it scarcely should be entitled to dominate our attitudes. There are the Buffalo grain and ship interests, for example, which fear a loss of their business if traffic no longer needs to break cargo at this port in seeking access to the ocean. But even at this key point it is to be noted that one witness, himself a man of large Buffalo interests and a lifelong ship and elevator operator, told our committee that Buffalo is bound to more than compensate itself from collateral trade development. Furthermore, this same witness—Hon. James Davidson—speaking as the operator of many ships belonging to the Lake Carriers Association, flatly disputed the protests from these present carriers on the Lakes that this new competition would ruin their existing operations.

Numerous port authorities along the Atlantic seaboard have frankly voiced a fear that their cities and their ports will seriously suffer if the mid-continent docks its imports at its own Great Lakes wharves and sends forth its direct exports on the return voyages of the ocean-cargo ships which will invade the Lakes. I doubt whether, upon reflection, our fellow citizens upon the seaboard would insist upon this attitude, if they be otherwise convinced that the seaway is nationally worth while. I do not believe they would offer us this adverse reciprocity in return for all the years of uncomplaining contribution which the land-locked mid-continent has made to the seaboard's development. I reject the notion that they are thus selfishly provincial.

As a matter of fact, there will be ample offsets for these seaboard cities through increased coastwise trade which will be builded up between the Lakes and these ocean ports. There will be offsets through the generally increased mid-continent prosperity which always pays its full share of toll to the industrial and financial East. There will be replacement offsets through the natural growth of these eastern ports in the 7 years which the construction of the seaway will require. But even if there were no offsets, it would be entirely unthinkable that there should be seaboard hostility to midcontinent development after the midcontinent has been so prodigal in contributing to seaboard development throughout the years, contributing not alone in trade and traffic but contributing also in the tax funds which have made these proud Atlantic seaports possible.

We have not complained over the years about paying our share of $53,000,000 to make a seaport of Philadelphia, which is 101 miles inland, or our share of $35,000,000 to make a seaport out of New Orleans, which is 110 miles inland, or our share of 58 million Federal dollars put into New York Harbor?

We do not complain, nor have we had any complaint against our share of $102,000,000 spent upon navigation projects on the Mississippi River or our share of $219,000,000 of flood-control projects on the Mississippi River. But I submit that we do have a right to complain when the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] arose, as he did on May 3, interrupting the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], and submitted this astounding proposition in selfishness to the Senate—and I quote from page 2792 of the RECORD:

> But here my friend from Ohio and I are both living in the Mississippi Valley, and naturally I felt if there was any money outside of the Budget or within the Budget that was going to be spent it should be spent to develop the Mississippi Valley, the Ohio River, and the Mississippi River.

Mr. President, I submit again that we are making our vast contribution to this great development in the Mississippi Valley and we are making it not only without complaint but we are making it readily and gladly. When the time comes for a reciprocity of consideration, I submit that we are entitled to have it.

Is it rational that the theory of national contribution should cease at the first moment when we are in a position to get ocean reciprocity? We have not complained that a total of $1,586,514,586 should have been spent by the Federal Government up to June 30, 1931, on water-transportation projects other than the Great Lakes, while simultaneously only $194,000,000 has gone into Great Lakes harbors and channels—only 11 percent of the appropriations for the Great Lakes, although the Great Lakes carry 35 percent of all the water-borne commerce under the American flag. We have been glad to bide our time. But our time has now arrived. Certainly it has arrived, when for less than half the sum spent by the Government in seacoast harbors and channels we can create a new seacoast status for the now land-locked American mid-continent. By "we" I mean some 20 States and some 40,000,000 people.

We did not complain against our share of the $400,000,000 expended upon the building of the Panama Canal. We gloried in its national advantages for the great common good. Yet we in the midcontinent actually have been savagely penalized by the Panama Canal, which has showered its economic advantages exclusively upon the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. For example, industries on each seacoast can ship to the opposite seacoast at rate advantages varying from 40 percent to 64 percent under rates available from Michigan to these same destinations. To reach the west coast from Michigan it actually is cheaper to ship goods by rail 800 miles east and thence by water through the Panama Canal than to ship them straight west by rail. Thus, obviously, the cost of the eastern rail haul measures the Michigan handicap compared with New York in reaching a western destination 800 miles nearer Michigan than New York. This prejudicial differential constantly and progressively increases. It is often insufferable. The entire mid-continent is proportionately affected. Both seaboards proportionately benefit. We helped pay for the Panama Canal, which thus bears down upon us in transportation handicaps. Is it possible that the coastal beneficiaries of that great development and our sacrifice shall successfully refuse us reciprocal cooperation now that our chance has come to put the mid-continent in kindred touch with the oceans? For the mid-continent this means not only an outlet to our own coasts and an equality of service from the Panama Canal; it also means cheaper and more direct transportation to other continents, and thus it means the most practical possible encouragement to more exports and more foreign trade.

Mr. President, I repeat that I decline to believe that Senators from States which know the priceless boon of direct tidewater contacts with the oceans and the markets of the world will vote to deny their less fortunate but equally deserving fellow citizens of the midcontinent this belated opportunity to reach the sea. Justice, sportsmanship, and fair play revolt against any such libel upon our common Americanism.

The next and perhaps the most formidable single source of opposition to the seaway and the treaty centers and then ramifies around Chicago, its drainage canal, its diversion of water from Lake Michigan, and its aspirations for the Lakes-to-the-Gulf barge canal, just now coming into completion. The complaint is: First, that the treaty recognizes and solidifies the 1930 decision of the United States Supreme Court and its order limiting diversion of water from Lake Michigan; second, that this diversion is insufficient for a commercially useful waterway in the Illinois Barge Canal; and, third, that these treaty limitations constitute not only a threat to this barge canal but also an actual surrender to Canada of sovereignty over the exclusively American waters of Lake Michigan.

I think I have correctly summarized the general complaint.

I desire to answer categorically (1) that the treaty's recognition of a United States Supreme Court decree can scarcely be the subject of appropriate or logical complaint in the United States, and that this recognition by Canada, on the other hand, is actually the first time that Canada has ever consented to any diversion of water at Chicago for any purpose whatever, and is therefore actually a step in advance from Chicago's viewpoint; (2) that the permitted diversion is ample, according to all official authorities, for a commercially useful Illinois waterway, as defined in Senate Document No. 126 of the Seventy-first Congress; and (3) that there is no alienation of sovereignty over Lake Michigan. In other words, I shall submit that there is no validity in this particular objection to the treaty. The treaty is not at war with the Illinois waterway, which, I may say, most of us heartily agree should be amply completed and amply utilized. I have supported it as a member of the Commerce Committee and as a Member of the Senate, and I shall continue to do so. But it does not need to interfere with the St. Lawrence Seaway, and it would be a gross perversion of logic and of relative values to permit it needlessly to estop the larger undertaking.

A swift sketch of the historical aspect of this Chicago diversion issue will facilitate the Senate's understanding of the problem. Suffice it to say that for three decades Chicago has been in combat, either with the Federal Government or with her neighbors in the other Lake States, over her artificial diversion of water from Lake Michigan, this being a diversion of water from one natural watershed to another. The diversion started as a means of reversing the natural flow of a river in order to dissipate Chicago's municipal sewage. The diversion has run as high as 10,000 cubic second-feet. At various times Chicago has clashed with the War Department in the latter's efforts to control this diversion. Repeatedly this diversion has been in the United States courts in an effort to control the diversion. For nearly 30 belligerent years Chicago has wanted more diversion, and reluctantly has been forced to be content with less. The controversy climaxed in a suit which the plaintiff Lake States of Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York took to the Supreme Court. These States claimed that there was no right of diversion from Lake Michigan; that they are entitled to have the natural level of the Lakes maintained; and that the lowering of the Lakes by unwarranted diversion was a hurt and injury to commerce thereon and to the property rights of those concerned. The Supreme Court rendered its decree on April 21, 1930. It found against the trespass by the Chicago Sanitary District. It laid out a progressive program under which Chicago should substitute modern sewage-disposal works and proportionately reduce its diversion as this substitute program is completed. On and after December 31, 1938, the State of Illinois and the sanitary district are enjoined from diverting in excess of an annual average of 1,500 cubic second-feet in addition to domestic pumpage.

The Supreme Court found—in the language of Mr. Justice Holmes—that—

> The defendant State and its creature, the sanitary district, were reducing the level of the Great Lakes, were inflicting great losses upon the complainants, and were violating their rights.

Then followed these cogent and conclusive sentences by Mr. Justice Holmes:

> It already has been decided that the defendants are doing a wrong to the complainants and that they must stop it. They must find out a way at their peril. We have only to consider what is possible if the State of Illinois devotes all its powers to dealing with an exigency to the magnitude of which it seems not yet to have fully awakened. If its constitution stands in the way of prompt action, it must amend it to yield to an authority that is paramount to the State.

This is Mr. Justice Holmes speaking.

Canada, during all these years, was reiterating, in diplomatic protests to Washington, her own claim of interest in these lake levels—and particularly the claim that since Lake Michigan and the border Lakes of Huron and Erie are at common level, any Chicago diversion from Lake Michigan was a trespass upon her well-recognized international rights. She protested, also, that any diversion from these common waters was a subtraction from the potential power which belonged to her in the St. Lawrence River.

In March 1912 the Canadian Government sent four representatives to Washington to oppose any proposal which would result in lowering the level of international boundary waters. In February 1913 a formal and substantial protest was forwarded through the British Ambassador. No protests were made during the war, but they were renewed in 1921, December 1923, and February 1924. Thus it was but the climax in consistency, from her viewpoint, when Canada set up a prerequisite demand for equitable protection against this jeopardy as the condition precedent to her agreement to a bilateral treaty respecting the development of the St. Lawrence.

Thus we reach the present issue. It has been agreed that the 1930 decree of the United States Supreme Court shall be the basic rule governing this moot diversion. Thus Canada consents to acknowledge a right of diversion at Chicago after 1938 of 1,500 cubic second-feet, plus domestic pumpage—the first time we have had Canadian consent to any diversion whatsoever. We, in turn, acknowledge the authority of our own highest judicial tribunal—which scarcely can be viewed as a revolutionary doctrine upon our part. But I particularly direct the Senate's attention to the emergency clause in this same connection. In the event of an emergency under which the United States proposes to increase the diversion of water from the Great Lakes system through the Chicago Drainage Canal, if Canada takes exception thereto, the matter shall be submitted for final decision to an arbitration which shall have the power to increase the diversion and to stipulate such compensating provisions as shall be just and equitable.

These are the provisions of the treaty. I submit they are just provisions. Behind them is the warrant of our own Supreme Court. Within them is latitude for unforeseen emergency. Such an emergency would exist, in my view, and in the announced view of our State Department, if, despite all good-faith efforts to comply with the Supreme Court's sewage construction program, Chicago should require a reasonable extension beyond 1938 in which to forego her larger use of water from Lake Michigan for sewage purposes. That use at present is 6,500 cubic second-feet, plus domestic pumpage. Such an emergency would exist if a commercially useful Illinois waterway, as defined in Senate Document No. 126, should unexpectedly fail on the basis of 1938 diversion, if good-faith efforts have been made to construct the waterway to operate upon this basis. The language in the treaty respecting an "emergency" is broader than any possible definition of an emergency could hope to be.

I desire to pause at that point and say to my able and highly respected friend, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] that I gave prayerful consideration to the possibility of writing some kind of a reservation which might cover this point more effectively; yet it came to be the common judgment of all those who were dealing with the problem that the general exemption as it now exists is broader and more effectual and more dependable than any reservation which we might write. It is reasonable and fair and adequate. Furthermore, let it constantly be borne in mind that any quarrel over additional diversion, in excess of the Supreme Court's limitations, would meet the renewed resistance of the other Lake States long before it would create an issue with Canada, unless the emergency were obvious and the extra diversion to meet it were patently justified.

We had a final adjudication the other day in the Supreme Court, and the Court again announced its conclusions in a rather significant way, and ordered the State of Illinois to underwrite the completion of this Chicago program in lieu of diversion. If there is any challenge in the future, if there is any dispute in the future, it will be a dispute between the State of Illinois and the Supreme Court of the United States on the one hand, or it will be a dispute between the State of Illinois and the other Great Lake States upon the one hand, long before it will ever be a dispute between the State of Illinois and the Dominion of Canada.

I could pursue the details of this phase of our problem for hours. But I believe this summation submits the realities as they are. Against this background, let me now undertake to assess the truth in respect to the criticism which the Senate is asked to magnify into an excuse to overturn these momentous negotiations and to reject the treaty.

It no longer is openly claimed in this treaty argument that additional diversion at Chicago is necessary for domestic sewage purposes—although it will be unless Chicago speeds the construction program demanded of her by the decree of the Supreme Court. Nor is any public claim made in behalf of power to be generated on this Illinois Canal, although we confront the rather amazing grant of a license to the State of Illinois by the Federal Power Commission to develop a gross power which would require at least six times the diversion permitted permanently by the Supreme Court. These uses and reasons for additional water are not enumerated in the plea against the limitations ordered by the Supreme Court and acknowledged by the pending treaty. They are not enumerated, but candor would not neglect to assign them a possible major place in the antitreaty impulses.

I refer to the findings of the special master who reported to the Supreme Court on March 13, 1933, regarding the failure of the State of Illinois and the Sanitary District of Chicago to comply with the Supreme Court's antidiversion order of 1930. The master said:

> It is true that the decree is painful to the defendants and that they have been influenced by a hope that something would happen so that the flow * * * need not go as low as 1,500 cubic second-feet; * * * and that it will be safe to do without controlling works if the diversion of 5,000 cubic second-feet continues. They virtually confess to this—

This is an official charge, entered upon the records of the Supreme Court, that opposition to limitations upon diversion are born of the hope that "something will happen" to make compliance with the Supreme Court's order unnecessary in respect of the construction of sewage works. Opposition to the pending treaty, on the grounds of opposition to limitations upon diversion, may well be born of similar untenable hopes that "something will happen" to save the need for this full construction program solemnly enjoined upon these defendants by the Supreme Court. I submit that no such impulse can appropriately motivate the Senate. The master in his report proceeds to dissipate this vagrant "hope." I quote again:

After this court has decided that the diversion is damaging to the Great Lakes system, even if this treaty obligation does not ripen, it is not to be anticipated that Congress will authorize the damage.

This simply means that there is no rational chance to increase diversion on account of these indicated reasons, treaty or no treaty. Therefore it would be ridiculous for the Senate to consult any such considerations. If they are, in fact, the unspoken considerations which inspire this particular opposition to the treaty, the opposition itself should be abandoned as sterile in objective. Even if it defeated the treaty, it could not thereby gain its own ends.

The public reason given for complaint against this established order and this treaty prospectus is that we are denying sufficient water diversion from Lake Michigan to permit a commercially useful Illinois waterway. I submit to the Senate that this complaint is without reasonable foundation; and I submit my proofs in the same breath.

The Supreme Court and the treaty permit 1,500 cubic second-feet of diversion in 1938, and permanently thereafter, plus domestic pumpage, which will be approximately 1,900 cubic second-feet in 1938. This totals a water diversion of 3,400 cubic second-feet. Is this sufficient to operate a commercially useful Illinois waterway? Are 3,400 cubic second-feet adequate?

The first answer is in Senate Document No. 126 of the Seventy-first Congress, second session, which is the official definition of the project. At page 3 we read:

The waterway is well designed and well suited to serve its intended purpose. * * * The small amount of additional dredging necessary to provide a depth of 9 feet, even if the flow at Lockport is reduced to 1,000 cubic feet per second, has been included in the estimate.

In other words, the 9-foot barge canal can operate successfully on 30 percent of the permitted low, if necessary. Then at page 6, immediately preceding the signature of Maj. Gen. Lytle Brown, Chief of Engineers, the following:

The 9-foot channel heretofore adopted by Congress can be secured by various flows of water, even as low as 1,000 cubic feet per second.

The flow provided in the treaty is not 1,000 but 3,400 cubic feet per second. This same General Brown, coming to his final conclusions two years later, stated, in a memorandum to the Secretary of War on July 21, 1932:

These facts establish without question that the permissible flow will be more than ample for any commerce that may be developed on the Illinois waterway.

That is the word of the highest official engineering authority in the United States; and even though General Brown may have been less conclusive on this score in earlier years, this quoted statement stands as his final considered verdict. I submit that the Senate—yea, and the friends of the Illinois waterway, among whom I aspire to be numbered—are entitled to rest upon this high advice.

His first assistant, Brig. Gen. George B. Pillsbury, Assistant Chief of Engineers, said in the committee hearings at page 337:

I have been connected with the questions relating to the diversion by the Chicago Sanitary District for nearly 13 years. * * * I know that the waterway which we are now completing down the Illinois River can operate on the minimum diversion that is provided under this treaty.

Meanwhile, remembering that the pending treaty contemplates a minimum flow of 3,400 cubic second-feet, contemplate by way of collateral corroboration of these witnesses that the Monongahela River carries an annual yearly traffic of 25,000,000 tons on an average low-water flow of 200 cubic second-feet; that the Ohio River carries 20,000,000 tons on 1,100 feet; and that the Panama Canal carries 28,000,000 tons on 1,300 feet. The treaty promises the Illinois waterway 3,400 feet to carry an estimated 10,000,000 tons. In the face of these exhibits, I respectfully but implacably submit to the Senate that this phase of opposition to the treaty and to the completion of this stupendous seaway is without sustaining justification and should be rejected.

This leaves only the related subject of the alleged alienation of the sovereignty of the United States over Lake Michigan. I submit that this is a self-serving thesis better calculated to lay down a smoke screen to obscure the realities than to disclose the true purport of our necessary relationships with the Canadian Dominion—particularly if we are committed, as announced in President Roosevelt's inaugural, to a "good neighbor" policy in these contracts with our historic international friend.

May I content myself with submitting to the Senate upon this score four questions which I put to our State Department and the Department's categorical replies, through Assistant Secretary of State James Grafton Rogers, under date of January 5, 1933:

1. Question. Does the St. Lawrence Treaty "surrender sovereignty" over Lake Michigan in any degree?

Answer. The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty, signed July 18, 1932, does not surrender in any sense this sovereignty of the United States over Lake Michigan. The net result of the pertinent article of the treaty (article 8) is to establish for a diversion of water from Lake Michigan at Chicago restrictions similar in effect to those provided for in the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, in the case of future diversion from Lake Michigan.

2. Question. Under international law and practice between civilized neighbors has our "sovereignty" in Lake Michigan ever included—or does it now include—an unlimited right of diversion from Lake Michigan in the event of Canadian protest that the diversion involves a trespass upon Canadian rights in boundary and connecting waters?

Answer. Sovereignty does not, and should not, include the right to use a nation's property in such a manner as to constitute a trespass in a neighboring country upon vested rights of that country.

3. Question. Under all of our general arbitration treaties with Great Britain, would not such a diversion question have come squarely within our obligation to arbitrate?

Answer. The United States has for generations been a leader in accepting and applying the principle of arbitration for the settlement of international claims and disputes. The practice has been extensively resorted to particularly in the case of Great Britain and Canada, and I cannot conceive of an abandonment of it. There exists between the United States and Great Britain a conciliation treaty, proclaimed November 11, 1914, applicable to matters connected with Canada containing the language that the nations "agree that all disputes between them of every nature whatsoever, other than disputes the settlement of which is provided for and in fact achieved under existing agreements between the high contracting parties, shall, when diplomatic methods of adjustment have failed, be referred for investigation and report to a permanent international commission * * *." As the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 neither attempted nor achieved the settlement as between the Governments of questions such as those which arise from diversions from Lake Michigan, the general practices and obligations of the United States in regard to arbitration or conciliation would no doubt be followed without departure.

4. Question. As a matter of fact, does not this pending treaty represent Canada's first and only official concession to an "American sovereignty" over any diversion from Lake Michigan at Chicago for any purposes?

Answer. As you are doubtless aware, a number of cities in the United States and Canada use water from the Great Lakes for domestic purposes. Ultimately, however, the water taken out of the Lakes is returned to the Great Lakes watershed in every case, I believe, except at Chicago, where the water is diverted to another watershed through the drainage canal. In the pending treaty Canada formally acquiesces for the first time in a diversion of water from Lake Michigan and the Great Lakes watershed to the Mississippi River.

Thus, Mr. President, I have completed all that I want to say and all that I deem it necessary to say in dismissal of this major complaint against the pending treaty, and if it were threatened I would not support this treaty. The Illinois waterway, a link in the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, is not threatened by the terms of this treaty. I beg of Senators in the lower Mississippi Basin, where this other project has many merited friends, to study the facts which irrefutably support this conclusion. I beg of them, in open-minded justice, to permit us also to reach the sea by this other outlet with its illimitable potentialities. There is no lost impulse in the Lakes-to-the-Gulf adventure. There is no lost sovereignty in Lake Michigan. The only loss in sight is the loss to forty or fifty million Americans in our land-locked midcontinent if, through prejudicial fiction, this culmination of the St. Lawrence seaway is denied by misguidedly adverse Senate votes upon the pending treaty.

Let me speak of one thing more in this related connection. When all other argument fails we are told that the United States has made a bad bargain with Canada and that the larger advantages to be enjoyed by the latter should warn the former away from this international contract. I submit, Mr. President, that this is a vain and empty thesis. So near as it is possible to write equity, reciprocity, and neighborly fair play into an international agreement, it is to be found in this pending treaty. Canada properly looks forward to large advantage from the seaway. She should. But so do we. Indeed, there are those who insist that America gets infinitely the best of these potentialities, because we have perhaps four times as many people in the benefited sector as does Canada; because we have the developed industry and the nucleus for renewed export trade to an extent which Canada cannot approach for years; and because we have an immediate outlet for this stupendous new power development in northeastern United States, whereas Canada cannot hope to get the full advantage of its share of the power for many years to come. These relative facts may or may not be true. But in any event they are irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial—so long as both Canada and the United States each gets its full "money's worth" and the responsibilities and commitments of both are at par with each other. Therefore I am disinclined to spend much time on the last-straw arguments of those Americans who, instead of seeing our full value received, pretend that we have been outmaneuvered in these treaty negotiations and that, in some malign way, we are so penalized that we should decline our allegedly poor share of the contract. But I should not want to run from this or any other challenge. So I deal with just one exhibit upon this score.

Governor Horner, of Illinois, has furnished many of us with photostats of a gurgling editorial in the Toronto Mail and Empire of July 19, 1932, in which this eminent Canadian journal enthusiastically promotes the treaty and, in a high-pressure sales talk to its constituency, assures Canadians that the treaty "is more favorable to Canada than any previous arrangement ever made with the United States"; that "it is more favorable than anyone outside a limited Government circle could have hoped for", and so forth. I know of no particular reason why we should resent these enthusiasms. Surely we would not require that our neighbors shall be unhappy about their relations with us before we ourselves may be content. I am gratified, personally, that Canada is thus pleased; because whatever her pleasure, it is not at the expense of any American right or any American interest. If the exhibit means anything at all it simply means that the benefits and the gratifications are bilateral. That ought to be an ideal treaty as well as an unusual one.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator indicated in the beginning of his remarks that he did not wish to be interrupted?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I said I would be happy to yield after I had finished my preliminary case, and I am now happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. LONG. Would the Senator just as soon go through New York for a port as through Canada?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I did not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. LONG. I say would the Senator just as soon have his people go through the port of New York as through Montreal?

Mr. VANDENBERG. To go where?

Mr. LONG. To get to the sea.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Not if they have got to transfer into barges in order to get to New York.

Mr. LONG. What is the difference if there has to be a closed navigation season?

Mr. VANDENBERG. There is a great deal of difference as to whether it is necessary to break cargo or not.

Mr. LONG. In this instance I understand there has to be at least some breaking of cargo.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There has to be no breaking of cargo whatever.

Mr. LONG. At least there is a breaking of the seasons, because during 5 or 6 months of the year the proposed waterway could not be used at all.

Mr. VANDENBERG. We have no use of the Great Lakes now for 5 or 6 months of the year, and yet we have been able to develop 35 percent of the water-borne commerce of the United States thereby.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield in a moment. If the Senator will permit me, I wish to refer further to the suggestion of the Senator from Louisiana. He speaks about seasonal situations. The last time he was discussing this seasonal subject on the floor of the Senate he referred, on page 2070 of the RECORD, in the second column, to the fact that he does not propose to submit to the St. Lawrence Treaty "because it is going to dry the Mississippi Valley", and in the first column on page 2071 in complaining against this treaty, he asked:

> Do you expect now that we are going to let you make us nothing but a dumping ground for the flood waters of this Nation?

It is rather difficult for me, Mr. President, to follow the Senator in his inconsistent objection.

Mr. LONG. That just shows——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield further to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. LONG. That just shows, with due deference to the very able and learned Senator, that he does not know anything about the question. Any man who has had experience at all with it would not have any trouble in understanding that we receive the seasonal waters in the springtime, which flood us out; instead of our navigation having been completed and our waters impounded in such a way that, instead of being flooded in the springtime, with no water in the fall we would have a seasonal flow, that is an all-the-year-around flow with floods eliminated. I should be glad if the Senator would study the matter of inland navigation instead of studying Canada so much, because that is a primary question the Senator is asking, and there is not a 6-year-old schoolboy in Louisiana who could not have answered it for him.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am happy that the Senator thinks it such an easy matter, but I repeat that he complains in one column because we are withholding water, and in the other column because we are overwhelming him with water. He reminds me of a bit of mythology. A stranger was wandering in the woods one night; it was a rather bitter cold evening. A wood nymph found the stranger wandering in the woods, and, being of a sort of humane turn of mind, like my genial friend from Louisiana, the nymph said to the stranger, "Come to my woodland dell and I will take care of you for the night." As they passed along toward the woodland dell the stranger blew upon his hands, and the wood nymph said, "What did you do that for?" He replied, "To warm my hands." When they got in the woodland dell the wood nymph set out hot porridge for the stranger, and right away the stranger began to blow on the hot porridge. The wood nymph said, "What do you do that for?" and the stranger replied, "To cool it off." Then the wood nymph said, "Get out of here; anybody who can blow hot and cold in the same breath cannot stay here." [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Possibly the Senator in the early part of his address, which I was unable to hear, may have answered the question I have in mind. I know he has given deep study to this whole matter, and that is the reason why I propound the question at this time, because it interests me considerably. One of the objections that have been urged to this whole project, as the Senator well knows, is that a comparatively small portion of the trade along this route would be handled by American bottoms—by American ships. I should like, if the Senator can tell us, to know about what percentage of this shipping would be handled by American merchantmen.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am unable to answer the Senator in any dependable detail, because that phase of the problem has never been reduced to percentages, but the answer seems to be that after we shall have extended our seacoast to include the Great Lakes shore line it is reasonable to assume that the same percentages of shipping will persist under the American flag on that portion of the sea line as on the external sea line.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That answer invites this further question: Assuming that a considerable portion of the shipping would be carried under a foreign flag, what effect would that have on American seamen or American labor in connection with such transportation? Is the Senator alarmed at all for fear, in case we open up this seaway, that American labor will be discriminated against because of the presence in that seaway of so much foreign labor, that we consider very much underpaid?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No, Mr. President; if I did think so, I would consider it a very serious menace. The ships that enter the Great Lakes, of course, cannot engage in our so-called "coastwise trade."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Has that question come before the subcommittee?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Only in a general way.

Mr. President, I was discussing the editorial in the Toronto Mail and Empire concerning which so much has been made to indicate the poor bargain that our negotiators made in connection with this treaty.

But let the persistent cynic test this Canadian editorial at each factual point. "The cost of the undertaking is to be borne mainly by the United States." The total costs are equally divided between the two countries within a fraction of 1 percent, with credits to each country for expenditures already made upon direct links in the seaway chain. Chiefly because Canada has just expended some $130,000,000 of her own money on her own Welland Canal—which becomes a partnership canal, by the way, under the treaty—her balance due on her half of the total bill is less at the moment than our balance due on our half of the total bill. And that is how "the cost of the undertaking is to be borne mainly by the United States." I do not mean to speak critically of the Toronto Mail and Empire in this connection. I have written newspaper editorials myself in my day. Zeal in the advocacy of a cause is a familiar newspaper phenomenon and in no sense unworthy.

"We have retained the right to construct an all-Canadian waterway, at any time in the future, if such an expenditure is deemed advisable", this Toronto editorial triumphantly continues. Quite correct. But we may similarly say that we have retained the right to construct an all-American canal, if we be thus minded. It is the announcement of an elementary axiom.

"The United States abandons its ancient contention that Lake Michigan is an American lake", the editorial chortles. It would be equally true for us to say that Canada abandons its contention that the Welland Canal is a Canadian canal. It would be equally true because the mutual navigation rights are the same in both places. But it would be far more accurate to say that neither country abandons anything. It would be more accurate to say that both countries simply agree to make permanent the precise reciprocal navigation rights which have existed on a revocable basis ever since the treaty of 1909 was ratified. Meanwhile, if this editorial reference relates to Chicago diversion, it would be far more specific to say that Canada, in this treaty, recognizes for the first time a right of diversion at Chicago than to say that Canada gains a new right of veto upon diversion.

Such, Mr. President, are the realities. The exhibit submitted by the Governor of Illinois says that this Canadian editorial "expresses the joy and appreciation of Canada at the great victory won by Canadian statesmen in the St. Lawrence treaty." I do not undertake to subtract a single credit mark from these eminent Canadian statesmen with whom we have been proud and glad to participate in these negotiations. It would be a travesty upon international comity if this treaty did not bear within it a just share of beneficial advantages for this great dominion to the north. I am glad that this common enterprise is wholly worth while for all concerned. I do not mourn our lack of a monopoly upon the dividends from this common effort. But I respectfully submit that it is equally logical and equally appropriate—and would reflect an equally justified gratitude on our own part—if we, with equal or even greater warrant, should express the joy and appreciation of our own United States that our own statesmen have so completely preserved American rights in these negotiations and so effectually brought us within reach of these amazingly emphatic American advantages.

Mr. President, the criticisms of the proposition which I have heard on the floor of the Senate are in the main misguided. I only want to refer specifically to one or two because I must conclude. My dear friend the able senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] constantly refers to this seaway as the "all-British canal." It is his favorite expression. Let us see.

From the head of Lake Superior to Father Point, in Quebec, where the river ends and the high seas begin, is 1,677 miles. Of this distance 1,243 miles, or 74 percent, lie in international waters, and 434 miles, or 26 percent, in wholly Canadian waters. The locks at the "Soo" will all of them be in United States territory. The connecting channels in the Great Lakes are about equally divided in mileage on the two sides of the boundary line. The locks and navigation works at the upper dam in the St. Lawrence will be in Canadian territory and built by Canada at her own cost. The locks and navigation works at the lower dam in the St. Lawrence will be wholly in the United States and built by the Federal Government.

The treaty creates and makes perpetual an international highway from lake head to the Atlantic Ocean; one entire navigation route, protecting equally and in every particular both nations alike.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York in similar light-hearted fashion says that I expect the Leviathan is going to tie up at the dock in Grand Haven, Mich. He says that I seem to believe in Santa Claus and fairy tales. If he considers that ships of the Leviathan type are essential to the success of the seaway, I want to call his attention to the fact that ships of the Leviathan type do not dock at Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Savannah, or New Orleans; yet that certainly is no reason why those great ports do not enjoy a stupendous utility and why they should not be encouraged and supported by the American Government. We are not expecting the Leviathan on the Great Lakes, but we do know that 88 percent of all the cargo shipping on the seas of the world will be eligible to enter and we are perfectly cognizable of the net results, and we are perfectly satisfied without the Leviathan to contemplate an utterly stupendous dividend.

This now leaves us with one final source of opposition to assess. The one argument against the seaway most calculated to give serious pause is the argument that railroad transportation will be adversely affected, and at the very moment when one of the country's major needs is the rehabilitation of these railroads. It would be silly not to agree to this need of rehabilitation. I insist upon registering myself as one who completely sympathizes with this railroad problem and who will make every possible contribution to its helpful determination. We must have the railroads as the solid backlog of our entire transportation system. But I am profoundly convinced that even the railroads have more to gain than to lose, in a long-range view, from the completion of the seaway.

There will obviously be an initial diversion of traffic from the rails to the seaway—particularly east of Detroit. Thus I can understand the initial fears of eastern railroad executives. But, frankly, I cannot understand why western railroad executives should have changed front and joined attitude with their eastern brethren when heretofore most of these western executives have freely admitted that the seaway will help them and their traffic. It seems to me that the seaway could not do otherwise. It will give them large new traffic en route to these new inland seaboard ports. It will inevitably contribute to the prosperity of the mid-continent, and there cannot be mid-continent prosperity without a full share going to the railroads in this area, if not throughout the Nation.

But whether the railroads be east or west, their jeopardy today is not water competition in any controlling degree. It is, first, an inevitable reflex from the general depression; second, unregulated competition with trucks and busses; third, loss of business to airplanes and private motor cars; fourth, inability to meet these new situations with comparably attractive rates and service; fifth, outworn systems and capitalizations. Would it be fair to say that the whole mid-continent shall be permanently penalized by withholding a great, natural transportation advantage—primarily intended for the creation of new export trade—because these other factors in this contemporary situation are unfortunate for the railroads? It seems to me any such penalties would be at war with elementary economics. This is particularly true in respect to an external seaway as distinguished from an internal canal. Even the Railway Bureau of Economics recognized this distinction a few years ago.

The answer to the railroad problem does not lie in stifling the seaway. The railroads and the seaway should complement each other. In the first place, less than a decade ago our railroad facilities were totally inadequate to the traffic demands upon them, and a restoration of normalcy in the Nation will again provide ample traffic, regardless of diversion of traffic via the seaway. In the second place, the seaway will hasten this return to normalcy. It will provide new American business flowing into and out of new areas—and all of this collateral flow will be on the railroads. There will be new industrial development in the midcontinent; and the rails cannot escape an advantage in the reflex. Further, it is impossible for new trade to be stimulated and new prosperity created anywhere in the whole Union without profitable repercussions in every other part of the Union.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I prefer not to yield at this time.

Mr. LONG. I want to give the Senator an interesting report.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I must decline to yield at this time.

Again, stimulated trade at the new inland seaboard will feed the rails in the process of serving this trade. For example, if automotive export is stimulated from the port of Detroit—if as a result of cheap access to foreign markets we sell more cars abroad—Detroit will buy more steel, more tires, more leather, more glass, and so forth, and it will be chiefly the railroads which will bring in these materials. Let it be remembered that the auto industry uses 81.6 percent of all the rubber, 60 percent of all the plate glass, 32 percent of all the nickel, 35.8 percent of all the lead, 28 percent of all the mohair, and 51 percent of all the upholstery leather sold in the United States. When additional motor cars move out of Detroit in export these other commodities move into Detroit, and mainly by rail.

Here is a specific and probably a typical exhibit bearing upon this point. According to the statistics of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, the inbound rail traffic in connection with automotive production runs as follows for 1930 and 1931:

> Eight hundred and sixty-seven thousand, seven hundred and forty carloads of inbound freight against 5,982,537 autos produced. This is an average of one carload of inbound railroad freight for each 6.89 automobiles produced.

It has been somewhat difficult for me to translate this into actual revenue. But I find that the grand average railroad revenue in 1931 from incoming and outgoing automotive traffic was $127.71 per carload. Using this figure as an index, we could say that since every average sale of between 6 and 7 automobiles produces a carload of incoming freight, therefore the railroads have a stake of $127 in every increased sale of between six and seven automobiles, regardless of how the finished product goes to market. This, then, is some indication of the direct importance to the railroads of new export business generated by the seaway—to say nothing of the indirect importance of increased mid-continent trade and prosperity reflected in collateral channels.

This story will be repeated a thousand times. Again quoting Mr. Julius Barnes, former president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, "Any study of economic history shows that tonnage develops from forces impossible to foresee", and the seaway will "result in new tonnage" both for itself and for the rails.

This prophecy is confirmed by Dr. MacElwee, who told the committee:

> Just as every other great change in transportation or manufacturing methods revolutionizes existing conditions, I believe there will be such an increase in business activity in the mid-continent as a result of the St. Lawrence seaway as to show an increase in per-ton mileage of the carloadings of the railroads.

It is inconceivable that there could be any permanent advantage to the rails in circumscribing the economic progress of 40,000,000 people in this land-locked mid-continent.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Germany and France own their own railroads and spend hundreds of millions of dollars for the development of rivers and canals. In conversation with an official of the German Government I pointed out the fact that in this country the railroads consider waterways and water transportation unfair competition. I expressed my curiosity as to why the Governments of France and Germany would spend so much money for water transportation when the Governments own the railroads. He told me that the waterways add to the tonnage of the railroads, bringing business to the railroads. He said it made it possible for a great deal of freight to be moved by water that could not afford to be moved by rail, but when they move it as far as they can by water the railroads carry it inland. The barges, of course, do not travel by land. We have there an example of 100 years of history of water transportation which after experiment shows that in their opinion water transportation aids the railroads.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his observations, which are unquestionably sound both in history and in economics.

I repeat that it is inconceivable that there could be any permanent advantage to the rails in circumscribing the economic progress of 40,000,000 people in this land-locked mid-continent. It is equally inconceivable that this progress would fail to spell progress for the rails themselves. Certainly their prosperity is inseverably linked with the prosperity of the people themselves.

Most certainly I do not blame railroad labor for being critical of every competitive service which seems to threaten railroad traffic. Railroad labor has one of the most enlightened organizations in the land. It has seen inroads upon its livelihood for several unhappy years. But these inroads are largely from forces and events which are entirely foreign to the considerations involved in the seaway. If the ultimate effect of the seaway would be helpful to mid-continent prosperity, and thus to railroading, this labor certainly would not oppose the seaway. The question to be decided is, Which guess for the future is right? I cannot escape the persuasion that the affirmative "guess" is the correct "guess." It might be argued that the railroad situation is too desperate to justify any "guessing" at all. Yet this very desperation calls for new experiments. It calls for bus and truck regulation. It calls for regulated competition. But it chiefly calls for "more prosperity" in the Nation; and if the seaway trends in this direction, it must trend in the direction of help rather than hurt for the railroads and for railroad labor.

Mr. President, this concludes my presentation of this absorbing subject. I cannot hope to have done it justice. It transcends the power of speech. It is one of those stupendous opportunities which is permitted but once in the lifetime of a generation. It is the promise of a benediction upon vast areas of our America. Half a continent intimately believes in it. Half the States of the Union specifically have asked for it. The commerce of the world is in its purview. The greatest engineers declare it sound. The greatest economists pronounce it good. Political parties have addressed it with a common fidelity. Presidents unite in its sponsorship—Franklin Roosevelt no less than Herbert Hoover. We are summoned to the fruition of a courageous dream. We are called to high adventure in the name of these two great English-speaking peoples. This is the appointed hour for the marriage of the oceans and the Lakes. These nuptials will bless us and our children and our children's children.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE obtained the floor.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LONG. I just want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield if the Senator from Michigan wishes to respond.

Mr. LONG. I only want to ask the Senator a question. I was wondering if the Senator, who has so eloquently concluded his speech, knew of the magnificent further support he had in Canada, in which they recount the following statistics:

Shipments of Canadian grain—

Says this Canadian newspaper——

Mr. VANDENBERG. What is the newspaper?

Mr. LONG. This is the Shipping Register and Travel Guide.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Where is it published?

Mr. LONG. In Canada.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Where in Canada is it published? Is it published in Quebec?

Mr. LONG. Probably so.

Mr. VANDENBERG. "Probably so" is right. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. At any rate, this is advocating the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. It is published in behalf of the Halifax Harbor Commission. It is an advertisement by them, in which they say:

Shipments of Canadian grain in 1930 through United States ports, 67,747,685 bushels.
Through Canadian Atlantic ports, 5,153,553 bushels.

Then it says:

All-Canadian routes for Canada's grain!

In other words, showing that 67,000,000 bushels of Canadian grain now going through America will be made to go through Canada, as well as the American grain going through the port of Montreal, as a result of the American money spent to build a canal in Canada.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, following the able and exhaustive presentation of the affirmative side of this question for the St. Lawrence Treaty, it is with some hesitation that I ask the indulgence of the Senate to a further consideration of this momentous question. Nevertheless, in view of the long and historical interest in this subject of the State which I have the honor in part to represent in this body, I should feel myself derelict in my duty did I not present the arguments as I see them in favor of action upon this most important development at this session of Congress. I regard the treaty as a part of the program for consideration at this session in order that it may become a part of the public works bill which is the most important aspect of the administration's proposals for this session.

BOTH POLITICAL PARTIES PLEDGED TO PROJECT

The completion of the seaway from the head of the Great Lakes at Superior and Duluth through the St. Lawrence River to the Atlantic has been pledged by both political parties.

This project was embodied in the treaty signed at Washington by the United States and Canada nearly a year ago. The ratification of the treaty will fulfill the pledges made to the people of this country by Republicans, Democrats, and Progressives alike in the campaigns of 1932 and preceding years.

I propose today to show that the railroads and the public utility and power companies have been energetically at work for months to prevent the consideration of this treaty at the present session of the Senate. Those interests, and the bankers allied with them, hope to defeat the treaty by obstruction and delay. This cannot be achieved without a rank betrayal of party pledges, repeatedly made to the people of the land-locked Middle West and to the electorate of the entire country.

President Roosevelt is pledged in unequivocal terms to the completion of the St. Lawrence project. He specifically included it among the policies to which the Democratic Party was bound in the 1932 campaign. In his address at Portland September 21, 1932, he listed the St. Lawrence with Boulder Dam, Muscle Shoals, and the Columbia River as four natural resources of water power which the Democratic administration would undertake to develop under public ownership and control for the benefit of the consumers of electricity.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT FOR PROMPT ACTION

On July 9, 1932, immediately after his nomination for the presidency, Governor Roosevelt sent a telegram to President Hoover, from which I quote in part:

I am deeply interested in the immediate construction of the deep waterway as well as in the development of abundant and cheap power. * * * With * * * an agreement between the Federal administration and the State of New York, it would be my hope that it would be possible to submit a treaty to the Senate for immediate and, I hope, favorable action as soon as signed.

May I respectfully point out that such action would hasten greatly the initiation of this vast project—one which means cheap transportation by deep waterway for the agricultural and other products of the West; cheap electricity from the State owned and controlled resource, to be developed for the primary interest of homes, farms, and industry; and, of immediate importance, employment for thousands of workers. * * * Early and final action on this great public work * * * would be greatly to the public interest. It has already been too long delayed.

In his reply to the Governor's message President Hoover stated:

Having ardently advocated for over 10 years the great work of completing this shipway from Duluth and Chicago to the sea, I am glad to know that it will meet with your support.

These telegrams were exchanged after negotiations for the pending treaty had been concluded, at a time when both Governor Roosevelt and President Hoover were advised of the major provisions which had been agreed upon.

At its national convention at Chicago, the Republican Party adopted the following plank by a unanimous vote:

The Republican Party stands committed to the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway. Under the direction of President Hoover negotiation of a treaty with Canada for this development is now at a favorable point. Recognizing the inestimable benefits which will accrue to the Nation from placing the ports of the Great Lakes on an ocean base, the party reaffirms allegiance to this great project and pledges its best efforts to secure its early completion.

While both the Republican and Democratic candidates were unequivocally pledged to the completion of the St. Lawrence project in the 1932 campaign, this policy was not initiated as a partisan question.

The progressive States of the Northwest, at the headwaters of the Mississippi and the Great Lakes, were the first to demand the opening of the highway from the mid-continent to the sea. The Progressive Republicans of Wisconsin in 1920 adopted a platform plank which has been approved at every election held within the State and submitted to every Republican National Convention since that time, as follows:

We favor a deep waterway from the Great Lakes to the sea. The Government should, in conjunction with Canada, take immediate action to give the Northwestern States an outlet to the ocean for cargoes, without change in bulk, thus making the primary markets on the Great Lakes equal to those of New York.

This pledge was adopted in the same form at the Progressive Convention held at Cleveland, Ohio, July 4, 1924, and at that time was first embodied in the platform of a national political movement.

FARM ORGANIZATION AND 14 GOVERNORS SUPPORT PROJECT

At every convention since 1921 the American Farm Bureau Federation has endorsed the St. Lawrence seaway. The National Grange approved the project in resolutions adopted at its 1931 convention, and in 1933, after the pending treaty was submitted, reaffirmed its previous declaration.

On May 17, 1933, a petition urging immediate ratification of the treaty was presented to President Roosevelt, signed by the Governors of 14 States. The signers of this petition are as follows:

Most of the Governors who signed the petition were represented at a meeting of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association, held at Chicago on May 16. To this conference President Roosevelt sent the following message through his Secretary:

> The President requests acknowledge with thanks assurance your whole-hearted cooperation bring St. Lawrence Treaty to fulfillment by ratification. Only crushing pressure business prevents the President extending personal greetings your gathering and wishing your movement complete certain success.

PRESIDENT ACTS TO FULFILL PLEDGE

The St. Lawrence project and the pledges made for its completion were never closer to fulfillment than when the present session of Congress convened.

President Roosevelt took an early opportunity to carry out his pledge of the 1932 campaign. He caused to be introduced simultaneously in the House and the Senate on April 18 a joint resolution confirming an agreement between the Power Authority of the State of New York and the Federal authorities allocating the costs of the navigation and power works to be built in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence River within the boundaries of the State of New York.

The agreement had been reached as the result of the hearings conducted by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on the treaty itself. These hearings, authorized by the Senate in July 1932, began in the following November and continued until late in February 1933.

Every phase of the project was carefully investigated. Representatives of public utilities, railroads, and all other interests opposed to the treaty were heard. The economic advantages to the Nation and the feasibility of the project were thoroughly established by the testimony of scores of disinterested witnesses. Sixty-nine witnesses were heard orally, and written statements and briefs were filed by numerous individuals and organizations, a great majority of the whole number being favorable to the immediate completion of the St. Lawrence project. No adverse witness was denied a hearing. No line of inquiry was proposed by any Member of the Senate or of the committee which was not thoroughly investigated.

PUBLIC POWER RIGHTS PROTECTED BY JOINT RESOLUTION

When the joint resolution confirming the agreement between the Federal Government and the State of New York was introduced at the request of President Roosevelt, the opponents of the treaty in this body sought to block its consideration.

The Committee on Foreign Relations, acting upon the initiative of the late Senator Walsh of Montana, had effected the agreement between the Federal and State authorities. The agreement provided that the State of New York should assume $89,726,000 of the cost of the works in the international rapids section, thus greatly reducing the Federal expenditure involved in the St. Lawrence project. It further provided that the water-power resources on the New York side of this section of the river, which have repeatedly been sought for private exploitation by public utility and power companies, should be developed as a public project by the power authority, a public agency of the State, created by the unanimous vote of both branches of the New York State Legislature in 1931.

The joint resolution passed the House of Representatives on April 26. As passed by the House and introduced in the Senate, at the request of the President, it contained a proviso declaring:

> That no part of the United States' share of the water in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence River shall be diverted for the benefit of any person or private corporation, nor shall the use of any part of said water or the rights pertaining to said water be sold, leased, or otherwise alienated to any person or private corporation for the generation of hydroelectric power.

Senators who do me the honor to follow me will see the significance of the relation of the power involved in this project to the nature and character of the opposition which is being put forward against this treaty. Led by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the opponents of the treaty in the Senate seized upon this joint resolution as a means of blocking the consideration of the treaty at this session. The Senator from New York contended that the joint resolution should be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

In the course of the filibustering against the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], on April 17, page 1815, said:

> My particular object in having this joint resolution referred to a committee competent by experience and authority to deal with the problems involved is that an economic study may be made. There is not any evidence of such a study in these hearings.

On the same day the Senator from New York said, page 1816:

> But where is there in the volume of the hearings the report of any study as to what is going to happen to our country by reason of the development of this proposed canal? That is what I want to know.

During the debate on April 21, when the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee [Mr. PITTMAN] urged the prompt consideration of the joint resolution and the treaty, the Senator from New York said, page 2067:

> What the Senator from Nevada is doing is delaying final action on this matter because, with all due deference to him, there are some of us here who are sufficiently interested in this question to wish to know what will be the economic effect upon the United States of building the St. Lawrence canal. * * * I wish to have the domestic side of it considered now—> in order that we may determine in the State of New York whether we are throwing away $90,000,000 and harming our State tremendously. I want to say to the Senator from Nevada that if he thinks that he is going to have rapid and immediate action on this matter through the process he proposes, he is very much mistaken.

With heavy emphasis on the word "domestic"—

UNITED STATES-NEW YORK AGREEMENT APPROVED BY PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AND GOVERNOR LEHMAN

In the course of his remarks on April 17, the Senator from New York referred to the text of the agreement between the power authority of his own State and the engineers of the War Department, embodied in a memorandum dated February 7, 1933, and given effect by the joint resolution. The Senator said on April 17, page 1813:

> There is not a Senator here, unless he be a member of the committee, who has ever read that memorandum. I live in the State of New York and in part represent that State in this body, but until I sent this morning to the Army engineers for a copy of that memorandum I never had seen it. I have it in my hand and have had it in my possession about an hour. Other Senators do not know what is in it.

I hold in my hand a dispatch from Albany, dated February 8, 1933, published on page 2 of the New York Times of February 9. This dispatch, a column and a half in length, is headed:

Lehman declares seaway cost fair. Praises agreement reached with Washington on $89,726,000 for St. Lawrence. Low power price is seen. Congress action sought.

The dispatch states that Chairman Frank P. Walsh and Vice Chairman Delos M. Cosgrove of the New York Power Authority, accompanied by John D. Moore, an engineer for the power authority, and Leland S. Olds, assistant to the chairman, delivered the full text of the agreement to Governor Lehman on February 8 and held a conference with the newspapermen at Albany. The full text of the agreement was published in this dispatch, 66 days before the senior Senator from New York states he took the trouble to read it.

On the same occasion Governor Lehman gave a statement to the press, widely quoted, in which he said:

In my opinion this appears to be a very fair allocation of costs between the Federal Government and the State of New York. I am advised that the engineers believe that there can be savings made from estimates given to me from 20 to 25 percent because of reduced unit costs, materials, and labor involved. It would appear from these figures that New York State can develop upward of 1,000,000 horsepower at a very low unit cost. * * * I feel that very great progress has been made through the understanding reached between representatives of the Federal and State Governments as to the division of costs, on which there has heretofore been a wide difference of opinion.

I also want to quote the headlines appearing in the New York Tribune of February 9:

Lehman elated at St. Lawrence power figures.

The New York American headline was as follows:

Lehman backs pact with United States on power costs. Approves State outlay of $89,000,000 as share of St. Lawrence development.

The senior Senator from New York impeached the intelligence of the Governor of his own State, a member of his own party, and the intelligence of the State's official body, the New York Power Authority, which negotiated this agreement and approved it and publicly announced its approval and gratification at its consummation on February 9, 1933.

It was announced in this dispatch that representatives of the power authority would appear before the Foreign Relations Committee on February 10 to discuss the agreement.

At this public hearing, Gen. George B. Pillsbury, Assistant to the Chief of Engineers, and Vice Chairman Cosgrove, of the power authority, presented the agreement and discussed it in detail. The junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] participated in the examination of the witnesses. When the treaty was reported to the Senate by a vote of 9 to 2, with a recommendation favorable to the allocation of costs embodied in this agrement, the junior Senator from New York publicly stated that he favored the power development provided by the treaty and by the supplementary agreement between his own State and the Federal authorities.

This is the agreement published in newspapers all over the country on February 9 and again reported in dispatches on the committee hearings of February 10, of which the senior Senator from New York, by his own statement on the Senate floor, was entirely ignorant as late as April 17.

It is this agreement which has been approved by President Roosevelt after 4 years of study and effort as governor to protect the power resources of the State from private exploitation, by Governor Lehman, the present Governor of New York, and by the Power Authority of the State of New York.

In his address on April 17, the senior Senator from New York showed additional evidence that he required further opportunity to familiarize himself with a project which is of such enormous consequence to the people of his own State. He referred to the works to be built under the treaty in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River. He denounced article 3 of the treaty in this language, page 1816:

This has to do with the international section of the river, the part where the Lachine Rapids are, and where the powerful currents of the river are capable of developing immense quantities of hydroelectric power.

If any Member of this body will refer to a map, he will find that the Lachine Rapids are 75 miles away from the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River. This is of a piece with the misstatements which have been made in the Senate and elsewhere by the opponents of this treaty.

They are confined entirely to Canadian territory. The senior Senator from New York, indeed, requires further time to familiarize himself with this project, for he has confused the Lachine Rapids with the International Rapids, which form the boundary of his own State for a distance of 43 miles along the St. Lawrence River.

"ECONOMY STUDY" SOUGHT IN ORDER TO BLOCK TREATY

The argument that an "economic study" should be made before proceeding with the actual construction of the waterway has been the chief device used by its opponents to block this development over the past 30 years.

No waterway project in the history of the world has received more study of its economic, engineering, and cost features than has been given to the St. Lawrence seaway.

Under an act of July 1, 1898, the Deep Waterways Commission of the United States rendered a report to the second session of the Fifty-sixth Congress, printed as Document No. 149. From 1812 down to 1900, the Commission reported to Congress, it had been generally conceded by all students of proposed water routes to the West—that the St. Lawrence River is the natural outlet and the line of least resistance for a waterway from the Great Lakes to tidewater.

In 1919, Congress adopted an amendment to the rivers and harbors appropriation bill, introduced by Senator Lenroot, of Wisconsin, providing funds for a study of the St. Lawrence project by the International Joint Commission.

Public hearings were held by the International Joint Commission, extending from May 1920 until March 1921. The Commission held 44 hearings, 33 of them in 24 cities of 14 States of the Union, and the remainder in 12 cities of 5 Canadian Provinces. Testimony was heard from 300 individual witnesses. The hearings were published in January 1922, comprising a volume of 7,462 pages of testimony.

Concurrently with this study an international board of engineers, representing both the United States and Canada, studied the navigation and engineering phases of the project. Both the International Joint Commission and the International Board of Engineers rendered favorable reports on the projects to their Governments. As a result, Canada appointed a national advisory committee and President Coolidge appointed the St. Lawrence Commission of the United States, of which Secretary of Commerce Hoover was chairman. In 1926 the St. Lawrence Commission of the United States made a report declaring that—

The construction of the shipway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic is imperative both for the relief and for the future development of a vast area in the interior of the continent.

An enlarged joint board of engineers, consisting of three representatives of each country, was appointed and, taking into account all previous engineering and economic studies, this board arrived at the plans which are embodied in the pending treaty.

INTERNATIONAL, NATIONAL, AND REGIONAL STUDIES COMPLETED

In addition to the national and international studies made at the direction of the Governments of the United States and the Dominion of Canada, numerous studies have been made by the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association, an organization officially sanctioned by the officials of 23 States. This association has published 53 bulletins, covering every phase of the St. Lawrence project.

Economic studies of the effect of the completion of the St. Lawrence project upon various sections of this country have been made by many leading engineers, economists, and industrial authorities. In 1927, a report on the St. Lawrence project was made public by the joint New England committee. A separate committee was set up in each of the New England States to study New England's relationship to the Middle West and the value of the St. Lawrence waterway as a connecting route. Each State committee found unanimously for the St. Lawrence project. The six State committees met in conference and favored the project by a unanimous vote.

The most exhaustive studies of the economic effect of the power development on the St. Lawrence have been conducted by official bodies of the State of New York. For more than a score of years that State has been engaged in continuous struggle to prevent the water power on the St. Lawrence from falling into the hands of private power companies.

On March 29, 1930, the State legislature enacted a law authorizing Governor Roosevelt to appoint the St. Lawrence Power Development Commission to study the problem of public development of this natural resource. In addition to a distinguished advisory board of engineers, this commission established a marketing board which made an exhaustive analysis of the effect of the project upon the economic development of the State. The report of the commission was submitted on January 15, 1931.

On April 27, 1931, Governor Roosevelt signed a bill, passed by unanimous vote of both branches of the legislature, creating the Power Authority of the State of New York and directing it to proceed with the development of the St. Lawrence River in cooperation with the Federal authorities of the United States and Canada for both power and navigation purposes.

On March 8, 1932, and on March 8, 1933, the power authority submitted to the Governor and to the legislature reports based upon the most extensive investigation of the economic phases of the project.

From 1897 down to April 1929, shortly before the active negotiation of the pending treaty began, 13 separate reports had been made on the St. Lawrence waterway by authorized officials of the Federal Government of the United States and of Canada. In addition, 121 reports, pamphlets, and other publications were issued on this subject by private individuals and organizations on the basis of separate studies of the proposed project.

The pending treaty is thus based upon engineering and economic plans resulting from more than 30 years of the most exhaustive investigation and upon conclusions in which officials of the United States Government, the Dominion of Canada, the Province of Ontario, and the State of New York, charged with the duty of developing the St. Lawrence, are now in complete accord.

The senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] asks that this painstaking investigation be disregarded and that the conclusions reached be swept aside when he demands that a new economic study be made before the treaty is considered by the Senate.

ORIGIN OF DEMAND FOR NEW "ECONOMIC STUDY"

The claim that no adequate, impartial economic study has been made regarding this project is a mere subterfuge to delay and ultimately to defeat the ratification of the pending treaty.

The proposal that another economic study be made at this time did not, however, originate with the senior Senator from New York.

On November 18, 1932, a representative of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee in opposition to the pending treaty. This organization presented a long report and copies of resolutions strongly opposing the development of the St. Lawrence River for navigation and power purposes.

At the regular monthly meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York on April 6, 1933, a further report and resolution were unanimously adopted, advancing in almost identical terms the proposal for an economic study presented on the floor of the Senate on April 17 by the senior Senator from New York.

The resolutions adopted on April 6 are as follows:

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York urges upon the Senate of the United States that action on the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty be held in abeyance until official and up-to-date data have been made available by a competent nonpartisan body upon the expenses of operation, the amount of traffic, the savings to the United States and other economic questions involved in the St. Lawrence project; and, be it further Resolved, That copies of this report be sent to the President and Members of the Senate.

This, in my opinion, was the origin of the demand that, after more than 30 years of investigation, the United States Senate should not be permitted to pass upon the pending treaty until an entirely new economic study was authorized and the findings resulting therefrom reported to this body.

REPORT IN CONFLICT WITH PUBLIC RECORD OF 30 YEARS

The report adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York at the time it passed this resolution represents a complete falsification of the public records of the last 30 years. This report states:

In the study of the United States engineers, which is the one being relied upon by the Senate in considering the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty, no economic survey was made. * * * Only the cost and engineering features were covered, no appropriation being made to provide for an analysis of the economic questions. The only economic consideration under Federal auspices which has been given to the Great Lakes-to-ocean waterway has been prepared by employees of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. * * *

Obviously, a new economic survey should be made by a nonpartisan official body, composed of recognized experts, upon the various economic questions involved.

The United States Government and other governments have frequently announced that it should be a general policy that expenditures for public works should, under existing financial and industrial conditions, be confined to self-liquidating projects. In accordance with this policy a study should be made of the St. Lawrence canal project to learn if the expenditure is justifiable upon economic grounds.

In the face of the public record this document and the resolutions accompanying it can only be characterized as deliberately misleading and in direct conflict with the facts.

CHAMBER OPPOSED TO MUSCLE SHOALS PROJECT, MISSISSIPPI WATERWAY

The Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York has been actively resisting the St. Lawrence project for more than a dozen years. It has resorted to every argument and device to delay and to thwart the completion of the waterway from the Great Lakes to the sea.

In October 1920 the chamber adopted a report in opposition to the project and renewed that declaration 12 years later, on October 6, 1932. In this report, the chamber frankly based its opposition on the desire to protect the railroads and the private power industry from competition. It not only condemned the St. Lawrence waterway but renewed its opposition to the utilization of the Mississippi waterway. I quote from this report:

This chamber has gone on record on several occasions against Government participation in business. It seems as if the huge expenditure contemplated on the St. Lawrence is closely akin to the enterprises this chamber has so often criticized. * * * No scientific principles exist which can be used as a guide in allocating the expenditures on the canal which are for navigation to be paid by the Government, and the expenditures which are for water power and accordingly should be self-sustaining. The result will be that the private electric power industry will not know for years what competition to expect from the St. Lawrence. Also, the railroad industry will be uncertain as to the effect the opening of the canal will have upon its business. It might even develop that the Government will go into the operation of barges or similar craft on the St. Lawrence waterway when completed, as it has on the Mississippi River, which this chamber condemned on December 3, 1931. It might even happen that Congress would decide to put the Federal Government still further into the water-power business.

In an earlier report, on similar grounds, the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York strongly condemned the Muscle Shoals power project, embodied in the act recently passed by Congress and signed by President Roosevelt. I shall show in just a few moments, Mr. President, the underlying reason why the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York has consistently opposed public power development of every kind and nature.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] a few days ago produced on the floor an analysis of the official roster of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, showing how that organization had been prostituted by power and banking interests in lobbying and propaganda activities to block the development of Muscle Shoals and other water-power projects.

CHAMBER CONTROLLED BY BANKS, RAILROADS, POWER COMPANIES

I have before me an analysis of the membership of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. The analysis shows that this organization is absolutely dominated and controlled by railroad and public-utility companies and the bankers allied with these interests.

The analysis demonstrates that the pending St. Lawrence Treaty is being blocked and resisted today with the support of the leading partners of J. P. Morgan & Co. and the powerful combination of railroads and public-utility companies operating in the eastern section of the country which are under Morgan control.

The analysis shows beyond question that the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, which has led the organized opposition to the pending treaty, and is now demanding that a new economic study be made, represents the financial district in Wall Street, and is utterly indifferent to the benefits this project will bring to the consumers of electricity in New York City and to the farms and homes in the State as a whole.

I summarize this analysis as follows:

First. The pretense that the New York State Chamber of Commerce is in any true sense representative of the State of New York as a whole is shown to be a fiction by the fact that out of 1,538 members only 142, or less than 10 percent of the total number, show an address outside of the city of New York. Most of the 142 either show addresses within the metropolitan area or indicate that they have retired and live outside the State. A careful check reveals not more than 10 who can in any sense be considered as representing any local business interests in the State outside of the New York City area.

Second. The interests represented by the membership of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York are even more limited than the above statement would indicate. More than 50 percent of the membership actually belongs to the area known as "lower Manhattan" and appears to be definitely associated with the financial capital of the country. There are 164 members out of a total of 1,538 giving a Wall Street address.

Third. A classification of the membership by occupation shows the following:

Banking, including investment bankers	510
Insurance	105
Real estate	62
Brokers	53
Shipping	41
Railroads	39
Utilities	32
	842
Other classifications	696
Total membership	1,538

Fourth. The above figures show clearly that the New York chamber is dominated by New York City financial and banking interests, frequently referred to as "Wall Street" interests, and the great corporations associated with them. It might almost be termed a superdirectorate of American business. A considerable proportion of the members have a clear-cut, selfish interest in blocking the St. Lawrence development, either as a navigation or a power enterprise, and this interest is far from being identified with the general interest, either of the people of New York or of the country as a whole.

Fifth. The 510 listed as bankers include in their number 64 who are also railroad directors and 36 who are directors of important utilities interested in electric power. Thus the railroad and power interests have a considerably larger representation in the chamber than the original list would indicate.

Sixth. J. P. Morgan & Co. alone accounts for 13 members of the chamber, including J. Pierpont Morgan himself, Henry S. Morgan, Junius S. Morgan, Jr., Thomas W. Lamont, Thomas S. Lamont, Henry P. Davison, E. T. Stotesbury, Charles Steele, Thomas Cochran, R. C. Leffingwell, Harold Stanley, George Whitney, and Francis D. Bartow.

Seventh. Kuhn, Loeb & Co. are represented by Otto Kahn, J. J. Hanauer, and William Wiseman.

Eighth. The big public-utility interests which have been committing American business to opposition to publicly owned utility projects are well represented.

Floyd L. Carlisle, chairman of the boards of the Niagara Hudson Power Corporation, the Consolidated Gas Co. of New York, and the New York Edison Co., is a member.

George B. Cortelyou, president of the Consolidated Gas Co., holding company for all the New York City electric properties, is a member.

Lewis Gawtry, who is a member of the chamber, is a trustee of Consolidated Gas Co. of New York and a director of its subsidiary electric companies, including New York Edison Co., United Electric Light & Power Co., Westchester Lighting Co., and Yonkers Electric Light & Power Co.

Donald G. Geddes, a member of the chamber, is trustee of Consolidated Gas Co. of New York, and director of New York Edison, United Electric Light & Power, New York & Queens Electric Light & Power, and so forth. Other trustees of Consolidated Gas in the list are Charles E. Mitchell and George Whitney of J. P. Morgan & Co.

Harold S. Sutton, assistant secretary both of Floyd L. Carlisle & Co. and Niagara Hudson Power Corporation, is a member.

Harold Stanley, already noted as a member of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., is also present as a director of Niagara Hudson, the United Corporation, the United Gas Improvement Co., and the Columbia Gas & Electric Co., representing Morgan's far-flung utility interests. Other Morgan partners appearing as utility directors are E. T. Stotesbury of United Gas Improvement, and George Whitney of Consolidated Gas.

John E. Aldred is a member of the chamber representing a considerable number of utility companies, including several Canadian companies directly interested in preventing the development of cheap power by public authorities in New York State. These are: Montreal Light, Heat & Power Co.; Cedar Rapids Manufacturing & Power Co.; Shawinigan Water Power Co.; and the Saguenay Transmission Co. Aldred is also a director of the Duke-Price Power Co. and the Pennsylvania Water & Power Co.

Ninth. The Henry L. Doherty interests, now actively pressing an application before the Federal Power Commission for the right of the American Super-Power Corporation to develop the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River for power, for private exploitation, have three representatives in the membership of the chamber of commerce, including W. Alton Jones, chairman of the executive committee of Henry L. Doherty & Co., as well as director of Cities Service and its subsidiaries; Arthur B. Leach, of A. B. Leach & Co., chairman of the executive committee of the American Super-Power Corporation, which is making the application; and J. M. McMillen, of the Henry L. Doherty and Cities Service Cos.

Tenth. Lewis E. Pierson, director of Electric Bond & Share Co. and the National Power & Light Co., discussed at considerable length by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] on May 4 in his remarks on the attitude of the United States Chamber of Commerce toward Muscle Shoals, is a member.

Eleventh. Other important utility men in the list are: Frank L. Dame, president of the North American Co.; Philip G. Gossler, president of the Columbia Gas & Electric Corporation and its subsidiaries; E. T. Stotesbury, a J. P. Morgan director of the United Gas Improvement Co.; Albert A. Tilney, chairman of the board of Bankers Trust Co., who is also director of American Gas & Electric Co., Electric Power & Light Corporation, and National Power & Light Co.; and Louis H. Seagrave, director of Standard Gas & Electric Co., Standard Power & Light Corporation, and United States Electric Power Corporation; Charles A. Stone, chairman of the board of Stone & Webster, and many others.

Twelfth. Eastern railroads, whose opposition to the St. Lawrence navigation scheme is founded on the fear that it might affect their traffic, are represented by such executives

Thirteenth. The roster of officers shows clearly the domination of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York by the financial interests of lower Manhattan. They include the president, who is James Brown of Brown Brothers, Harriman & Co.; director, among other corporations, of J. G. White Engineering Corporation and the Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co.

The vice presidents of the chamber are as follows: Charles M. Schwab, the Bethlehem Steel and the Chase National Bank; John D. Rockefeller, Jr.; Ernest Iselin, trustee of the Central Hanover Bank & Trust Co., and director of a large number of railroad and other corporations; P. A. S. Franklin, director of the National City Bank, the International Mercantile Marine, the Engineers Public Service Co., and numerous other corporations; Franklin Q. Brown, director of Harriman National Bank & Trust Co., J. G. White & Co., and numerous other corporations; Arthur Curtis James, probably the largest owner of railroads in the country, director of Phelps-Dodge Corporation, and trustee of the United States Trust Co.; Fred H. Ecker, president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., and director of the Chase National Bank, and of numerous other corporations, including Consolidated Gas Co. of New York; James Speyer of Speyer & Co., director of the Bank of Manhattan, and numerous other corporations; William L. DeBost, director of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., and numerous other corporations; Patrick E. Crowley, referred to above; James S. McCulloh, president of the New York Telephone Co.; Jeremiah Milbank, director of the Chase National Bank, and of numerous other corporations.

Fourteenth. Altogether the officers of the chamber of commerce represent over 225 separate offices or directorships. Including the executive committee more than 350 corporate offices and directorships are accounted for.

Fifteenth. Junius S. Morgan, Jr., of J. P. Morgan & Co., quite fittingly holds the office of treasurer.

The hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency show how extensively the influence of J. P. Morgan & Co. operates throughout the membership of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York.

Three of the vice presidents of the New York Chamber of Commerce were purchasers of the Alleghany stock distributed by J. P. Morgan & Co. at $20 a share when it was selling to the public at a price as high as $35 a share.

P. A. S. Franklin, Arthur Curtiss James, and Frederick H. Ecker were each allotted 1,000 shares at this "ground-floor price."

This meant a gratuity of $15,000 each to these three vice presidents of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York.

In addition, Junius S. Morgan, Jr., the treasurer of the organization, received 8,000 shares of the Alleghany stock, or a gratuity of $120,000.

Forty-seven members of the New York Chamber of Commerce received Alleghany and Standard Brands stock distributed by J. P. Morgan & Co. They were alloted 235,000 Alleghany shares and 211,620 Standard Brands shares. Thus, a gratuity of $5,130,760 was distributed by J. P. Morgan & Co. among the membership of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York.

This is the organization which is the head and front of the opposition to the St. Lawrence project. It is this little group of Wall Street bankers and public-utility officials which is resisting the policy of President Roosevelt's administration to develop the St. Lawrence for power and navigation, and which is appealing to Members of this body to betray party pledges by blocking and defeating the pending treaty.

J. P. Morgan & Co. has a direct interest in the defeat of the St. Lawrence treaty. This great banking house holds dominion over an empire composed of the chief trunk-line railroads and public-utility power corporations of the East. It has underwritten hundreds of millions of dollars in railroad and power securities.

The House of Morgan is pursuing the narrow, shortsighted, and selfish policy of bottling up the interior of the United States and preventing or retarding its development by seeking to continue the obstruction to navigation existing today in the undeveloped International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River.

The development of this section of the river under the pending treaty is opposed by Morgan and allied interests (1) because it will break the transportation monopoly of the Morgan trunk-line roads running from Chicago to the seaboard; (2) because it will produce 1,100,000 horsepower, to be developed by a public agency, furnishing electricity at low rates, in competition with the Morgan-controlled power companies. This may explain why 13 of the partners of J. P. Morgan & Co. are participating as members of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York in its campaign to defeat the St. Lawrence treaty.

The people of the Middle West are in no mood today to tolerate this policy of obstruction. The House of Morgan with all its vast influence and wealth is not powerful enough to stand in the way of a public project that is vital to the development of this country. Forty-five million people cannot be cheated of their birthright and the forward movement in transportation and industry be sabotaged and then the people of the mid-continent be expected to submit to it forever.

There is another special interest which has a stake in the defeat of the St. Lawrence treaty—the Aluminum Co. of America, owned and controlled by the Mellon family.

During the hearings before the Foreign Relations Committee, the fact was developed that the Aluminum Co. is diverting 20,000 cubic second-feet of the waters of the St. Lawrence to its plant at Massena, N.Y., for the generation of hydroelectric power. The Aluminum Co. attempted to secure the right to divert one fourth of the entire American share of the flow of the St. Lawrence under the treaty, a right which was denied through the vigilance of the Power Authority of the State of New York.

The passage of the joint resolution which has already been voted by the House and the ratification of the pending treaty will extinguish the diversion which is today being exercised by the Aluminum Co. of America at Massena, N.Y. Every day that ratification is delayed the Aluminum Co. is enriched by the diversion of the waters of the St. Lawrence, for which it does not pay a dollar into the Federal Treasury.

It may be said in passing that the Aluminum Co., later in combination with the General Electric and the Du Pont interests, sought for more than a quarter of a century to obtain control of the water-power rights which are vested by the pending joint resolution, in perpetuity, in the people of the State of New York.

TREATY PROVIDES PROJECT OF INCOMPARABLE SERVICE TO LARGE POPULATION WITH ENORMOUS POTENTIAL TRAFFIC

Mr. President, no other inland waterway can compare with the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project as regards either the population which will be served or the existing and potential traffic which will utilize this route. The area which will be directly benefited by the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway has a population of 45,000,000, or more than one third of the total population of the United States. This area includes not only the richest agricultural sections of the entire country but some of the most highly developed industrial districts.

This great region is unique because it is the only section in all the world located a thousand miles from the sea which ever has been able to attain a high degree of civilization and industrial advancement.

It has reached this position partly because its exceptionally rich soil for many years provided a surplus of agricultural products so cheap that they could bear the burden of heavy transportation costs and still yield a profit to the producers. Today this entire section is languishing because its land-locked position makes it impossible for it to compete with the more newly developed agricultural districts in the Argentine and Australia which are able to transport their products in ocean-going ships.

The handicap of these Middle Western and Northwestern States would be even greater if it were not for the fact that they are able to utilize the natural waterways of the Great Lakes for at least a part of the distance over which their products must be transported to reach the primary markets. It is impossible to estimate the value of the Great Lakes system to the producers of this great inland empire. It has not only given them a direct water route by which they could reach some of the most populous sections of the United States at low transportation costs, but has exercised a constantly restraining influence upon railroad rates for domestic and export shipments.

TREATY PROVIDES FOR COMPLETION OF WORK IN PROGRESS FOR CENTURY

Among those who have not studied the waterways embraced within the Great Lakes system, there seems to be an idea that the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway project contemplates a new and novel undertaking whose prospects and potentialities are entirely unknown.

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway has in fact been in process of development for more than a century. This is the hundredth anniversary of the opening of the first Welland Canal in 1833 which made it possible for boats and barges drawing less than 8 feet of water to surmount the theretofore unsurpassable barrier of Niagara Falls. For more than a century the Governments of the United States and Canada have been engaged in opening up this great natural waterway system to commerce and navigation. By slow degrees it has now been developed until it carries approximately 90 percent of all the commerce which moves over the inland waterways of the United States. Through the Soo Canals alone, which were opposed by the reactionaries of the last century, there now moves in normal years a commerce greater than that of the Panama and Suez Canals combined.

As a result of the cooperation of the United States and Canada, there has been available for more than a generation a channel with a minimum depth of 14 feet from the head of the Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean. But this has been accessible only to barges and small ships, and the commerce has consequently been greatly restricted. Nevertheless, the utilization even of this restricted waterway had steadily increased until in 1928 a total of 8,400,000 tons was recorded as passing through the 14-foot canals of the St. Lawrence, the shallowest and consequently the least used portion of the waterway as it stands today.

We have, therefore, an already developed waterway covering the 2,200 miles from Superior and Duluth to the Atlantic, upon which large sums have already been expended by the United States and Canada, and whose actual and potential traffic is well known. Today, as everyone who has studied the subject knows, there exists a 27-foot channel, capable of being navigated by all but the largest types of ocean freighters, which extends from Superior and Duluth on the west to Prescott and Ogdensburg, N.Y., on the east. All that remains to enable the 45,000,000 people in the area tributary to the Great Lakes to have effective access to the oceans of the world is the opening up of a similar 27-foot channel in the stretch of less than 100 miles extending from Ogdensburg, N.Y., to Montreal.

ONLY ONE BARRIER TO DEEP NAVIGATION BLOCKS MIDCONTINENT FROM SEA

The States of the Middle West have waited patiently for the removal of this last barrier which blocks their access to the Atlantic Ocean. They have seen the barriers which formerly existed in the rapids at Sault Ste. Marie removed by the development of a magnificent system of canals. They have seen the channels of the St. Clair and Detroit Rivers widened, and have witnessed the enormous development of traffic which has grown up as a result. They have watched with admiration while Canada surmounted the obstacle of Niagara Falls by building the new Welland Canal, with its system of locks by which vessels are raised from the level of Lake Ontario to that of Lake Erie, a height of 326 feet.

The last great barrier, consisting of the rapids that lie between Ogdensburg and Montreal, cannot be removed except by international cooperation. That is why the treaty which is now before the Senate has been negotiated. It provides a means by which the Governments of the United States and Canada can join in the completion of this great project, and by which they can also balance the accounts of the expenditures which each Nation has heretofore made separately in the furtherance of this common end.

COSTS OF PROJECT DIVIDED EVENLY BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND CANADA

The United States is a Nation of 120,000,000 people, while Canada has only about 10,000,000. The population in the area of the United States which will be directly benefited by the completion of the waterway comprises some 45,000,000 persons, while the corresponding Canadian area has a population of about 5,000,000. There are a dozen or more great industrial cities located on the Great Lakes within the United States, whereas Canada has only two. Finally, the expenditures already made by Canada in the furtherance of this joint undertaking are many times as great as those which have been made by the United States.

The treaty provides a division of the total costs of the entire waterway project between the United States and Canada on approximately a 50–50 basis, in which both countries are credited with the amounts already expended for works which will be utilized as a part of the completed waterway.

The joint board of engineers, representing the United States and Canada, estimates costs, past and future, of the entire waterway and power project at a total of $543,429,000. This covers the cost, past and future, of the entire waterway from Superior and Duluth to Montreal, and in addition the cost of developing 2,200,000 horsepower of electricity in the International Rapids section.

This is not a statement of the new funds that will be required. It is rather a balance sheet which was set up in order that both the United States and Canada may be credited with the expenditures which each has made on works which will become an integral part of the completed waterway. In this balance sheet Canada is credited with expenditures already made for the construction of the new Welland Canal, and the United States is credited with amounts expended in the improvement of the upper Lake channels.

NET COST TO FEDERAL TREASURY $168,000,000

To gain a clear understanding of the obligations which the United States will assume under the pending treaty, we begin by first setting down the United States' share of the cost of past and present works in the development of the waterway and power project, which is fixed at $272,453,000, or approximately one half of the total cost. From this must be deducted $14,461,000 for expenditures already made by the United States on works which will form a part of the waterways.

This leaves the sum of $257,992,000 as the aggregate of new funds to be provided from the United States. That is every dollar that it will cost the people of the United States to complete this project in new funds. But of this amount New York has already agreed to pay the cost of the power works to be constructed within her boundaries, of which she will receive the benefit. This is fixed in the joint resolution, which has passed the House and is now pending before the Senate, at $89,726,000; and if it had not been for the filibustering tactics of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], that joint resolution would now be on the statute books.

The net cost to the Federal Government to complete the entire waterway project will, therefore, be only $168,266,000 in new funds. This sum will be spread over a period of years and cannot impose a large immediate drain upon the Federal Treasury.

In return for this expenditure there will be created a deep waterway, accessible to ocean-going vessels, without a parallel anywhere on the face of the globe. Although the entire length of the waterway from Duluth-Superior to Montreal will be 1,200 miles, ships will be able to steam at full speed over more than 99 percent of the entire distance of 2,200 miles from Duluth-Superior to the Atlantic. The total length of all the canals combined will be 55 miles. This may be compared with the 102 miles of the Suez Canal and the 50 miles of the Panama Canal. Through its 27-foot channels all but the largest types of ocean vessels will be able to reach every port on the Great Lakes and thus reduce transportation costs not only for the Lake States but all the States of the Middle West and Northwest.

ECONOMIC BENEFITS FROM ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT CONCEDED

I cannot at this late hour elaborate upon the economic gains that will result from completion of the St. Lawrence waterway.

The benefits that will accrue to the grain growers of the Mississippi Valley and the Northwest were conceded by every impartial witness who appeared before the committee. Every wheat farmer knows that the cost of transportation is a determining factor not only in the price which he receives for his product, but in his ability to dispose of his surplus.

The farm price is the Liverpool price less the cost of transportation. The ability to market surplus grains is absolutely determined by the price at which those grains can be laid down in primary markets in this country and abroad.

The American grain grower, with his more efficient and highly organized methods, can compete on fairly equal terms with the rest of the world so far as the bare costs of production are concerned. But he cannot pay the costs of transporting his grain a thousand miles or more all-rail or rail-and-water and compete with grain growers who have only a short haul to deep water.

The commission appointed by President Coolidge to study the entire St. Lawrence project reported, in 1926, that—

> With the completion of such a shipway as the St. Lawrence, the freight rates on grain to world markets would be substantially reduced, and as a consequence the price level of all grains in the Lakes transportation area would be increased accordingly. Much the same type of economic reaction would affect other commodities and industries. It has been estimated that the values in a single year to the farmers alone would equal the capital cost of the waterway.

DAIRY AND MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES WILL SHARE BENEFITS WITH GRAIN FARMERS

The savings on grain would be only a small part of the total economic advantages to be derived from the waterway. Meat products of the United States are competing with the meat products of the Argentine and other countries for the European markets. They are now handicapped by the excessively high transportation cost which they must carry in reaching these markets. The same is true of the dairy products of my own State of Wisconsin, as well as those of northern New York and other States. They have the keenest possible competition from Denmark and other countries. If their products could be transported to the European markets by water without transshipment, they could compete effectively and relieve the American markets of the surpluses which have brought distress to all producers.

Advantages as great, if not greater, would accrue also to the manufacturers in the great cities in the basin of the Great Lakes. The hearings before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations are filled with examples showing the savings that could be obtained from the shipment of automobiles, agricultural implements, and other machinery by this route. In the case of rubber and other raw materials not produced in the United States which must necessarily be imported the savings would be enormous.

BENEFITS TO NEW ENGLAND ESTABLISHED BY TRADE SURVEY

The advantages to the area directly tributary to the Great Lakes are so great that there is danger of overlooking the fact that benefits of almost equal importance would be secured by other sections of the country. The New England States, for example, created a special committee, including many of their leading business men, to study the effect of the St. Lawrence waterway upon that section. After an elaborate study they reported in 1928 that the waterway would be of unquestioned benefit to every New England State.

I have adverted to the results of that study. As I stated, the committees broke up into State units, and then, meeting in joint session, voted on every occasion unanimously that this project would prove of inestimable benefit to every one of the New England States.

To summarize their position:

They unanimously recommended that the project should be completed because it would mean:

First. Lower transportation costs on food supplies, hence a lower cost of living;

Second. Lower freight rates on many of the raw materials required by New England's industries; and Third. Lower freight rates to many markets for New England's products.

PROJECT MEANS EXTENSION OF COASTWISE TRADE

Expert witnesses before the Committee on Foreign Relations testified that there was no reason why the ships which now carry such an enormous traffic between the Atlantic and the Pacific should not extend their routes to the Lake ports when the St. Lawrence waterway is opened. This would give them a greatly increased market for their own products and the trade which would develop would increase the prosperity of all.

But, it may be said, if such a traffic as is here forecast should develop, will it not add seriously to the difficulties of the railroads? It is true, of course, that during the present depression, the railroads have been suffering from a lack of freight tonnage. But it is equally true that, during years of normal traffic, our present railroad facilities are overburdened. Hardly a mile of new, main-line track has been built in the United States since the World War. It is probable that no new mileage will be added during the several years that must elapse before the St. Lawrence waterway is completed. By that time, with the normal growth of available tonnage the railroads will be swamped, unless alternative methods of transportation are developed.

RAILROADS OPPOSED TO PROJECT SEEK CANCELATION OF $350,000,000 DEBT TO TREASURY

The railroads are now bitterly protesting against every expenditure of public money for the development of waterways and highways. They have apparently forgotten the huge land grants and other subsidies which they received from the Federal Government, the States, the counties, and municipalties.

The railroads and allied banking interests are now before Congress, and have succeeded in passing, through this body, a bill which will result in the cancelation of the debt of $350,000,000 of excess earnings which the roads owe to the Federal Treasury under the terms of the Esch-Cummins law.

This gratuity to the railroads would be more than enough to pay the net cost to the Federal Treasury of two St. Lawrence waterways.

If the railroads are to continue their policy of attempted obstruction toward every waterway project, how can they expect those States which are interested in the development of this alternative method of transportation to assist them in the difficulties which they have encountered as a result of the depression and their own mismanagement?

MAJORITY OF NATION'S RAILROADS WILL BENEFIT FROM WATERWAY

The fact is that with the possible exception of three or four Morgan controlled trunk lines running between Chicago and New York City, the railroads of the country as a whole will suffer no competition from the waterway and most of them will increase their traffic and greatly improve their service as a direct result of its completion.

During the committee hearings letters were produced from the president of every railroad running west from the Lakes to the Pacific coast advocating the St. Lawrence waterway.

These letters were written prior to the fall of 1932, when the presidents of the western roads were induced by violent opposition of eastern railroad and banking interests to cease their active advocacy of the project.

There is no question about it, Mr. President; the facts are indisputable. Every president of every railroad operating west of the Great Lakes region had been actively in support of this treaty until it was negotiated, and it was generally known that both President Hoover and President Roosevelt were committed to its ratification. Then it was that the eastern railroads, in the executive association, put pressure upon the western railroads and forced them to withdraw their support of this project. I submit that their deliberate conclusion, arrived at after careful study of the project, is the one which should be given credence and not their position taken after they were put under pressure to recant.

On November 17, 1932, the president of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad said in a speech at Boston (pp. 655 and 656, hearings):

While the St. Lawrence waterway will have no serious effect upon the revenues of New England's railroads, it is an unjustified expenditure of the taxpayers' money and another evidence of the tendency on the part of the Government to spend millions constructing artificial waterways which displace our existing transportation facilities.

Prior to the delivery of this speech and other attacks upon the waterway by eastern banking and railroad interests, the presidents of the western railroads advocated the project in letters on file with the Committee on Foreign Relations, from which I quote:

E. Pennington, president Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co., October 28, 1920:

* * * as for the benefits to be derived if the St. Lawrence project were put through, I think it would be a great thing for the Northwest and Canada to shorten the rail haul. It would have the same beneficial effect on the Northwest as the Panama Canal has had on Pacific coast cities and Coast States. * * * Looking to the future of this great Northwest, which is not over half developed, the transportation lines that we have at the present time cannot handle the products of this country. * * *

C. T. Jaffrey, president Minneapolis, St. Paul & Sault Ste. Marie Railway Co., August 15, 1932:

* * * Personally, I feel the completion of this waterway will be of benefit to these Northwestern States, and anything that is of benefit to them must be of benefit to the railroads operating throughout the territory. * * *

H. E. Byram, president Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co., July 12, 1932:

There is no doubt to the extent that vessels moving through the canal would carry grain and grain products from the Middle West, that there would be an advantage to the railroads serving lake ports in the release of their cars at such ports rather than on the Atlantic coast.

H. A. Scandrett, president Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co., July 2, 1929:

The movement in volume of export and import traffic from and to eastern termini of western railroads would unquestionably be of benefit to those railroads and the territory they serve.

Charles Donnelly, Northern Pacific Railway Co., May 15, 1925:

* * * The Northwestern railroads have always recognized the advantage of transportation via the Lakes in connection with the eastbound movement of grain, lumber, copper, and other products of their territory. The necessary breaking of bulk at the lake port permits prompt release and return of cars to loading points, and to the extent the lake route is utilized we have an independent railroad operation and thus escape the losses which often attend the delayed return of cars by connecting railroads.

F. W. Sargent, president Chicago & North Western Railroad, September 17, 1925:

* * * The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway will help the Middle West. Anything that will help promote the prosperity of the inland empire lying between the Alleghenies and the Rockies will help the railroads and will be of inestimable value to the entire country.

October 27, 1926:

* * * A direct ocean route from this interior territory to trans-Atlantic markets would stimulate industrial and agricultural growth with resulting benefits to all classes of business, including that of railroad transportation in the region thus benefited.

Ralph Budd, president Great Northern Railway Co., December 7, 1920:

The benefits accruing to the middle and northwestern sections of the United States as a result of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence tidewater project cannot help being apparent to anyone who has given the subject consideration.

The success with which lake-and-rail movement of ore and coal is carried on serves as a splendid illustration of what could be done in a larger way with the tidewater project carried out so that exporting could be carried on freely from this great middle and northwestern territory directly from the termini of the rail lines which serve the territory. * * *

W. G. Bierd, Chicago & Alton Railroad Co., August 2, 1923:

With our own American roads west of the Great Lakes, of what we generally term the "central western lines", there can be nothing to lose and everything to gain. We of the Central West would still have our eastern connections to handle all-rail commodities, but in times of congestion or times of shortage of equipment, we would also have the waterway, which of course can only mean a more profitable and prosperous condition.

But the completion of this deep waterway could only be advantageous to the central western roads, although I appreciate this is partly a selfish view, that we might prosper to the loss or detriment of certain eastern lines. However, if I believed this to be true, I would not advocate it; but, in the end, I do believe that the eastern roads will not suffer by such a water route; in other words, I view this largely as does Sir Henry Thornton.

PROJECT ESSENTIAL IF WE ARE TO COMPETE WITH OTHER NATIONS DEVELOPING THEIR WATERWAYS

The effect of the development of the St. Lawrence project upon the industries of the lake region and its necessity to enable us to compete with foreign nations was well stated by Governor Leslie, of Indiana, in an address at Chicago, January 13, 1932 (p. 756, hearings). He said:

The Calumet area is the industrial center of America. Indiana has some 40 miles of lake frontage on the southern end of Lake Michigan which reaches down into the heart of the richest area in the world. While the lake frontage is small, it is the most important harbor project on Lake Michigan. * * *

From the experience of others nations in the construction of ship canals there can be no reasonable doubt as to the advantages of the proposed canal nor as to the absolute necessity of it. England spent hundreds of millions of dollars to bring Manchester to the sea, and her greatness is largely due to her overseas commerce. Germany, through the Kiel Canal, and a network of waterways that connect her industrial centers with the sea, has conclusively demonstrated the vital importance of bringing the sea to her manufacturing centers in order to enable them to compete for the markets of the world.

This project brings seagoing ships to the center of industry, it reaches the richest agricultural region of the world, it brings the world markets a thousand miles closer to the sources of production, it cheapens the cost of transportation both domestic and foreign. Its immediate construction is of vital importance to the economic life of the greater part of our country and should be hastened with the greatest possible speed.

POWER PROJECT WILL BENEFIT CONSUMERS OF ENTIRE NATION

Under the pending treaty, direct advantages will accrue to the people of the Northeastern section of the United States from the development of the water power resources of the St. Lawrence through a public agency.

The St. Lawrence provides the greatest and most dependable source of cheap electricity within reach of a developed market anywhere in the world. Its development will not only prevent the continued migration of American industries to Canada in search of cheap power, but will have a profound influence upon the rates paid by private consumers for electricity throughout the United States. For more than a quarter of a century the private utilities, now dominated by the Morgan group, have sought to secure control of this incomparable natural resource. They can succeed only if the treaty and the joint resolution, which are now pending before the Senate, are defeated.

Mr. President, the development of this water power will be adjacent to one of the greatest industrial sections of the world. There is no question about the market for this stupendous block of power. The market is there. It does not have to be developed. It is waiting to take every kilowatt of electricity which will be produced by this project.

At Muscle Shoals, at Boulder Dam, and at many other places where public power is proposed to be generated, the markets have to be developed, but within transmission distance of the international rapids section of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway development the market for the electricity, both industrial and domestic, is waiting and anxious to take every kilowatt of electricity produced.

APPEAL TO SECTIONALISM INVOKED AGAINST THE TREATY

It is clear from statements which have already been made on the floor of the Senate that an appeal to sectionalism is relied upon to defeat the pending treaty.

The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has stated he is opposed to the treaty because he believes it would injure the ports of New York. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] has denounced the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway on the ground that it would be prejudicial to the interests of the port of New Orleans and to other Gulf ports. Others have contended that the development of this project would be inimical to the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway. An appeal has also been made to Senators from States bordering on the Atlantic coast, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Pacific coast on the ground that the opening up of the waterway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic would in some way be injurious to the seaports in those States.

This note of sectionalism which has been injected into the debates by the opponents of the treaty appears to me most unfortunate.

Heretofore, when proposals were under consideration for the development of our inland waterways, we have had to contend against the powerful railroad interests inimical to the development of this form of transportation. But we have not been faced with attempts on the part of Senators to create opposition to the development of inland waterways on grounds of sectional prejudice. All those who have believed in the development of our waterways as an alternative means of transportation have stood together in securing the development of the Ohio River, the Mississippi River, the Missouri River, the Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway, the intracoastal canals, the Panama Canal, the harbors on the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts, and a score of other projects. We have not asked whether they would immediately hurt our own particular States and sections, but have given them our whole-hearted support in the conviction that whatever will benefit the trade of the country as a whole must inevitably redound to the prosperity of every section.

CONGRESS HAS SUPPORTED OTHER PROJECTS, REGARDLESS OF SECTIONALISM

I find by consulting the last Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army that up to June 30, 1932, the Federal Government has appropriated for seacoast harbors and channels $633,700,138, for the Mississippi River system $455,523,607, and for intracoastal canals and other waterways $115,591,825. In addition we have appropriated for flood control on the Mississippi River and its tributaries $309,348,351, making a total expenditure for the Mississippi system of three quarters of a billion dollars.

When the project for flood control on the Mississippi River was under consideration I was a member of the Committee on Commerce. The question came up as to whether or not the administration's proposal that the States must furnish the cost of the rights of way for those projects for flood control should prevail, it so happened that I cast the deciding vote in that committee to make the Federal Government bear the entire cost of furnishing the rights of way and the easements for those projects. I recite this history merely to acquit myself of ever having taken a narrow, a selfish, or a sectional attitude in relation to the question of the development of our common country.

The total appropriations up to June 30, 1932, for all harbors and channels in the entire Great Lakes system amounted to $204,466,629. This is roughly only 16 percent of our total appropriations for inland waterways, exclusive of seacoast harbors and channels, although 90 percent of our total domestic commerce moves on the Great Lakes.

I wish also to insert at this point a statement from the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the St. Lawrence waterway (p. 529) showing the amount of Government expenditures up to June 30, 1931, in the development of certain ports which are now being used as centers of propaganda against the development of the Great Lakes-Atlantic Ocean waterway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Statement showing Government expenditures in selected harbors and channels up to June 30, 1931

New York		$58,393,978
Ambrose Channel	$5,637,458
New York and New Jersey Channel	12,804,800
Hudson River in New York Harbor	4,250,940
Bay Ridge and Red Hook Channels	5,790,042
East River	27,179,624
Harlem River	2,731,114
Philadelphia, 101 miles inland		52,807,596
Baltimore, 158 miles inland		13,633,490
New Orleans, 110 miles inland		35,629,705
Houston, 50 miles inland		16,139,653
Portland, 113 miles inland		11,483,591
Total, six seacoast ports		188,088,013
Hudson River up to Waterford (includes Ten Eyck's estimate of $11,200,000 for bringing ocean ships 150 miles up to Albany)		18,265,494
Buffalo		8,688,671

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In all, the Federal Government has appropriated for river and harbor work and flood control a grand total of $1,939,777,076.

Mr. President, does anyone believe that these vast appropriations, which have been essential to the development of our foreign and domestic commerce, would have been made if every project had been confronted with the prejudice of all other sections which would not be helped and might remotely be injured by the development in question?

Does anyone believe that the Panama Canal, which is necessary for our commerce and vital to our national defense, would ever have been constructed if those States which could see no direct benefit to themselves in the project had banded together, formed a battalion of death, and resorted to a determined filibuster to thwart its consideration?

Does anyone believe that three quarters of a billion dollars would have been expended for the improvement of the Mississippi and its tributaries if it had been anticipated that Senators from States which received these benefits would now oppose the completion of another great inland waterway that promises a measure of equality to another section?

SECTIONALISM DOOMS ALL FUTURE WATERWAY DEVELOPMENT

On the contrary, it is clear that our rivers and harbors would still be in a primitive condition and our foreign and domestic commerce would be undeveloped if such a spirit of sectionalism had prevailed in this Chamber in the past.

It must be evident to everyone who is interested in the development of our waterways and the provision of adequate facilities for our foreign and domestic commerce, that the growth of such a spirit must inevitably doom all such undertakings. If one or more sections of the country are to assume a dog-in-the-manger attitude toward projects which they believe will not be directly beneficial to themselves, they should understand that retaliation is inevitable. They cannot band themselves together to deprive the States interested in the development of the St. Lawrence waterway of the advantages of this outlet to the oceans and ports of the world and expect the Senators from those States to continue to support the projects in which the opponents of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty are interested.

The spirit of sectionalism, once invoked effectively in this Chamber, will defeat every useful and necessary waterway project that may be proposed hereafter.

The banking interests and the railroads and utilities they control are quick to seize upon such opportunities to play off one section against another. They have already opposed the developments at Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam and on the lower Mississippi, taking advantage of the spirit of sectionalism.

MID-CONTINENT SEEKS PARITY, NOT SPECIAL ADVANTAGE

The completion of the St. Lawrence project does not present a case of expending Federal funds to give exclusively to one section an advantage over other sections. This project gives to the Northeast the benefits of a power development larger than Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam combined. It provides that the last remaining obstacle in a great natural waterway shall be removed to give the interior of the continent an approach to the advantages now enjoyed by cities on the coast. Thus, the mid-continent is seeking parity, not special advantages at the expense of other sections.

Denial of this equality cannot be defended except on the theory that hereafter New York should seek to hold back the development of ports like Boston, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, and the people of the Middle West, who have paid their share of the taxes for all these developments, should oppose every future expenditure for harbor improvements, deepening of channels, and flood control. Such a policy would mean the end of the economic development of the United States.

The true doctrine upon which we must proceed if we are to serve the national interest has been ably expressed by the governor of a southern State, commenting directly upon the St. Lawrence project.

> Anything that improves the condition of from forty to fifty million people of the United States will create markets for South Carolina's textiles, plywood, tobacco, and other products of the State. Also, the port of Charleston, with great Government-built wartime terminals and warehouses, uncongested, ice-free, with good ship connections to the world, and only about the same distance from Chicago as New York, can accommodate those few rush shipments during the period of closed navigation on the Lakes, over uncongested lines. * * * The opening of the Middle West to ocean ships may lose some tonnage for South Carolina ports, but the increased prosperity of the Great Lakes area will create new business for the State as a whole.

Mr. President, I appeal to my colleagues in the Senate to reject all arguments against the St. Lawrence waterway, which are based upon appeals to sectional advantage, and to view the question from a broad, national standpoint.

PROJECT IS VITAL PART OF PUBLIC-WORKS PROGRAM

It has taken more than 10 years for the two Governments to arrive at the terms of the pending treaty. If it should now be rejected, or if its ratification here or in Canada should be unduly delayed, another decade might elapse before another understanding could be effected.

One of the most pressing reasons for immediate action is that this great project is a vital part of the national public-works program. It should be built now when millions of men are out of work and when the materials required for its construction can be purchased advantageously. The basic engineering plans for its construction have been worked out after years of study and investigation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield, but I am anxious to conclude.

Mr. LONG. I just do not want the Senator to be living in a fool's paradise. Practically all this work is to be done in Canada.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is just another matter as to which the Senator is mistaken; there is nothing in the hearings to justify the statement.

Mr. LONG. I did not know but that the Senator may have been talking about the Canadian public-works program.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is nothing in the hearings or in the treaty to justify the Senator's statement that a great portion of the money is going to be expended in Canada.

Mr. LONG. About 90 percent of it is going to be expended in Canada, according to the figures I have here.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator's figures are wrong, like many of his other figures.

Mr. LONG. The figures show that from 80 to 90 percent of it is to be expended in Canada, and that from 80 to 90 percent of the money expended is to be American money.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Those figures are not in conformity with the record, they are not in conformity with the testimony of the Army engineers nor of any other reliable statements that I know about in the more than a thousand pages of testimony.

Thousands of men can be put to work within the near future and the materials required for the dams, locks, and other works will stimulate the chief of our basic industries.

If we do not ratify this treaty at the present session, the western farmers and manufacturers will have their hopes for cheap water rates once more deferred; the people of the Northeast will be deprived of a million horsepower of cheap electricity, and the unemployed, who might be given work by this great undertaking, will continue to walk the streets.

It is now almost a year since the treaty between the United States and Canada was signed. The Committee on Foreign Relations has conducted an investigation at which both the opponents and the supporters of the waterway were heard at great length. That committee, in both the last and the present session, has favorably reported the treaty to the Senate, on both occasions with only 2 dissenting votes. Representatives of the State of New York and the Federal Government have amicably agreed upon an equitable division of the cost of the works for navigation and power. A joint resolution, embodying that agreement and effectively safeguarding the public interest in the power development, has passed the House of Representatives and is now pending in the Senate.

Every official body of the United States Government and the Dominion of Canada that has ever investigated the question of creating the waterway and developing the power resources of the St. Lawrence, has reported in favor of the undertaking.

It has received the whole-hearted endorsement of every President of the United States who has been in office since the project reached the stage of official consideration.

President Harding, in his message transmitting to Congress the favorable report of the International Joint Commission, said:

> I have spoken of the advantage which Europe enjoys because of its access to the sea, the cheapest and surest transportation facility. In our own country is presented one of the world's most attractive opportunities for extension of the seaways many hundred miles inland. The heart of the continent, with its vast resources in both agriculture and industry, would be brought in communication with all the ocean routes by the execution of the St. Lawrence waterway project. To enable ocean-going vessels to have access to all the ports of the Great Lakes would have a most stimulating effect upon the industrial life of the continent's interior.
> The feasibility of the project is unquestioned and its cost, compared with some other great engineering works, would be small. Disorganized and prostrate, the nations of central Europe are even now setting their hands to the development of a great continental waterway which, connecting the Rhine and Danube, will bring water transportation from the Black to the North Sea, from the Mediterranean to the Baltic. If nationalistic prejudices and economic difficulties can be overcome by Europe, they certainly should not be formidable obstacles to an achievement less expensive and giving promise of greater advantages to the peoples of North America.

President Coolidge in his message to Congress at the opening of the session of December 1923, called attention to the needed improvement of the waterways from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico and to the development of the power and navigation possibilities of the St. Lawrence River for which "efforts are now being made to secure the necessary treaty with Canada."

Continuing his message, President Coolidge said:

> These projects cannot all be undertaken at once, but all should have the immediate consideration of Congress and be adopted as fast as plans can be matured and the necessary funds become available. This is not incompatible with economy, for their nature does not require so much a public expenditure as a capital investment which will be reproductive, as evinced by the marked increase in revenue from the Panama Canal. Upon these projects depend much future industrial and agricultural progress. They represent the protection of large areas from flood, and cheap freight by use of navigation, chief of which is the bringing of ocean-going ships to the Great Lakes.

President Hoover, in announcing the signing of the treaty, which is now before the Senate, said:

The signing of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty marks another step forward in this, the greatest internal improvement yet undertaken on the North American Continent. The treaty must yet be ratified by the legislative bodies of the two Governments and is not effective unless this is done. * * *

Its completion will have a profoundly favorable effect upon the development of agriculture and industry throughout the Midwest. The large by-product of power will benefit the Northeast. These benefits are mutual with the great Dominion to the north.

The waterway will probably require 10 years for completion, during which time normal growth in traffic in the Nation will far more than compensate for any diversions from American railways and other American port facilities. The economic gains from improved transportation have always benefited the whole people. * * *

The project is of first importance to the whole continent. The many and extremely complex engineering, legal, commercial, and international problems have been worked out by the representatives of both countries in a spirit of cooperation of which all North America can be justly proud.

Recently, Mr. President, in company with the junior Senator from Michigan, the junior Senator from Wisconsin, the Senator from Minnesota, and Members of the House of Representatives, we called upon President Roosevelt and urged upon him the importance of the ratification of this treaty at the present session of Congress, and also the advisability of that action being taken in order that this project might be included in the public-works program. He stated to us that he had not changed his position upon the treaty one iota, and that he hoped and expected to see it ratified at this session of Congress.

TREATY SHOULD BE RATIFIED AT PRESENT SESSION

There is no reason why the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway should be longer delayed. The treaty should be ratified at the present session of the Senate, so that the construction of the waterway and the power plants may be made a part of the administration's public-works program.

Mr. President, we have waited patiently during all these years for an opportunity for the consummation of this project. We feel that we are entitled to a fair consideration of this treaty upon its merits, and I may say, Mr. President, that we feel we are entitled to that consideration at this session of Congress.

On behalf of the 45,000,000 people who will be benefited by the completion of this waterway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean and in the interest of the 15,000,000 people of the Northeast who live in the zone within which the St. Lawrence power may be economically distributed, I appeal to Senators to lay aside all sectional prejudices and to consider the inestimable value of this undertaking to the entire Nation. Let us take up this treaty at the first opportunity and debate it at such length as may be necessary to establish the facts and clear up any points of misunderstanding; but let us, before this session adjourns, dispose of this matter for all time. I wish to say, Mr. President, that in every possible way I am going to insist upon a fair consideration of this treaty and a vote upon it at this session of Congress.

Mr. LONG obtained the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that there may be inserted in the body of the RECORD at this point a letter received by me today from the Rochester (N.Y.) Chamber of Commerce, attached to which is the report of the Port of Rochester Committee. This is a very broad-minded and generous statement of the issue involved in the debate of this day relating to the proposed St. Lawrence deep waterway.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ROCHESTER CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Rochester, N.Y., May 26, 1933.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: The board of trustees of the Rochester Chamber of Commerce at its meeting this week unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"That the Senate of the United States be requested to delay the adoption of the St. Lawrence Treaty until an impartial survey can be made by the Board of Rivers and Harbors engineers of the traffic which the United States may reasonably expect to move via the St. Lawrence route, to show the savings and benefits, as well as disadvantages, to the United States therefrom; that the Board determine definitely the annual costs of operation and maintenance and the possibility of making the project self-liquidating within a reasonable period of years; also study of such other factors as are essential to the determination of the wisdom of undertaking this development under the present economic conditions and trends."

This action is based upon a comprehensive study of and report on the St. Lawrence project by our port of Rochester committee. This intensive fact-finding study was made by a special group of men eminently qualified from their experience in the transportation, harbors, waterways, and engineering fields to deal with a subject of this character. The complete report, approximately 100 pages in length, deals with the economic phases of the St. Lawrence waterway and power-development project. (See statement and conclusions attached.)

The conclusions reached in this exhaustive study, as approved by our board of trustees, are as follows:

"Our study of the St. Lawrence waterway and power project leads to the conclusion that deepening of the St. Lawrence River for improvement of navigation and the development of its power resources will in all probability ultimately follow in the future when it can be economically justified. There are, however, no compelling circumstances under present conditions which demand haste in prosecuting this great undertaking.

"While the studies of the United States engineers confirm the feasibility and practicability of developing the St. Lawrence for navigation and power, the independently made economic surveys of the early post-war periods were insufficient and did not afford adequate grounds for economic justification of the project. This lack of data on which to base conclusions favoring the project is now greatly emphasized by subsequent world-wide economic changes and the present trends. Such surveys now afford little proof of additional utilization of the St. Lawrence waterway nor market for the water power sufficient to warrant the proposed improvement, from the standpoint of the interests of the United States.

"The project during the period of construction and for many years thereafter cannot be carried on except at public expense borne by the taxpayer. There is no assurance of the project's becoming self-liquidating. There is undisputed evidence that the power plants will require years to become self-supporting, unless a large-scale industrial development takes place within the region of profitable distribution of the power, of which there is now no assurance. It is a known fact that there is at present considerable idle and reserve power capacity in New York and New England.

"It is also a fact that for every ton of freight transported over the waterway the taxpayer will contribute in overhead costs, for the benefit of shippers, an amount equal to $1 to $4 per ton, depending upon the particular estimate of tonnage which may be realized.

"There are indications that Canada may receive greater benefit from the improved waterway than the United States. The bulk of the tonnage is shown to be Canadian preferred grain, including that portion of Canadian grain traffic which has heretofore moved via the Buffalo-port of New York route. Any agreement obligating the United States to develop the St. Lawrence should take into consideration not only the preferential and adverse tariff restrictions operating against commerce and shipping of the United States and Canada but the possibility of flooding the Great Lakes area with highly competitive imports brought in at low cost by foreign-operated steamships, to the great disadvantage of United States and Canada whose shipping, industrial and labor conditions are on a much higher plane than those of many foreign competitors.

"There is every reason to believe that the additional traffic that will result from the improved St. Lawrence will be made up largely from tonnage diverted from existing routes, and that United States rail, canal, and lake carriers and Atlantic ports will adopt every possible measure to preserve their share of the available traffic. This competition is a factor which will have a bearing on the ultimate traffic for the deepened St. Lawrence route.

"The marked disagreement among authorities as to the extent which ocean shipping can economically utilize the improved St. Lawrence serves to emphasize the fact that a 27-foot channel would make Montreal a tidewater port accessible to lake shipping to the disadvantage of the port of New York and other United States ports.

"There are ample grounds for requiring the expense of the project to be borne by the interests directly benefiting from the facilities which it provides. The international shipping characteristics of the new seaway would justify the application of reasonable tolls, the same as applies to all shipping through the Panama or Suez Canals. Obviously foreign shipping of countries other than Canada docking in the heart of the continent should contribute something toward the expense of providing and maintaining the waterway.

"It is our opinion that the economic merits and justification of the large expenditure involved in the St. Lawrence waterway and power development have not been fully determined by the International Joint Commission and the boards of engineers, and that the economic justification of the project rests wholly upon the studies made by proponents 6 to 13 years ago, under conditions materially different from those which now confront the United States or are likely to prevail during the next decade. We adhere to the principle that under the existing stringency all expenditures for public works should be based upon reasonable assurance of their being self-liquidating. We believe that there should be a complete, up-to-date, impartial appraisal of the economic considerations involved in the project, from the standpoint of the United States, before the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty is approved by the Senate."

It is strikingly apparent from a careful review of the reports and data on the St. Lawrence project that the economic factors which justify an undertaking of this magnitude have received wholly inadequate consideration, and particularly so in light of changed conditions.

Our officers and trustees therefore urge that you continue to exert every possible influence to secure a delay in the adoption of the St. Lawrence Treaty, and that you make an earnest attempt to bring about an impartial, up-to-date survey by the Board of Rivers and Harbors Engineers of the economic justification of the St. Lawrence project under the existing conditions.

Yours very truly,

RICHARD R. WOODWARD,
Executive Vice President.

MEMORANDUM TO THE OFFICERS AND TRUSTEES

MAY 4, 1933.

The Port of Rochester Committee submits the attached report on the St. Lawrence waterway and power project. The committee unanimously approves the conclusions and recommendations of its special committee which has given several months' study to the important reports and data on the subject, including the reports of the New York State Power Authority and the St. Lawrence Power Development Commission of the State of New York. This special committee is: Frank H. Macy, chairman; John Handy; Roland O. Roberts; Fred'k. W. Burton, secretary.

The committee's conclusions are presented on pages 13 and 14, inclusive, of the report. The committee recommends that the chamber be placed on record as follows:

"That the Senate of the United States be requested to delay the adoption of the St. Lawrence Treaty until an impartial survey can be made by the Board of Rivers and Harbors Engineers of the traffic which the United States may reasonably expect to move via the St. Lawrence route, to show the savings and benefits, as well as disadvantages, to the United States therefrom; that the board determine definitely the annual costs of operation and maintenance and the possibility of making the project self-liquidating within a reasonable period of years; also study of such other factors as are essential to the determination of the wisdom of undertaking this development under the present economic conditions and trends."

Accompanying the report and conclusions are appendices identified as follows:

A. History of the St. Lawrence project.

B. The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty.

C. Description of the project and the principal provisions of the report of the joint board of engineers, April 9, 1932, upon which the St. Lawrence Treaty is based.

D. Political and public viewpoints in the United States.

E. What proponents say in support of the St. Lawrence waterway project.

F. What the opponents say against the St. Lawrence waterway project.

G. Distances—comparative distances lake ports to Liverpool.

H. Analysis of Great Lakes traffic.

I. The interest of New York State in the power development of the St. Lawrence.

Respectfully submitted.

PORT OF ROCHESTER COMMITTEE,
ARTHUR S. BLANCHARD, Chairman.
FRED'K. W. BURTON, Secretary.

THE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PORT OF ROCHESTER COMMITTEE

After many years of discussion of the matter of providing a deep-draft ship channel from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean, the diplomatic representatives of the United States and the Dominion of Canada on July 18, 1932, signed a treaty, the purpose of which is to "ensure the completion of the St. Lawrence waterway project." The matter of the ratification of this treaty is now before the Senate of the United States. If ratified by the Senate, the treaty will then be considered by the Canadian Parliament.

The agitation for this development originated largely in the western States immediately following the World War. The three principal arguments then advanced in favor of the project were that it is necessary for the relief from railroad congestion; that it would reduce freight rates and afford much-needed relief for the interior States; and that it would make possible the development of great power resources in the interest of New York and New England States.

A brief history of the St. Lawrence project is given in appendix A. A summary of the "Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty" is set forth in Appendix B. A description of the St. Lawrence project and the principal provisions of the reports of the Joint Board of Engineers, on which the treaty is based, are outlined in appendix C. The Board of Engineers declares that the construction of the navigation and power works would require 7 to 10 years.

No subject could be more controversial than the St. Lawrence project from the standpoint of its economic justification, and effect upon the various sections of the country. Among numerous outstanding authorities will be found those who favor and those who oppose the project. Unquestionably in the Western States much of the support of the project comes from the highly organized campaign of propaganda carried on by the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association, sometimes called the Council of States, and from political sources. (See Appendix D.) The arguments and conclusions relied upon by the leading proponents and opponents in their case for and against the project are summarized in appendices E and F.

Your committee is satisfied that if the project is basically and economically sound the findings of the joint engineering board upon which the treaty is based represent the best practical solution of the physical problem of developing the St. Lawrence for navigation and water power. These findings represent many years of study on the part of various engineering bodies, both governmental and private.

It is, therefore, in its broader aspects that your committee undertakes to outline a basis for a course of action with respect to the treaty as drawn, in the interest of Rochester, the State of New York, and the Nation at large.

Many of the controversial points that have been raised by local and interested parties have been given consideration by the representatives of the two nations, and they are no longer considered pertinent to the discussion. Among the more important of such items is the question as to whether a Great Lakes-ocean waterway should follow an all-American route and the adaptability of the project to shipping which is designed for ocean service. The findings of the International Joint Commission and the St. Lawrence Commission indicate that no merit should be given to objections on these scores.

There are two essential aspects of this problem: The development of water power and the improvement of navigation. Were the demand for power sufficiently urgent and if developed, it would devolve upon the promoters of the power to provide navigation facilities past the dams or through the canals they might construct and the expense of providing an ample waterway would be but nominal. On the other hand, the most economical method of providing the navigation facilities alone would prevent the most advantageous use of the potential power of the river. It is, therefore, incumbent upon these two interests to work in harmony for the ends they seek.

As suggested above, we believe that the physical elements of the problem have been adequately studied and a plan prepared which will meet the demands of maximum efficiency and economy. It is now up to the sound and sober judgment of the people of the two countries to determine whether they should embark upon the enterprise. The question must be answered by determining the country's need of the improvement and if it is necessary, whether it will justify the expense. There is little doubt of the ability of the two countries to finance the project if it is determined to be essential and a good business proposition at this time.

The most optimistic estimate which has been presented to the governmental authorities has indicated that some 30,000,000 tons of traffic would be available annually for the waterway, a study made by A. H. Ritter in 1925 for the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association. A second survey is that made by the Transportation Division of the United States Department of Commerce in 1927 which provides an estimate of 19,000,000 to 24,000,000 long tons. The present 14-foot draft St. Lawrence River canals handled the past 7 years an average of 6,725,237 tons per year. It would seem reasonable to assume, therefore, that the tonnage offered for the new canal would be somewhere between seven and thirty million tons per year.

When the project was first broached, over 13 years ago, it was estimated that the annual saving in handling grain alone would finance the cost. Since that time and in the immediate past few years factors have been working which have upset this argument. The United States is confronted with the closing of foreign markets to its products in general by high tariff walls and trade agreements such as Britain and her dominion and colonial provinces effected during the past year.

There is ample evidence that Canada will derive greater benefit from the improved waterway than the United States. In 1928 the St. Lawrence River canals moved 8,500,000 tons, 78 percent of which was eastbound traffic. Of this total, 72.5 percent originated in Canada and 27.5 percent in the United States. Of this movement, 5,350,000 tons consisted of grain, of which 75.5 percent—or 178,573,032 bushels—was Canadian grain. This grain constituted over 80 percent of the total eastbound tonnage. A considerable amount of Canadian grain has heretofore moved through Buffalo via the barge canal to New York or via rail to other United States ports for export. An interesting study of the origin of the grain which reaches the eastern Lake Erie ports is shown by official data from Transportation on the Great Lakes—1930, which appears in appendix H.

It is evident that the bulk of the tonnage to move over the improved St. Lawrence will be Canadian grain. With the continuance of the 6-cent per bushel preferential on Canadian grain the exportation of United States grain to Europe will be further diminished. On November 15, 1932, the British Parliament adopted a tariff law placing a duty of 2 shillings per quarter (6 cents per bushel at par) on wheat except of Canadian origin. The British customs authorities followed with a ruling that Canadian wheat must move on through consignment from a point in Canada to a point in the United Kingdom in order to be admitted duty free. As a result the movement of Canadian grain through Canadian ports has been greatly augmented by the diversion of Canadian wheat from the Buffalo port of New York route, and other United States routes. Canada's new shipping bill would also prohibit grain from being carried in United States vessels from Canadian head of the Lakes ports to Buffalo and reshipped from there to world markets by way of a Canadian port. Consequently there has been a decided shrinkage in storage of Canadian grain at Buffalo.

A study of the commodity movements on the Great Lakes would indicate that the main hope for any large use of the St. Lawrence waterway would be in the transportation of grain. What the effect of the development of large blocks of comparatively cheap electric power on the St. Lawrence would have upon shifting of industrial centers so as to attract the movement of other basic commodities such as ore, coal, chemicals, as well as manufactured commodities is problematical. There is reason to believe, from the standpoint of United States, that any additional freight movement via the St. Lawrence, which may be made possible by its deepening, will be largely traffic which would be diverted from existing routes. In fact, United States ports from Portland, Maine, to Galveston, Tex., appear concerned over the threat of diversion of traffic of interior States from their respective ports.

THE COST OF THE PROJECT

The report of the Joint Engineering Board, upon the basis of which the treaty was drafted, gives the following data regarding construction costs:

Canadian section: Montreal to Cornwall	$82,954,000
International power section:
Works for navigation alone	34,188,000
Works for power alone	132,452,000
Works for navigation and power	108,102,000
Thousand Islands section	1,233,000
	358,929,000
To which is added:
Welland Canal	128,000,000
Channel and regulation works upper Lakes	56,500,000
	543,429,000
Of this amount Canada is to be charged with the following amounts:
Canadian section	82,954,000
International Rapids section	59,250,000
Thousand Islands section	772,000
Welland Canal	128,000,000
	270,976,000
The United States is to be charged:
International Rapids section	215,492,000
Thousand Islands section	461,000
Channels and regulation upper Lakes	56,500,000
	272,453,000

Considering the allowance for work already done, Canada having completed the Welland and the United States having done some deepening of channels the outlay of new funds for the United States will be $257,992,000 and Canada $142,976,000. From these costs, the engineers emphasize, should be deducted the realizations from water power.

The International Joint Commission in 1922 estimated the annual operating and maintenance costs at $2,562,000, of which $1,105,000 was chargeable to navigation and $1,457,000 to power. The entire works between Montreal and Lake Ontario was estimated to cost a total of $252,000,000.

Herbert Hoover, as chairman of the St. Lawrence Commission, in his report to President Calvin Coolidge December 27, 1926, stated: "It is estimated that maintenance plus interest at 4½ percent on the all-American route would be $36,000,000 per annum, upon the Ontario-Hudson route $28,700,000, upon this plan of development of the St. Lawrence route, say, $10,000,000 after deduction of power returns from power actually developed as above." These charges applied to the estimated annual medial tonnages is as follows:

	Per ton
All-American	$2.06
Lake Ontario-Hudson	1.64
St. Lawrence	.43

It is clear that the annual total cost for maintenance, operation, and interest costs will greatly exceed those earlier estimates. The cost of the entire project has been placed at $543,429,000. To spread this cost over a 40-year period at 3½ percent would require an annual payment of approximately $19,000,000 for fixed charges. To this would be added a fair estimate of $3,000,000 for cost of maintenance and operation, a total of $22,000,000. If the deepened St. Lawrence doubled its present tonnage and reached a total of 15,000,000 tons annually, this annual cost would approximate $1.50 per ton. If it reached 30,000,000 tons, the maximum estimate of the cost would be about 75 cents per ton.

On the other hand, Dr. Harold G. Moulton, of the Brookings Institution, estimates the total cost of the proposed improvement as $999,000,000. The annual cost of the navigation project to the people of the United States and Canada is shown to be approximately $40,000,000 under his estimate. His study of traffic produces a total of 10,500,000 tons annually. Carrying this to a conclusion, Dr. Moulton places the amount to be paid out of the national treasuries of the two countries at about $3.50 a ton. This he maintains is what the taxpayers are to contribute for the benefit of the shippers who use the route.

He further shows that since grain will constitute 60 percent of the total traffic, the overhead charges are equivalent to 11 cents a bushel on wheat and rye, the principal items of grain traffic. Obviously no tolls could be assessed if the costs per ton approach Dr. Moulton's estimate and allow traffic to move via the waterway. As he states, the inclusive costs to the taxpayers and the shippers would be much greater than the present transportation charges.

Other noted engineers, such as Hugh L. Cooper and E. P. Goodrich, have estimated the ultimate total cost of the project at $1,350,000,000 and $1,054,000,000, respectively. There is evidence that the United States Engineers' estimate of $543,429,000 may be greatly exceeded. Opponents of the project point to the fact that the actual costs of the Welland, Chicago Drainage, New York State Barge, and Panama Canals were far in excess of the original estimates.

The St. Lawrence project from a navigation standpoint creates a problem similar to that of the New York State Barge Canal, for which the taxpayers of the State contribute each year a substantial sum of money for the cost of operation and maintenance and interest on bonds. For 1932, operation and maintenance cost $3,000,000 and debt service $5,000,000, a total of $8,000,000. The total traffic transported over the Barge Canal in 1932 amounted to 3,643,433 tons. For every ton of freight moved the New York State taxpayers contributed $2.24 per ton.

The Panama Canal toll rates averaged 78.3 cents per ton of cargo in 1931. Such a toll would amount to approximately 2.3 cents per bushel for grain or 3.75 cents per 100 pounds on general cargo. It would seem proper that the expense of such an enterprise should be borne directly by the beneficiaries. New York State will have to pay the expense of the development of the water power, as will the Province of Ontario.

There is no conclusive study of the traffic which will move over the improved waterway. While the Joint International Commission in 1921 heard many witnesses who indicated the possibility of certain movements, its report contains no general analysis or survey of potential traffic. Nor was such a study made by the United States Board of Engineers, which had it been made would have called forth the same painstaking effort as when it has sought the economic justification of any other waterway project. True it is that the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association and the Transportation Division of the United States Department of Commerce made traffic surveys respectively in 1925 and 1927, but under conditions materially different from those of today or likely to prevail in the future. The criticism of these surveys is pointed out in appendix F. There is little showing that the improved waterway would add any appreciable new traffic. There are good grounds for the belief that most of the traffic to move over the St. Lawrence route would be at the expense of existing routes and competition between the proposed route and the United States routes would materially lessen the prospects of realizing the original estimates of the potential traffic, prepared by the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Tidewater Association and the Transportation Division of the United States Department of Commerce.

The contention that the St. Lawrence is necessary because of railroad congestion has been answered by the remarkable improvement in railroad service and equipment that has taken place during the last 10 years. As to this there can be no argument today. Your committee has searched the various reports for information as to the total estimated savings in freight charges which might be expected from the deepened St. Lawrence and finds little supporting data to justify a prediction of a vast saving in transportation costs.

The International Joint Commission in its conclusions with respect to the economic aspects of the project stated that comparisons of this character must be more or less conjectural in the absence of definite information as to what actual rates would apply but that "it was inclined to the view that the St. Lawrence would afford a material saving in transportation costs over any of the existing routes between points in the territory economically tributary to the St. Lawrence and overseas points." This explains to a large degree the absence of such data.

The great emphasis placed upon the saving on grain alone of 8 to 12 cents a bushel from the head of the Lakes to European ports was perhaps due to the fact that in the early days of the agitation for the St. Lawrence, United States grain for export was moving in volume and at comparatively high rates which made some savings easily discernible. During the last 2 years, however, grain has moved from the head of the Lakes to Liverpool at rates ranging from 8 to 12 cents per bushel, as recent testimony before the Senate committee on the treaty discloses. It is obvious that the claimed saving of 8 to 12 cents a bushel is not possible today and that it is no longer a cogent argument justifying the construction of the St. Lawrence. A more extensive explanation of this situation appears in appendix E.

There is also testimony before the Senate committee that the farmer does not benefit from a reduction in transportation costs beyond the terminal markets. The farmer ships his grain to Minneapolis, Chicago, or Omaha, for example, where it is sold on the exchange. From the invoice is deducted the freight charges in settlement with the farmer. If transportation costs east of Chicago, for example, are reduced, the consumer gets the benefit, as the grain costs the Chicago price plus transportation charge to destination. The conclusion therefore is inevitable that the purchaser or consumer of export grain abroad would benefit from the reduction in transportation cost.

Your committee has not been able to ignore the many economic changes which have come about since the inception of the St. Lawrence project. There is no up-to-date study of the effect of this new route upon our foreign trade nor of the effect upon domestic trade in the Great Lakes trade area. It is true that tariff considerations have resulted in a marked increase in location of branch plants abroad the last decade. Of these, the Ford plant in England and the General Motors plants in England and Germany are outstanding examples. It would seem that the recent economic changes and the present trends call for reexamination of the economic justification of the St. Lawrence project before the pending treaty is adopted.

THE POWER PROJECT

The St. Lawrence River has one of the most uniform flows of any natural river in the world, due to the regulation afforded by the vast surface area of the Great Lakes. As a consequence, one of the factors which is full of uncertainties in most water-power developments, namely, assurance of an adequate stream flow, is practically eliminated from the problem.

The river drops a vertical distance of about 226 feet from Lake Ontario to Montreal, of which about 91 feet (40 percent) occurs in the international section (Lake Ontario to Cornwall). Most of the latter occurs through two rapids, the Rapids Plat, opposite Waddington, N.Y., and the Long Sault, opposite Massena, N.Y. The flow available at all times is in excess of 150,000 cubic feet per second, and for 95 percent of the time exceeds 190,000 cubic feet per second. The maximum flow of the river is seldom greater than twice the minimum flow.

Under the plan submitted and approved by the engineers of the two Governments, two dams will be constructed which will concentrate the fall available in the international section at these dams. The engineers also estimate that the ultimate economic capacity of installation would be approximately 2,200,000 horsepower, which would be divided equally between the two countries or the State of New York and the Province of Ontario. With the regulatory works which are to be constructed under the terms of the treaty, the proposed installation would furnish firm power in the amount of about 1,500,000 horsepower (approximately 10,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours per year), with secondary power available to the amount of about 2,800,000,000 kilowatt-hours.

The allocation of costs which is chargeable to navigation and power must of necessity be arbitrary, as certain elements are essential to both purposes. It should be understood, however, that the development of this section of the river for navigation alone could be accomplished at a far less cost than by the plan adopted if it were feasible to disregard the economic value of the potential power.

It is assumed for the purpose of this report that the plan for navigation and power which has been submitted by the joint engineering boards representing Canada and the United States is the most feasible for the dual purposes.

The cost of items which may be assigned to power uses can be taken at $240,000,000, or about $109 per horsepower of installation. If it is to be assumed that the entire output of the plants could be marketed, the cost of the power at the plant would be about as follows:

Fixed charges: Interest, taxes, depreciation, and renewals at 11 percent equals	$26,400,000
Operating costs: 12,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours at 0.06 cent	7,200,000

$$\frac{33,600,000}{12,000,000,000} = 0.28 \text{ cent per kilowatt-hour}$$

The above costs place this power upon about a parity with Niagara Falls power. New York State purports to own the bed of the St. Lawrence River on this side of the international boundary as does the Province of Ontario on the opposite side. Subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, in respect to navigation, the State has always assumed that this ownership permitted it either to grant the right to develop this power or to develop it under State auspices.

There has always been some question as to whether, in the event that the State did not assert these rights prior to a time when the National Government might construct works of the nature now contemplated for the purpose of improving navigation, the State would waive its interest. An almost parallel case occurred at Troy, N.Y., where the Federal Government constructed a dam and ultimately leased the power to a private company.

Power is a commodity—its value depends upon whether it can be marketed at a profit. Great strides were made in the development of water power from 1910 to 1925. Popular opinion came to the notion that water power meant cheap power. It is cheap power—at the plant. The development of the art of electrical transmission made feasible the development of water power during the above-mentioned period as it became possible to sell the water power located at some remote point where there was a demand for the power.

During this same period notable advances have been made which have increased the amount of power obtainable from a pound of fuel. For example, in 1920 the public utilities companies of the United States used 3 pounds of coal per kilowatt-hour, but in 1929 the fuel consumption per kilowatt-hour had been reduced to 1.69 pounds, a reduction of 44 percent. The price of coal has been reduced in about the same proportion.

The effect of this has been to shorten the distance which water power could be economically transmitted, as it must meet the price for which steam-generated power can be produced.

The attached diagram shows graphically the electric energy produced each year in New York State up to 1929, the last year for which complete figures are available to us. (There is evidence of a gradual drop for the past 2 or 3 years.) It will be noted that the up-State power nearly equals the amount for New York City, but whereas, all of the city power is steam, more than 75 percent of the up-State power is now provided by water. Therefore, if a market is to be found throughout the State for St. Lawrence River power it must supersede all of the steam-generated up-State power and 75 percent of it must be transmitted to New York City. For reasons of reliability of service and load factor demands it is doubtful if the up-State fuel-generated power could be supplanted. It is pertinent to quote from the conclusions of Governor Roosevelt's own commission upon this subject of "Market for St. Lawrence Power", as it was created in furtherance of his avowed commitments for the development of our "cheap water power" for the "benefit of all the people."

In the letter of transmittal dated January 15, 1931, the St. Lawrence Power Development Commission advises the governor and legislature among 20 definite findings:

"11. The marketing problems for St. Lawrence power are complicated in this respect; that most available customers for this power are those who can use constant power, whereas the domestic consumers of power, to whom the maximum benefits of this project should go use the current on the average only a few hours a day.

"12. If any substantial part of the actual power generated on the St. Lawrence were to be delivered to its domestic consumers, great waste would be involved unless provision were made to supplement it with power from other sources."

The commission did not quote as finding the report of their engineers on marketing, which says (p. 58): "There is danger of overdoing the long-distance transmission of electrical energy" * * * "There is no known way to so design and build these lines so that they will be free from interruption. * * * It is doubtful whether there is a market for such a large block of power at high load factor in New York City which would submit to such interruptions." Their engineers also made the following findings, on page 66:

"11. The St. Lawrence power could be utilized by continuous industries at the site. * * *"

"14. It is therefore our conclusion that the supply of St. Lawrence power exclusively to any one particular class of customers, except continuous industries at the site, would not only be accompanied by great economic waste but the resulting costs would be higher than those for steam electric production at or near the market."

These findings are set forth in full in appendix I.

The State of New York has long considered the development of power in the international section of the St. Lawrence River. This development has been a major issue of both political parties in the State for many years past. Both are committed to State development of St. Lawrence power in the interest of lower electric rates for homes and industries. See appendix D. The last three Governors have emphasized this development as a part of their economic programs.

By unanimous vote of both branches of the State legislature a bill was enacted and signed by Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt, in April 1931, creating the Power Authority of the State of New York, a "corporate instrumentality" of the State and administered by 5 trustees, 1 appointed each year for a term of 5 years. As the law states, it is "a body corporate and politic, a political subdivision of the State, exercising governmental and public powers, perpetual in duration, capable of suing and being sued." This act declares the policy of New York State as to the St. Lawrence River as follows:

"That part of the St. Lawrence River within the boundaries of the State of New York is hereby declared to be a natural resource of the State for the use and development of commerce and navigation in the interest of the people of this State and of the United States, and for the creation and development of hydroelectric power in the interest of the people of this State, and such natural resources, including the bed and waters of the river as instrumentalities of commerce and navigation, and the bed, waters, power, and power sites in, upon, or adjacent to or within the watershed of the said river owned or controlled by the people of the State, or which may hereafter be recovered by or come within their ownership, possession, and control, shall always remain inalienable to, and ownership, possession, and control thereof shall always be vested in the people of the State."

The power authority through its chairman appeared before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations at hearings in Washington on the St. Lawrence treaty in December 1932 advocating the immediate development of the St. Lawrence River and that the United States agree to make available to New York State for the development of power all of the United States share of the flow of water in the international section not required for navigation. The power authority in turn for the right to the flowage agreed to pay the costs attributable to the development of the power. The summary of the statement of Chairman Frank P. Walsh before the Senate committee appears in appendix I.

As a result of a series of conferences a joint agreement was reached February 7, 1933, between the Power Authority of New York State and the engineers of the War Department with respect to the allocation of the cost of the works in the International Rapids section. Following approval of this agreement by the State and War Departments a joint resolution (H.J.Res. 157) was introduced and passed in the House and is now before the Senate for approval. This resolution provides:

"Resolved, That in the event of the ratification of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty and the construction of the works provided therein the Power Authority of the State of New York, as the accredited agency of the State and in accordance with the policy set forth in the act creating said Power Authority, shall be entitled to use for the generation of hydroelectric power all of the United States share of the flow of the water in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence River, subject to the prior use of such water under the treaty for the purposes of navigation and the operation of reservoirs, canals, and locks, and shall have title to the power houses and works appurtenant thereto upon the United States side, together with the lands upon which they are situated, in consideration of the payment of its share of the cost as determined in the joint memorandum above referred to: Provided, That no part of the United States share of the water in the international rapids section of the St. Lawrence River shall be diverted for the benefit of any person or private corporation, nor shall the use of any part of said water or the rights pertaining to said water be sold, leased, or otherwise alienated to any person or private corporation for the generation of hydroelectric power."

The joint memorandum referred to allocates these costs as between the United States and the State of New York, as follows:

"(1) The United States assumes responsibility for the cost of all works for navigation.

"(2) The State assumes $23,500,000 as its share of the cost of all works common to navigation and power, the State to receive its proportionate share of any saving if the actual cost of construction is less than the estimated cost.

"(3) The State assumes responsibility for $29,295,500 for power-house substructures, head and tail races, excavations, etc., this amount to be reduced by the amount of the saving.

"(4) The State assumes responsibility for the actual cost of its power-house superstructures and equipment, estimated at $36,930,500, and may construct these works through its own agencies or, by agreement, have them installed at actual cost by the United States.

"(5) In the event that the State of New York elects, the United States assumes responsibility for the construction of the works in their entirety at a cost to New York representing the sum of the costs above set forth, or a total of $89,726,000, provided that if the actual cost be less than this amount the State of New York will receive the benefit of the said savings."

The memorandum concludes:

"The above recommendations are based upon the assumption that the State of New York shall have the right to utilize for power all the flow of the St. Lawrence River in the International Rapids section allocated to the United States by the treaty, other than that required for navigation, together with title to the power works and the lands upon which they are situated and which may be necessary and convenient for their operation."

Thus it will be seen that New York State would contribute approximately 20 percent of the total cost of the St. Lawrence project to be borne by the United States, plus the $89,760,000 provided for in the joint resolution. In other words, out of the United States total estimated cost of $272,453,000, New York State will pay $126,318,600, almost 50 percent of the total cost allocated to the United States under the terms of the treaty. This leaves about 50 percent as the portion to be paid by all other States, a remarkably low proportionate cost for the Western States directly interested in the project.

Your committee has searched diligently for evidence of the utilization of the power which may be developed in the international section. At present there is considerable idle and reserve capacity in New York and New England. The present distribution is at least 25 percent off compared with recent peak years. This 25 percent would have to be absorbed before consideration would be given expanding the reserve capacity now available. The report of the St. Lawrence Power Development Commission to the New York State Legislature, to which reference has been made, is convincing in its conclusion that this power could be utilized by continuous industries at the site. It is apparent, therefore, that a market for the power must be developed which may require many years before its full utilization can be had, as long as a broad scale industrial growth must take place at or near the site.

Rochester is more than 200 miles from the proposed power sites. With its surplus of power capacity from its own facilities and Niagara Falls as a much nearer source of cheap power, there seems to be little likelihood of Rochester utilizing St. Lawrence power. It is said that there is considerable flow of water at Niagara which is not being used.

The State power authority act directs the commission to develop, maintain, manage, and operate the project in such manner as to benefit, aid, and improve commerce and navigation, and declares that the development of power shall be considered primarily for the benefit of the people of the State as a whole and particularly domestic and rural consumers to whom the power can economically be made available, and accordingly that sale to and use by industry shall be a secondary purpose to be utilized principally to secure a sufficiently high-load factor and revenue returns which will permit domestic and rural use at lowest possible rates. (Sec. 5.)

The commission is directed to negotiate contracts for sale, transmission, and distribution of the power generated, under terms to provide payment of operating and maintenance expenses of the project, interest on and amortization and reserve charges sufficient within 50 years of the date of issuance to retire the bonds of the power authority. Provisions are made for the commission to fix rates to consumers, in the contract, and make periodic revisions of service and rates. It is provided that upon completion of the necessary contract or contracts the commission shall proceed with the physical construction of the project authorized by the act and, among other things, to borrow money and secure same by bonds or liens upon revenue from property or contracts, subject to the provision that the power authority shall have no power at any time to pledge the credit of the State. (Sec. 5.)

The act requires that no bonds shall be issued until "firm contracts for the sale of power shall have been made by it sufficient to insure payment of all operating and maintenance expenses of the project, and interest on and amortization and reserve charges sufficient to retire the bonds of the power authority in not more than 50 years from date of issuance thereof." (Sec. 8.) Contracts shall be subject to public hearing. When the contracts are finally agreed upon the power authority shall report the proposed contracts with its recommendations and the record of hearings to the Governor of the State. If the contracts are approved by the Governor they shall be executed and carried into force. (Sec. 9.) Failure to agree upon terms and conditions of a contract or upon the Governor's disapproval of a proposed contract none of the powers to own, build, operate, and maintain dams, power houses, and other instrumentalities shall be exercised until the legislature and the Governor shall have approved plans reported by the power authority. (Sec. 10.)

The Province of Quebec is opposed to the St. Lawrence project. Its legislature on April 24, 1933, passed a measure permitting the exportation of power from Quebec to the United States. A press dispatch of April 8, 1933, explains this legislation as follows:

"Explaining the proposed legislation which would permit export of power from the Province of Quebec to the United States, Premier L. A. Taschereau revealed in the provincial legislature that one of the chief reasons for it is to 'deal a deathblow to the St. Lawrence waterways development project.'

"The development of the St. Lawrence waterways will be a very expensive matter, he explained. It is designed to give the United States about 1,000,000 horsepower. If we say to the United States: 'Here is 250,000 or 300,000 horsepower, why go ahead with the St. Lawrence project', will that not be a telling argument? I am sure that we will give a deathblow to that project. It is the State of New York and the New England States which are mainly interested as regards electricity and which will benefit. If we tell them they will not have to pay 1 cent for development costs, I am sure they will be no longer interested in that project."

This is an interesting sidelight on the power development, and also reflects the idea of the limited need for the St. Lawrence power development on the United States side, as it clearly does for Canada, in view of its ability to export power.

It will be observed from the foregoing description of the Power Authority Act that while the power commission may commit the State to the construction of the power project, certain safeguards rest with the State legislature and the Governor. The development of and marketing of the power is a subject which should be considered on its own merits. Unless there is assurance of a development of a market for the power generated in the international section within a reasonable period of years, there can be no justification of the vast expenditure of money by New York State involved in the present project. The development of the power should not be undertaken as a part of a navigation project merely for the purpose of saving something in transportation costs for Central and Western States.

Your committee subscribes to the principle that New York State's equity in the power development should be preserved.

CONCLUSIONS

Our study of the St. Lawrence Waterway and power project leads to the conclusion that deepening of the St. Lawrence River for improvement of navigation and the development of its power resources will in all probability ultimately follow in the future when it can be economically justified. There are, however, no compelling circumstances under present conditions which demand haste in prosecuting this great undertaking.

While the studies of the United States engineers confirm the feasibility and practicability of developing the St. Lawrence for navigation and power, the independently made economic surveys of the early post-war periods were insufficient and did not afford adequate grounds for economic justification of the project. This lack of data on which to base conclusions favoring the project is now greatly emphasized by subsequent world-wide economic changes and the present trends. Such surveys now afford little proof of additional utilization of the St. Lawrence waterway nor market for the water power sufficient to warrant the proposed improvement, from the standpoint of the interests of the United States.

The project during the period of construction and for many years thereafter cannot be carried on except at public expense borne by the taxpayer. There is no assurance of the project becoming self-liquidating. There is undisputed evidence that the power plants will require years to become self-supporting, unless a large-scale industrial development takes place within the region of profitable distribution of the power, of which there is now no assurance. It is a known fact that there is at present considerable idle and reserve power capacity in New York and New England.

It is also a fact that for every ton of freight transported over the waterway the taxpayer will contribute in overhead costs, for the benefit of shippers, an amount equal to $1 to $4 per ton, depending upon the particular estimate of tonnage which may be realized.

There are indications that Canada may receive greater benefit from the improved waterway than the United States. The bulk of the tonnage is shown to be Canadian preferred grain, including that portion of Canadian grain traffic which has heretofore moved via the Buffalo port of New York route. Any agreement obligating the United States to develop the St. Lawrence should take into consideration not only the preferential and adverse tariff restrictions operating against commerce and shipping of the United States and Canada but the possibility of flooding the Great Lakes area with highly competitive imports brought in at low cost by foreign-operated steamships, to the great disadvantage of United States and Canada, whose shipping, industrial, and labor conditions are on a much higher plane than those of many foreign competitors.

There is every reason to believe that the additional traffic that will result from the improved St. Lawrence will be made up largely from tonnage diverted from existing routes, and that United States rail, canal, and lake carriers and Atlantic ports will adopt every possible measure to preserve their share of the available traffic. This competition is a factor which will have a bearing on the ultimate traffic for the deepened St. Lawrence route.

The marked disagreement among authorities as to the extent which ocean shipping can economically utilize the improved St. Lawrence serves to emphasize the fact that a 27-foot channel would make Montreal a tidewater port accessible to lake shipping, to the disadvantage of the port of New York and other United States ports.

There are ample grounds for requiring the expense of the project to be borne by the interests directly benefiting from the facilities which it provides. The international shipping characteristics of the new seaway would justify the application of reasonable tolls, the same as applies to all shipping through the Panama or Suez Canals. Obviously foreign shipping of countries other than Canada docking in the heart of the continent should contribute something toward the expense of providing and maintaining the waterway.

It is our opinion that the economic merits and justification of the large expenditure involved in the St. Lawrence waterway and power development have not been fully determined by the International Joint Commission and the boards of engineers and that the economic justification of the project rests wholly upon the studies made by proponents 6 to 13 years ago, under conditions materially different from those which now confront the United States or are likely to prevail during the next decade. We adhere to the principle that under the existing stringency all expenditures for public works should be based upon reasonable assurance of their being self-liquidating. We believe that there should be a complete, up-to-date, impartial appraisal of the economic considerations involved in the project, from the standpoint of the United States, before the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty is approved by the Senate.

Your committee, therefore, recommends that the Rochester Chamber of Commerce be placed on record as follows:

That the Senate of the United States be requested to delay the adoption of the St. Lawrence Treaty until an impartial survey can be made by the Board of Rivers and Harbors Engineers of the traffic which the United States may reasonably expect to move via the St. Lawrence route, to show the savings and benefits, as well as disadvantages, to the United States therefrom; that the Board determine definitely the annual costs of operation and maintenance and the possibility of making the project self-liquidating within a reasonable period of years; also study of such other factors as are essential to the determination of the wisdom of undertaking this development under the present economic conditions and trends.

Respectfully submitted.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE—PORT OF ROCHESTER COMMITTEE,
FRANK H. MACY, Chairman,
JOHN HANDY,
ROLAND O. ROBERTS,
FRED'K W. BURTON.

MAY 3, 1933.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am not going to undertake to answer the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] this afternoon, but I expect to do so tomorrow.

However, I wish to say in just a moment or two that the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Wisconsin have apparently overlooked so many facts as to feel that they have been done an injustice. Whether I can convince these gentlemen or not, I think I can well see that their efforts will do more of an injustice to their own sections of the country than to the section from which I come, or to New York.

Somehow we cannot get the facts into the minds of those favoring the treaty. They have been laboring under a misapprehension as the result of false propaganda that they are going to be able to save 10 cents a bushel on wheat from their part of the country to Liverpool. The fact is that the only saving they could make, if they could make any at all, would be in the rate from the Great Lakes to Montreal. It costs only 4½ cents a bushel to ship wheat from their part of the country to Montreal; and if they saved it all, they could save but 4½ cents. The chances are they could not save anything, and yet they are influenced by such false propaganda and we cannot get them to see that the true statistics do not justify that propaganda whatsoever.

I will show further that this is not an American public-works program. It is an American expense program, but a Canadian public-works program to be carried on with American money. I will show further that conservative estimates are that from 80 to 90 percent of this money would be spent in Canada for Canadian labor and Canadian material and to build a port for Montreal, and not for the United States. The engineering would be Canadian as well.

A further matter that I will show will be—and there will be no difficulty whatever to show it—that this is not an American proposition. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] might just as well have tried to show that some member of a chamber of commerce had embraced the Hindoo religion or was a member of the Baptist Church, and tried to show that he follows Hindooism or Buddhism because the Morgan people have some connections in India, as to try to justify the charge that because one or several of the members of a chamber of commerce that have approved it had a power company somewhere or somebody in it that was in some way mixed up with Morgan. If we were to go out to Wisconsin, we would find these very same power interests are members of the chambers of commerce which are endorsing this iniquitous treaty. We would not find any difference in them. We would find that chambers of commerce have power-company directors in North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wisconsin, where they are at fault enough to endorse the treaty.

That is not all. Some mention has been made of the labor unions of the country. I have in my hand a letter from the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen of the United States, who are opposed to the treaty. I have here a letter from the Order of Railway Conductors of America, who are opposed to the treaty. All up and down the Mississippi Valley the laboring men and others are opposed to the treaty.

Wherever there is a coastline the people are opposed to the treaty. Wherever men have studied the matter long enough to understand it, they know that it is proposed to take American money in order to lengthen the water route to England. It will not be a shortening of that route. It is 1,100 miles shorter by the all-water route by way of New York than by way of Montreal.

There is only one more point I am going to show tomorrow. I am going to show that the Senators from Michigan and Wisconsin have made their estimated allocation of costs by allowing Canada all that it has already spent on this project and by allowing the United States some little insignificant amount that it might have spent. But in allowing Canada what it is supposed to have spent they have practically allowed Canada everything that they could find, high or low or in the middle, that had been spent on the internal waterway system of Canada. In other words, we might as well allow the United States Government to have had credit for the money it spent on the Red River, on the Ouachita River, the Tennessee River, the Mississippi River, or parts of its coasts, as to have made some of the allowances they have made for Canada as a part of its expenditure on the cost of this waterway in order to show that there is a 50–50 division of the cost. We will show that they have lumped the costs that Canada has paid for an inland waterway system in order to make it appear that it is a 50–50 proposition, whereas the true facts are that America will probably spend from 65 to 70 percent of the money that is spent, and that the cost will run into the neighborhood of $500,000,000 or $600,000,000, and possibly more than that, in order to have a route from Canada, 1,110 miles longer than the water route through the port of New York. That, among other things, is what I will show when I have time to debate the matter as it should be discussed.

THE GOLD-STANDARD REPEAL

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Baltimore Sun of May 28, 1933, dealing with the question of the gold-standard repeal.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun, Sunday, May 28, 1933]

WHY?

It is perfectly true, as Senator GLASS and Senator REED have said, that the administration's gold repealer is repudiation—of obligations entered into by the Government with the holders of its bonds and of obligations entered into by individuals in contracts between themselves. Certain specific payments are promised; these payments are not to be required. It is repudiation which has a peculiarly glaring quality in the Government's case, since as late as April 23 Secretary Woodin offered some $500,000,000 of Government notes to the public and stated to prospective purchasers that "the principal and interest of the notes will be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value."

But it is also true that the measure now offered by the administration is an inevitable corollary of the Thomas inflation amendment, if the administration is determined to proceed with inflation on any major scale. If all the extravagant powers in that amendment are exercised, the Government cannot meet its obligations to pay in gold and private debtors cannot meet their obligations in gold, nor in the equivalent of gold of the value set forth in the contracts. To attempt to do so would wreck the resources of the Government and, so far as private debtors are concerned, it would ruin the very class who are supposed to be helped by inflation. For both would be receiving money of constantly decreasing value, while paying debts in money of high value.

Repudiation is an ugly word, but it is a word that must be accepted and used if there is to be a major operation in inflation, for then debts must be paid in cheap money—how cheap nobody under the heavens can predict. But obvious as it is that this gold repealer is a logical corollary of the Thomas inflation amendment, it still is not clear why the administration rushed into Congress with this formal measure of repudiation. Up to this time the attitude of the administration has been that the powers contained in the Thomas amendment would be used sparingly. Spokesmen of the administration have been at great pains to explain that protests against the Thomas amendment were labor lost because only controlled credit expansion was contemplated.

Of course, it is true that if only controlled credit inflation was contemplated, there was no reason at all for enacting the Thomas amendment. If all that was to be done, in the way of inflation, was to send the Federal Reserve System into the open market to buy Government securities and thus to put out funds which would be an additional volume of credit for the use of commerce, no law was needed. The Federal Reserve System, as has frequently been pointed out, carried on such an operation under the Hoover administration to the tune of over a billion dollars. Nevertheless, it has been the asserted position of the administration lately that such innocent and controlled credit inflation was to be the rule, and that nothing drastic was in mind.

Under those circumstances, there was no need to bother for the present about logical corollaries of the Thomas inflation amendment. Our money had depreciated in the foreign exchanges and there had been some reflection of that in the internal value. But not many people had begun to worry, so far as we have heard, about the gold clauses in the Government's bonds or in private contracts. It would have done nobody any good to have demanded gold, for no gold was available. But there seemed to be no disposition on the part of holders of obligations due in gold to try to put the screws on. Money was still close enough to the previous values to prevent disturbance and the slightest intimation that Mr. Roosevelt was going to be careful allayed most people's fears.

For what reason, then, does Mr. Roosevelt's administration rush this measure into Congress? The question becomes even more pertinent when it is recalled that Mr. Roosevelt's statements, when Messrs. MacDonald, Herriot, Jung, Schacht, and others were here a little while ago, set forth that one of the objectives of the international negotiations would be a return to gold. If a nation is off gold in fact, but wishes to restore the use of gold in all the important trading nations; and if, pending negotiations, there is a general feeling among the people that the reins will be held firmly in hand and consequently there is prevailing quiet—if those conditions obtain, why rush in with a measure that amounts to formal repudiation?

Mr. Roosevelt says that people are not allowed to hold gold and, therefore, there would be no sense in paying them gold which they would have to turn in at once. But people were not demanding gold. They were not claiming what most of our best lawyers believe to be their constitutional rights to insist upon keeping gold in their possession and to insist upon payments in gold when payments in gold had been pledged by the Government. Why, under those circumstances, rush in with a measure to restrain a clamor for gold when no practical need has been demonstrated for such restraint; and, by rushing in with that measure, repudiate pledges made by the Government as late as April 23? That question needs clearer answer than Washington has given.

It needs clearer answer, one suspects, than ever will be given officially. For it is altogether probable that one of the reasons for this step is of a nature that never is officially avowed. It is altogether probable that this move is by way of being another "shot in the arm." We hopped off gold, depreciated the dollar in foreign exchange, started a wave of feeling that some kind of inflation was under way, and immediately let loose a horde of speculators in common stocks and commodities who do not know much more about inflation than how to spell the word. In due course, when a lull appeared, there was an elaborately staged announcement that open-market operations to the extent of $25,000,000 (a tidbit) had been started. And now the latest—and a boiling stock market.

What comes next nobody except the inner group in Washington can know, and they may not have decided. We shall be assured, doubtless, that nothing of an extreme character is contemplated. On the contrary, we probably shall be assured that the only inflation will still be controlled credit inflation; and that, in due course, Mr. Roosevelt will complete negotiations with other nations looking to stabilization of currencies and to agreement upon new gold bases for all the important trading nations. After which values in public bonds and private contracts will be stabilized. But in the meantime, what we can see with our eyes is one act after another in Washington which sends the speculators in the stock markets into old-time orgies, but seems to have very little relation to any of the basic factors of trade movements.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it appears that it will not be practicable to dispose of the unfinished business today. I am advised that there are some controversial matters in the bill which will require a measure of time for disposition. Therefore I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, May 30, 1933, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MAY 29, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Again, O Lord Most High, the eternal God, who hast been with us through all our days and hast vouchsafed to go with us all the way, mercifully incline to hear our prayer. Cleanse our hearts that no evil desire may rule us, and renew them by Thy heavenly grace. Gracious Father, by whose wisdom we were created and by whose providence we shall be saved, enlighten our minds that by the knowledge of the truth, fears of danger may be changed into the joys of recovery. In Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, May 27, 1933, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1580. An act to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation, and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

AGRICULTURAL CREDITS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that upon the disposition of House Joint Resolution 192 it shall be in order to consider House bill 5790, the agricultural credits bill, that there be not to exceed 2 hours' general debate, to be equally divided and controlled between the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE] and myself, and that all points of order may be considered as waived.

Mr. BYRNS. What bill is this?

Mr. JONES. This is the Farm Credit Act of 1933.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I had sort of an arrangement and understanding with the gentlemen interested that two small matters from the Committee on Military Affairs would be in order this morning under suspension of the rules. I am very sure they will not take very long. They are short bills and probably will not take over 10 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I thought the floor leader indicated this bill would not be brought up until tomorrow, or immediately following the disposition of House Joint Resolution 192.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, may I say this to the House, there is great pressure to bring about the passage of the bill the gentleman from Texas has referred to, also a bill in which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] is interested.

We are going to have a suspension day next Monday, and I hope that too much of the time today will not be consumed with suspensions, so we can get rid of these bills. I told the gentleman who was interested in this farm bill that we certainly ought to pass it by Wednesday. If we consume all of today with suspensions, we will just have to put it over.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. We had a bill from the Territories Committee that we were going to ask be taken up under suspension of the rules today, but we agreed to carry it over until next Monday, in the hope that we might get through this House joint resolution to which the majority leader has referred.

Mr. BYRNS. And carrying out the idea that we postpone these suspensions until next Monday, which is regular suspension day and when we will have a clear calendar.

Mr. RANKIN. We were under the impression that there would be no suspensions today but that the suspensions would be carried oyer until next Monday.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Do I understand the majority leader to say that he does not intend to call up the bills which were expected to be considered under suspension today?

Mr. BYRNS. That is a matter under the control of the Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. May I inquire, Mr. Speaker, if these bills are going to be called up under suspension of the rules today?

The SPEAKER. They will be called up.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand, the farm credit bill is necessary because of the action of the President in consolidating certain bureaus, is it not?

Mr. JONES. It is for the purpose of implementing the Executive order which consolidates various agencies engaged in the lending of money for agricultural purposes. It provides for the necessary regional and local banks and corporations to enable the administration to function properly. There are some other changes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman, of course, could bring this up under a rule, and this is simply to save time. We are going to take it up under the general rules of the House?

Mr. JONES. That is the purpose, to take the measure up under the general rules of the House with all points of order waived.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is rather unusual to waive all points of order when granting unanimous consent to consider a bill.

Mr. JONES. I may state to the gentleman that the bill was reported unanimously or, at least, I believe no one present voted against reporting it. The reason I asked for the waiving of all points of order is that this bill transfers unexpended balances in 2 or 3 funds to the new fund, and it might be considered an appropriation in that sense. The only reference to a direct appropriation is in the form of an authorization, but it does utilize some unexpended balances of crop production and other funds in 2 or 3 different forms and it was thought not necessary to bother with the reappropriation of them. There is some question whether that would be in order.

Mr. MAPES. Has the gentleman consulted with the minority members of the committee as to the waiving of points of order?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I have consulted with some of the minority members and with the gentleman from Massachusetts about the matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

NORMAN H. DAVIS

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I regret to take issue with my friend and colleague, Congressman TINKHAM, regarding his proposed resolution to investigate Ambassador at Large Norman H. Davis. Such an inquiry is entirely unnecessary. Mr. Davis' life and career are an open book. He was born in Tennessee, became a successful business man, representing financial interests in connection with sugar in Cuba. Eventually he moved to New York and became associated with large banking interests. For nearly 20 years he has devoted the greater part of his knowledge and experience to the service of the Government, beginning with the most important positions under President Wilson and continuing at various intervals under the administrations of Presidents Coolidge and Hoover.

The country has been fortunate that Mr. Davis has been willing unselfishly to give his great ability to the public service. His private investments and his private connections are not the affair of Congress. Mr. Davis' honesty and integrity have never been questioned, and if questioned they could not be successfully impeached. Where is the Government to look for proper advisers other than among those who associate with the greatest minds of the world? An unwarranted and sensational attack detracts from the willingness of leaders to assist in solving the problems that confront this Nation today.

Mr. Davis has always been known as a Democrat, but he has been good enough for Republican Presidents to use. It happens that I have personally known Mr. Davis for at least 20 years. While not a voter in my district, he maintains a residence in the town where I live. So, as a neighbor and friend, I feel I have as much right to defend the good name of Mr. Davis as my colleague has to attack it. [Applause.]

TENTH ILLINOIS STATE SUNDAY AT VALLEY FORGE

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by me at Valley Forge yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me yesterday at the Tenth Illinois State Sunday at Valley Forge:

I am happy of an opportunity to come to Valley Forge on this occasion, to represent the Governor and our great State, on the Tenth Illinois State Sunday, commemorating the faith and patriotism of our heroes at this national shrine.

We in Illinois feel the importance and appreciate the services of that great jurist and executive, the present Governor of Illinois, Henry Horner. It is with much regret that the Governor was unable to attend these ceremonies. Were he present he would contribute an eloquent and expressive ability, befitting the occasion far beyond my poor power to deliver today. It is hoped that during his tenure of office he will have an opportunity to address you on a future occasion.

It is appropriate that here are gathered the sons and daughters, posterity of that patriotic band whose valor and sacrifices we commemorate today. It is appropriate that here are assembled from the surrounding territory those who often have the opportunity to drink in and absorb the spirit of a freedom that is still new in its natural splendor and beauty year in and year out. I want to praise Dr. W. Herbert Burk, the founder and builder of this chapel, for his contribution in establishing here a nation's altar for worship. I have been very agreeably surprised and impressed at the interest and the material contribution that Illinois has made to carry on the splendid work here, and I warmly commend the Illinois State Society, Daughters of the American Revolution, under whose auspices this service is conducted. Since we have been a government, yea, ever since George Washington stood on a balcony in New York and subscribed to the oath as President of these United States, Revolutionary heroes and their posterity have paused to give thanks for, and to celebrate the history made on and near this spot. There has been so much said about Valley Forge, not only here, where people are wont to worship weekly, but throughout the length and breadth of the land men and women have talked of Valley Forge on every national and patriotic holiday, that it is impossible for me to add anything new to the subject that has not already been said or written. If, however, I am able on this occasion to resay something that has already been said, but perchance in a different way, or if by repeating some of the ideas of the past, it may create nobler thoughts and higher ideals in the hearts of those assembled here, I shall have achieved my purpose.

When I began to think about the purpose of this service and reflect upon the history of this period, I was surprised at the many bits of Illinois history which fit into the picture. When the Revolution began we were a population of 4,000,000 souls in 13 colonies scattered along the Atlantic seaboard and stretching westward over what is now little more than the confines of a State. A few of the more adventuresome of our forefathers had pushed westward across the Alleghenies and settled in what was then known as the great Northwest. Little was known of its existence, and few attached much importance to it becoming a part of our country. That expanse of territory northwest of the Ohio River, east of the Mississippi, and bounded on the north by the Lakes represented an area almost equal to the size of the Thirteen Original Colonies then engaged in the Revolution. It is true this great expanse of western land contained few white souls, but the glowing accounts they gave of the land and its potential possibilities for the future excited an interest in the hearts of a few of our leaders as the war progressed and compelled serious consideration to the proposition of annexing it to the Colonies. As the Euphrates River was to Mesopotamia, as the Nile was to Egypt, so was the Mississippi and its tributaries to the United States. There is no other spot in all the world so rich in its surface soil, so bountiful in its natural resources, and so healthy and inviting to the settlement of mankind as the territory of the Northwest.

The early history of Illinois and the Northwest Territory is contemporary with that of Valley Forge and a part of the Revolution. While Washington was planning to withdraw the remnants of his all but defeated Army to winter on the heights of this sacred spot, another Virginian, Col. George Rogers Clark, was soliciting aid and planning with the members of the legislature of his State to furnish funds for an excursion into the Illinois country.

Since I come to think of it, the first spot on which Clark set foot in conquering this land was in my own congressional district at old Fort Massac in Illinois. Washington came to Valley Forge about December 19, 1777. On December 10, 1777, Clark was in conference with Patrick Henry, Governor of Virginia. While Washington was planning his summer campaigns at Valley Forge, Clark was planning a campaign for the Northwest. Washington left Valley Forge with his army about June 19, 1778. Clark left the falls of the Ohio on June 24 on his westward voyage. I do not seek to make an analogy of the two men in the sense of placing Clark in the category with Washington; but after all their experiences in the War of the Revolution, the fashion with which they organized and fought, the intense and consecrated effort both exerted in favor of independence, indicates a striking similarity of purpose and determination. Both were Virginians. One opened his eyes to the light of day at Wakefield, the other came from the heights of Charlottesville; so if Illinois is to present its leader in the American Revolution she must go to Virginia for her champion, the same as the Colonies did.

I hope we in Illinois may be pardoned if in pride for our beloved State I make such further comparisons as seem appropriate for the occasion. While Clark must be recognized as the military leader, there is one other analogy to mention if we must understand the early history of Illinois. Another Virginian shaped the destiny of our territory. Thomas Jefferson wrote with discerning hand the Declaration of Independence, but he also was the author of the Ordinance of 1787, which was the charter of liberty for the five States to be carved out of the Northwest Territory. In addition he planned our system of land survey, which has since been used for all the territory acquired by the United States. If Jefferson had never done anything else but write the Declaration of Independence and the Ordinance of 1787, his place in history would be secure. The Declaration of Independence is the charter of man's liberty in his relation to government and taxation. The ordinance not only reaffirmed this relation but fixed to a very large extent the social relationship of men in a complex civilization. No man since the dawn of the Christian era has so influenced the destinies of mankind as has Jefferson. While liberty is born in the hearts of men, Jefferson gave expression to that principle which fired their hearts and imaginations for decisive action.

Three notable clauses were written into the Ordinance of 1787 that will make it live forever as one of the world's great state papers:

1. No slavery or involuntary servitude shall be permitted to exist. Although a slave owner, Jefferson realized that slavery was incompatible with his declaration on a former occasion. Either the principle "that all men are created equal", must become a living reality, or the Declaration must become a scrap of paper. To the expression of this sentiment, Illinois owes much for its independence of thought and action.

2. No religious qualification shall be required to hold office. The history of Europe is filled with pages of religious intolerance. No one knew better the effect of religious intolerance than Jefferson. Although many settlements in America were the result of Europe's blind religious policy, nevertheless there had grown up within some of the Colonies a spirit of religious intolerance. Man must be free to worship his God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and it was so prescribed by Jefferson in his ordinance.

3. Free public education must be forever fostered. Ignorance is the blight of all nations, and Jefferson realized that if man was to govern himself, he must be educated. He sought to combine the conscience to worship, and the liberty for independent action into a force to support a system of public education in order to make representative government a working reality. Whatever may be said about the success and achievements of the American system of government, the cause of our success has rested largely on our public-school system.

May I indulge your attention for a brief moment to the sacrifices made by Clark and his men in the wild and natural wilderness of the Illinois country? While we do not minimize the sacrifices made by the Continental Army at Valley Forge, it is worthy to note that hardships born of fortitude, endured by those pioneers in subduing the enemy were almost, if not wholly comparable, to those made on any other spot of the American continent. With less than 200 men he sailed down 500 miles of river on the Ohio, and marched 200 miles through the heart of a region infested with roving tribes of Indians, hostile to the Big Knives, as the Americans were called, to accomplish the first feat in the capture of Kaskaskia. Such political and psychological strategy as Clark used to subdue the enemy posts is not written elsewhere in the annals of history. Whatever was lacking in number of men to present a formidable command, Clark made up in strategy in overcoming the prejudice of the people and efforts of superior numbers. Scarcely a shot was fired on that eventful evening of July 4, when he led his straggling band into the primitive city of Kaskaskia and received the surrender and capitulation of Rochblave. Instead of marching overland at that time to Vincennes, the strongest and best fortified outpost in that territory, he conceived the idea like warriors of old, of sending offerings and presents by way of Father Gibault to the parish at Vincennes, who received the surrender of the garrison and sworn allegiance of the people to the American cause, without even the presence of General Clark. But the great test came the following winter after the Vincennes post had again fallen into the hands of the enemy, new fortifications constructed, and with a new garrison to protect the claims of the British. Starting out from Kaskaskia with 170 men, Clark marched through the swamps and bottoms of the Okaw and Wabash Rivers. Floods covered the whole region. Miles and miles of this dreaded march was through water from 1 to 5 feet deep. The stoutest heart grew weak with fear. Even Clark himself felt the tinge of hunger and weakness. Because of his instinctive and sympathetic understanding of men he invoked strategy which marked him as a man of destiny and obtained hope, faith, and confidence of his men to eagerly accomplish their goal—the capture of Vincennes.

If Washington, on the heights of Valley Forge, breathed a prayer for succor and support, that kept up the hopes and aspirations of the naked men who surrounded him, let it be said of George Rogers Clark, that he also in that trying hour of need, radiated the same type of inspiration and encouragement to his men that Washington gave to the revolution and his copatriots. If one is remembered with undying fame and increasing reverence by all our people, the other is significant and must at least remain a secondary idol of those people who now comprise five States and more than one-fifth of our population. It was that spirit, not alone of adventure, but the spirit of men baptised with a new freedom that propelled the settlement of the Middle West.

Often in my study of the two famous settlements on this continent, that of Jamestown and Plymouth, I have reflected at length upon what could have been the attitude of those men and women, who were brave enough to leave the comforting shores of a civilized land, and embark on an unknown ocean 3,000 miles to the shores of an unfriendly continent. The perils of a new region were no doubt made known to them before they sailed. They could hardly be unmindful of the hardships they must face. The only answer that I have been able to fathom from my years of reflection is threefold in its character: First, there was a conscious knowledge they could worship the God of their choice, without being subjected to any restrictions or limitations and without being answerable to any power or authority, save their own decisive minds. Second, they knew that in a new land there would be no limitations of the law, which would or could restrict or modify their thought or conception of individual liberty. To be subdued, with the heavy weight of tyranny forever hanging over their heads, left a rebellious and resentful thought to fan the flame of freedom. Third, they did not live unto themselves. While perhaps they did not comprehend at the time the masses of posterity that would follow, nevertheless they must have thought what their children and their children's children would have to endure under the tyranny of England, so the home instinct was born in their desire to establish a civilization in a newly discovered Western Hemisphere.

That same spirit which fired the Pilgrim Fathers and Capt. John Smith's band of Virginians developed alike in each generation of the Colonies. There were new lands to subdue and conquer, new elements of nature to bring under the hand of progress. It was the vision of bigger and larger spheres of action that led Clark to undertake an almost inconceivable achievement—the winning of the West.

But to get back to the Revolution. This was the first real unified and organized effort to achieve self-government and self-control. The wide expanse of territory, under the blue canopy of heaven, and the natural environment of a far-flung horizon was conducive to independence of thought and independence of action, out of which grew the germ, revolution. For almost a hundred years men in the Colonies had realized and comprehended their power and strength for action. Washington, Jefferson, and Henry in the South, the Adamses and Hamilton in the North, with Franklin and his publication to link them together, constituted a force in the colonial affairs of the mother country. Military experiences during Queen Anne's and the French and Indian wars had developed confidence and self-reliance in their arms. The overt acts of a mother parliament were only incidents in adding fuel to the flame. It was the pretense and the excuse to begin to do what the leading men of the Colonies had wanted to do for years—establish their own government and maintain their own self-control. Passive resistance was no longer a virtue. The sword became the arbiter of disputes.

Four places stand out in bold relief on the surface of the history of this period. Not far from the site of where the Pilgrim Fathers first set foot on a bleak New England coast, liberty was fondled in the cradle at Lexington. In the northern climate they were less restive and more impatient to tackle the problems of self-government, and so with the moral support and sympathy of all the Colonies, Paul Revere sounded the death knell of tyranny and sent forth the signal of liberty in his fateful ride on the 19th of April in 1775.

A little more than a year afterward, another important scene was enacted within the confines of this State, when the Continental Congress adopted that masterpiece of all state papers—Jefferson's discourse on independence and individual liberty. Those peals sounding from the Liberty Bell, that gave news immediately to the inhabitants of the City of Brotherly Love, literally echoed around the world. Liberty was firmly established from that day forward. The third place linked with the Revolution and well known to every school child in America, is Yorktown. Without the glare of sounding trumpets, without the color of rich dress uniforms, and without the pomp and ceremony of conquering armies known to continental Europe, the remnants of an army of 6 years received the surrender of Cornwallis and his well-trained but unskilled army of redcoats. These places, along with many others, show the marks of warfare. Not so with Valley Forge. This sacred spot stands in peculiar relation to the Revolution. No long lines of uniformed men fell on this field. The visible signs which are found at Bunker Hill, or Brandywine, or Trenton, or Saratoga, are absent here. No embankments witnessed the storming of enemy lines. Valley Forge is not a battlefield in the sense we understand combat action, but in many respects it was the scene of the mightiest struggle of the war. Conflicting opinions fought here. Discipline was taught here. Fear was overcome. Faith was triumphant. Faith in God, faith in man, faith in the principle that right makes might. On this hallowed ground, to the east and west of this chapel, tyranny fell and liberty triumphed. We have, here and there, spots which mark the site of battles, whose victory or defeat influenced the thought and progress of the world. Attempts have been made to chronicle the decisive battles of history, but no land or any clime can boast of any battle whose victory was so decisive as the spiritual victory won at Valley Forge.

Time will not permit me to enumerate the fall of thrones and dynasties since representative government was proclaimed through the sacrifices made at Valley Forge. The entire map of the world has been made and remade since then. Nations have been established and restablished according to the nationalities of its population. Rivers have run red with blood and millions have fallen on either side in subsequent conflicts. The echo from Valley Forge reechoed among the crowned heads of Europe. One by one, slowly but surely, the rights of kings and princes gave way to the rights of men. Again I say it was the spiritual victory at Valley Forge that encircled the globe and set men's faces toward the rising sun of tolerance and self-government.

Tolerance, discipline, sacrifice, self-reliance, perseverance, and humility are virtues in any race. These virtues have been exemplified in every righteous way. For the past 3 years we have been in the throes of a great war. It is not the kind of war I have been describing. It is the struggle of depression. It is the aftermath of warfare which inevitably follows in the wake of hostilities and in the remaking and reshaping of world destiny. We have seen as much misery, suffered as much financial losses, and witnessed as much destruction to our moral fabric, perhaps, as in any clash of arms in which we have ever been engaged. For a time we tried with the arm of might, within our own right, to fight this battle, but the world lost sight of the virtues that exalted nations. We must get back to fundamentals. We must get back to first things first. It is only after a surrender of our avarice and greed that we are beginning to see the silvery rays of a new day dawning in the east. We appear to be slowly but definitely emerging from this depression. We fervently hope for a return of prosperity.

The firm and decisive leadership of our Executive spreads hope and confidence throughout the land. New ambitions are springing up in the hearts of men and women. The world is looking to America for counsel and guidance. With the same type of sacrifice, with the same measure of devotion and with the same degree of submission, we are placing our all upon the altar in obedience to the example exemplified by Washington in his trials here.

Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill will always be known as the "cradle of liberty." Philadelphia is proclaimed throughout the Nation as the home of independence. Yorktown will be noted to generations yet unborn as the arc of triumph of democracy. But Valley Forge will remain throughout the countless ages as the altar of freedom. Without shot or shell, without the beat of fife and drum, the greatest victory of them all was achieved here. In this hour of our country's darkest period let us lift up our eyes and hearts unto the heights of Valley Forge and drink again from that fountain of inspiration and place on its altar sacrificial offerings of a new and better service to mankind. "Inasmuch as ye do it unto the least of one of these, my children, ye do it also unto me." In this spirit the State of Lincoln joins with you today in dedicating anew our lives and fortunes to the perpetuity of this Republic, whose birth was conceived on this spot by Washington and dedicated by the blood of the fathers.

ALLOWANCES TO VETERANS

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. CROSSER, may be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a table showing the allowances to veterans under the old law and their present allowances or compensations under the new regulations, with further explanatory matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, the Veterans' Bureau has estimated the savings for the fiscal year 1934 under title I of "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government" as follows:

WORLD WAR

Service-connected cases

Service-connected cases will lose $156,826,010 annually.

At present 380,648 cases would draw, under the old law, $221,728,010.

Under the new act 225,800 cases will receive $64,902,000.

Emergency officers' retirement

These officers will lose $6,729,827.

Under the old law, 6,314 retired officers would receive $10,029,827.

Under the new act the number is reduced to 2,000 retired officers and the amount reduced to $3,300,000.

Death compensation

(World War, including widows, orphans, and dependent parents, all service connected)

These beneficiaries will lose $13,689,837 annually.

Under the old law 107,325 would receive $39,389,637.

The number of beneficiaries under the new act will be reduced to 77,000 and the cost to $25,700,000.

Disability allowance

(Presumed to be for disabilities not connected with the service)

These veterans will lose $91,768,326 annually.

Under the present law, 501,724 would receive $101,652,326.

The number has been reduced to 48,500 under the new act and the amount to $9,884,000.

SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR, INCLUDING BOXER REBELLION, PHILIPPINE INSURRECTION

Service-connected

The number of cases has been increased from 600, under the old law, to 19,400, under the new act.

The amount has been increased from $291,600 to $11,508,400.

The widows have been increased from 1,175 at a cost of $330,175 to 2,300 at a cost of $700,000.

Non-service-connected

These veterans will lose $85,566,633.

Under the old law 197,260 would receive $107,026,277.

Under the present law, 98,600 of these veterans will receive $21,459,644.

The number of service-connected widows, under the old law, was 42,161, who would have received $17,124,658.

Under the new act, 41,036 will receive $7,700,000, or a loss of $9,424,658.

CIVIL WAR

Service-connected and non-service-connected

Under the old law 22,525 veterans would have drawn $24,000,000.

Under the new act, 22,525 veterans will receive $21,460,700, or a loss of 10 percent.

Widows

Widows will lose 10 percent for 1 year only, the same as the veterans will lose 10 percent for 1 year only.

Under the old law 122,492 would have received $58,534,100 the coming year.

Under the new act they will receive $52,680,690, or a loss of $5,853,410.

OTHER WARS

Indian, Mexican, 1812

The veterans will lose $559,747.

Under the old law 4,676 would receive $2,808,188; they will receive $2,248,441, under the new act instead.

The widows, 5,135, would have received $2,025,028. They also take a 10 percent reduction and will receive $1,822,525.

PEACE TIME

Service-connected

The number under the old law would have been 21,082 and the amount $6,400,000.

Under the new act the number of veterans will be 30,389 and the amount $5,672,000, or a loss to the veterans of $728,000.

The widows will be increased from 5,736 under the old law to 10,736 under the new act, and the amount increased from $1,389,974 to $2,400,000.

Under the new act there will also be an estimated saving of $34,000,000 in administration, medical, hospital, and domiciliary services from $110,538,514 under the old law, to $76,538,514 under the new act.

MILITARY AND NAVAL INSURANCE

There will be a reduction of from $134,000,000 under the old law to $123,000,000 under the new act.

HOSPITAL AND DOMICILIARY FACILITIES AND SERVICES

There will be a reduction from $5,000,000 under the old law to $1,000,000 under the new act.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATE FUND

There will be a reduction of from $100,000,000 under the 1934 estimate to $50,000,000.

A total saving estimated at $460,000,000.

(A) THE NEW SECOND MISSOURI CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT—(B) CONGRESS GIVES LOYAL SUPPORT TO HE PRESIDENT

Mr. LOZIER. And, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by printing a radio address delivered by me on the 25th of the month.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, on the evening of May 25, 1933, while in Washington, by a system of electrical transcription I delivered a short radio address from KRFU broadcasting station located at Columbia, Mo. I ask unanimous consent that the address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By a recent act of the State legislature Missouri has been divided into 13 congressional districts, 1 of which, the second, embraces the counties of Carroll, Charlton, Randolph, Lafayette, Saline, Howard, Cooper, Boone, Cole, Moniteau, Miller, Morgan, Benton, Camden, and Hickory.

While I profoundly regret the loss of any of the counties I previously represented, I consider myself exceedingly fortunate and highly honored by being placed in the new Second District, which was carved out of the heart of our great Commonwealth, with a population of nearly 300,000 intelligent, progressive, and cultured people.

As I am the only 1 of our 13 Congressmen living in the new Second District, it is my duty, privilege, and pleasure to represent and serve the people of these 15 counties. They are entitled to faithful and efficient service, and I shall endeavor to bring to my new task the same industry, zeal, and unremitting attention to my duties that I tried to exercise during the 10 years I represented the old Second District.

While striving to promote the well-being of my State and Nation, my primary purpose will be to represent the people of the new Second District; to be their agent and attorney in the Nation's Capitol; to speak their language, safeguard their interests, reflect their wishes, and lighten their burdens.

I am loyally supporting the wise and constructive program of President Roosevelt and the present Congress, which has already halted the march of the American people toward economic chaos. The benevolent effects of the President's policies will be increasingly noticeable from month to month. The people are vitally interested in the prompt enactment and sympathetic administration of sound, progressive, and forward-looking legislation that will restore popular government, eliminate waste and extravagance from the administration of public affairs, lift the present unbearable tax burdens, promote social justice, place agriculture on an economic equality with industry, purge our financial system of crooked practices that impair its usefulness and threaten our national well-being; in short, legislation that will establish and maintain a just and proper balance between all vocational groups, thereby enabling all classes to equitably share in the new wealth annually created by the American people.

As the representative of a great district, I pledge my wholehearted support of all legislative and economic programs that will aid in establishing these much-desired policies, and bring our Government back to the old paths and landmarks of our constitutional fathers. Grave abuses have grown up in our financial, industrial, political, and economic systems. As a result of class legislation certain favored groups have wrongfully been permitted to use the agencies and instrumentalities of the Government to accomplish their selfish, sordid, and unethical purposes and to exploit and plunder the people.

To accomplish much-needed reforms and heal the festering ulcers on our body politic there must be genuine cooperation between the President, the Congress, and the people. In my efforts to secure the enactment of helpful and wholesome legislation, I crave the patient forebearance, support, and earnest cooperation of the good people I have the honor to represent. I welcome any suggestions from my constituents that will help solve present-day problems, lift the pall of depression, restore normal conditions, and bring into the lives of the average man and woman that full measure of happiness and prosperity intended by a benign providence and to which they are justly entitled under our beneficent form of Government. I hold myself in readiness to render my new constituents every possible service.

When Mr. Roosevelt was inaugurated conditions, which were never more serious or tragic were rapidly approaching the final stage of an economic debacle which if not quickly arrested would spell the bankruptcy and ultimate and inevitable destruction of agriculture, industry, banking, transportation, commerce, and the other agencies and activities of our highly diversified and exceedingly complex civilization. Under these calamitous conditions Congress felt justified in granting the President certain plenary powers, and in harmony with the President's recommendations, Congress enacted such new and far-reaching legislation as, in the opinion of the President and Congress, was necessary to avert the impending chaos and restore normal conditions.

Inasmuch as there was a radical and seemingly irreconcilable difference in opinion as to what measures would afford the quickest, surest, and greatest degree of relief, and as the responsibility for initiating and administering emergency measures rests primarily on the Executive, it was and is my deliberate opinion that Congress should loyally support the President's policies and give him a free hand to try out his remedies and ample opportunity to demonstrate the soundness and workability of his program.

With our National Treasury bankrupt for 3 years, with an appalling and ever-mounting cost of Government, with a crushing load of taxation, with agriculture prostrate and drifting rapidly to peasantry and penury, with 12,000,000 unemployed men and women, with every vocational group broken on the rock of insolvency, with millions of underfed and undernourished men, women, and children at a time food commodities were never so cheap and abundant, the President, Congress, and the people reached the conclusion that only by heroic treatment and resort to unusual and extraordinary remedies could we escape Nation-wide insolvency and economic chaos.

And so with a swiftness of decision and celerity of action unexampled in the history of self-governing nations, the President formulated and Congress enacted constructive and comprehensive legislation to meet the emergency, lift the depression, and turn our people back into the paths of prosperity and normal life. Other measures will be enacted, and when the President's program is completed its wise and sympathetic administration will materially aid every vocational group and bring substantial relief to people in every walk of life. That I had a little part in putting over the President's program will ever be to me a source of pride and genuine satisfaction.

While disapproving some features of the administration's program, and doubting the wisdom and workability of some of the proposals, I am nevertheless going along with the President and loyally supporting his policies. In this Nation-wide, appalling, and unprecedented emergency, the American people, regardless of politics, have unlimited confidence in President Roosevelt, and are with supreme assurance looking to him and to Congress for relief from long-existing, and may I say, unbearable burdens.

When our labors are half completed, when we are confronted with new, perplexing, and seemingly insurmountable difficulties, when we realize that new sacrifices must be made and new formulas must be adopted before we can lift the pall of depression, and before the people can be insured a happy, contented, and prosperous future, we may well pause to inquire what we, as individuals, have contributed and will contribute to the success of the President's rehabilitation program. Who among us have withheld from our democratic President the aid, encouragement, and cooperation he might reasonably expect from an intelligent and patriotic citizenry? Who, if any, have stood on the side lines and capriciously assumed the role of faultfinders and sneering, cynical, carping critics? Who, if any, among us have intrigued against the administration and sought to defeat its wise and wholesome policies? Only a few have failed their President and their country.

Without regard to their political affiliations, the American people have rallied to the President's standard. Forgetting for the time their traditional animosities, actuated by lofty ideals and exalted patriotism, Democrats and Republicans have given unstinted support to the President as he struggled to rescue a great but bewildered Nation from an economic abyss. In this unprecedented crisis party lines crumbled, and there was no North, no South, no East, no West, no Democrats, no Republicans, only Americans, fighting shoulder to shoulder to overcome the forces of fear and disaster and to preserve inviolate our free and benevolent institutions.

But the battle is not over. A complete and decisive victory has not yet been achieved. When we seemingly stand helpless before the onrushing forces of destruction, it is no time to weigh measures and remedies on an apothecary's scales; no time to wait until everybody has agreed on relief measures; no time to deliver hairsplitting, ponderous, and profound dissertations on political economy; no time to argue and quibble, grumble, and complain, or indulge in gloomy forebodings; no time for sharpshooting, bushwhacking, or sniping the President for partisan purposes, or for the gratification of an inordinate vanity or abnormal egoism; no time to assail the President's plans unless we are able and ready to offer constructive substitutes or a workable alternative system; no time for secret machinations or intriguing against the man in the White House, who with unflagging zeal and commendable courage resolutely set himself to the herculean task of saving a Nation from the baleful consequences of its own long-indulged folly.

Who, if any, among us has so little chivalry, is so void of sportsmanship, so cynical and insensible to generous impulses, so self-centered and sordid, so infatuated and intoxicated by his own little shriveled personality, that he cannot, or will not recognize in Franklin D. Roosevelt an exalted character with a great mind dominated by a great soul, each operating by benevolent, orderly, and logical processes, and each irrevocably dedicated to the cause of his country and mankind?

In beating a pathway out of this economic wilderness, the President and Congress may make mistakes, in fact have made mistakes, but this was to be expected when we consider the gravity of the situation and the prodigious tasks to be performed and performed quickly. When President Roosevelt assumed power the ship of state was on the rocks. Every vocational group was helpless and plunging to disaster. Our national Treasury was bankrupt, our banking system a wreck, our factories idle, our commerce dead, and from ocean to ocean fear halted initiative and paralyzed every industry. Something had to be done and done promptly. Heroic treatment was necessary, and in hastily formulating legislation it was inevitable that some mistakes would be made, but these will be corrected. Now that the President and Congress have averted disaster and set the Nation's face toward prosperity and normal conditions the few mistakes that were made will, I repeat, be corrected. The President will keep faith with the people and Congress will keep faith with the President, to the end that our free institutions be preserved and social justice established among all classes.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the new order of things and the new social and economic conditions, I am still a great believer in the fundamentals of the Federal Constitution and I think it shall survive notwithstanding all we may have done during this session of the Congress. It is still the charter of liberty in this Republic and when I find a friend to the Constitution I am glad to recognize him and therefore, I desire at this time to extend my remarks by including an address delivered by Mr. Sterling E. Edmonds on the radio on May 27, 1933, on the subject, "The Federal Octopus."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered May 27, 1933, by Mr. Sterling E. Edmunds in the tax series sponsored by the American Taxpayers' League, Inc.:

THE FEDERAL OCTOPUS

In the spring of last year, prompted by a sense of alarm over the growth of despotic governmental power emanating from Washington, I wrote and published a small volume designed to reveal to my fellow citizens in simple language how far usurpation of power by Congress had carried us away from our historic constitutional moorings.

I made it clear, I believe, that through the constant assumption of new powers by Congress, upon illegal precedents, and its delegation to scores of Federal boards, bureaus, and departments, the once-free American citizen is not only being plundered of his private property but is being stealthily robbed of all right of independent choice and action under a Government that has become utterly alien to that ordained by our ancestors.

I described this perverted transformation of our once mild and respected Government at Washington as the Federal octopus; and such it is, with its now numberless tentacles reaching out into every city and every county, into every hamlet and every home in the land, crushing out civil liberty and self-government, debauching the manliness and self-reliance of our people by pandering to the venality of large groups and classes; and through the taxing suckers of its ugly prototype, draining the lifeblood from all property, from all trade, and from all industry.

Since my volume appeared 1 year ago the Federal octopus in Washington has grown some new and more powerful tentacles, which are about to close around us.

The founders of our peculiar system of dual government never intended that Congress should possess unlimited power to do what it pleases. They saw vividly the universal oppression of peoples everywhere else on the globe by all-powerful kings or by all-powerful legislatures who had displaced those kings. Fresh from experience with tyranny, they had learned that the problem of escaping that oppression and of preserving liberty under government was the problem of placing and maintaining limits upon governmental power.

And so, for the first time in history, they sought to solve that problem in a written constitution of government, containing a body of limited, definite, and enumerated delegations of power, solemnly reserving to themselves all other powers not enumerated in that instrument. It was hoped thus forever to protect the person of the American citizen against the innate tendency of government to despoil him.

It has all been rendered futile by usurpation.

The corruption of our free government has been in progress with accelerating pace for about 30 years, since the Spanish-American War, when Congress refused to be bound by the Constitution in ruling a conquered alien people. Inevitably the exercise of autocratic power abroad was reflected in the rule at home, and so, act by act, Congress has repudiated its solemn oath to be bound by the limitations of the Constitution in its domestic legislation over the citizens of the United States.

One of the essential pillars upon which the Constitution rests is a clear division and separation of the powers of government into legislative, executive, and judicial, confided to respective coordinate and coequal branches. It is fundamental that no branch shall exercise any of the powers of the others. That is to say, to combine the executive and legislative powers or the executive and judicial powers, or all three, in a single agency was declared by both Alexander Hamilton and James Madison to be the essential definition of despotism.

Yet for 30 years Congress has been progressively delegating to Federal boards, bureaus, commissions, and departments not only its own law-making power but even the judicial power, so that these bureaus and departments may now make, execute, and sit in judgment upon their own laws.

Our general law of universal application and our right of appeal to our ordinary courts are gone, and in their place we find more than 400 Federal administrative agencies, that have issued and are issuing hundreds of thousands of laws, which they may change overnight, and which no citizen can find in any published compilation outside of the bureau that issued them.

The culmination of this process may be seen in the presumptuous delegation of law-making power in the most recent legislation—the so-called "Emergency Agricultural Relief Act" of May 12, 1933. In subsection C, section 10, of title II of that act it is boldly declared:

"The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, with the approval of the President, to make such regulations, with the force and effect of law, as may be necessary to carry out the powers vested in him by this act."

And in subsection D the Secretary of the Treasury is given identical powers to issue decrees, with the force of law, to carry out his powers.

These Secretaries are not only given the power to make laws but also the power to impose fines and penalties for violations of them, and the offending citizen is actually deprived of his common-law right of appeal to his ordinary courts to defeat this arbitrary action. Here is a denial of the most cherished principle of Anglo-American liberty, the principle of due process of law.

As one experiment after another, in regimenting the lives of our people fails, these bureaucrats hasten back to Congress with new bills for the grant of more power to cure the failure, with the result that practically all trade and industry have been driven out of natural channels, and with transportation lies strangled in governmental shackles.

This growth of bureaucratic tyranny may be best seen in the rise of the Department of Agriculture. On August 20, 1787, Gouverneur Morris offered a resolution in the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia to incorporate in the Constitution, then being framed, a provision for a Federal Department of Agriculture. It died in committee and was disallowed. Fifty-two years later Congress created an agricultural section in the Patent Office to gather statistics, with $1,000 appropriated for two employees. Last year—in 1932—this modest section, become the Department of Agriculture, consumed $333,500,000 of our taxes and supported an army of 30,000 Federal job holders.

Under the new so-called "Emergency Agricultural Relief Act" this number may be raised to 50,000 or 100,000, since the Secretary of Agriculture is empowered in that act to create jobs without limit, with salaries not to exceed $10,000 a year, however.

The framers of our peculiar limited system well knew that the most formidable power of government is that of taxation, and they said to Congress in section 8, of article I, of the Constitution:

"You may lay indirect taxes, such as duties and excises, but they shall be uniform throughout the United States."

And they said further in section 9:

"You shall have no power to levy any direct taxes unless you apportion them to the States on the basis of their population."

This historic rule of apportionment of direct taxes to the States according to population—which Hamilton declared had shut the door to oppression in taxation—protected the wealth of this country from being plundered by Congress for 124 years.

It was designed purposely to prevent a majority of the less-enterprising States from combining in Congress to pillage the industrious minority through unequal and discriminatory taxation.

But that is precisely what has happened since 1913, when a proposal of Congress to overthrow the rule of apportionment and give itself unlimited power to take all private income was ratified by the State legislatures in the sixteenth amendment.

Congress immediately thereafter embarked upon a career of such contempt for constitutional limitations and of such profligacy and waste of our private wealth as must inevitably have brought on economic collapse.

There are two fundamental principles that inhere in the very nature of taxation, and they are that it shall be uniform and that it shall be equal.

It was taken for granted that Congress would respect these principles in any exercise of its new direct-taxing power. But in its very first act of legislation in 1913 these principles were callously violated.

In 1915, when this grossly discriminatory, graduated income-tax law, based upon graduations of wealth alone and intentionally made unequal, was challenged in the Supreme Court, that tribunal, turning its back upon its own earlier decisions, held the law constitutional.

From the day of that decision Congress has taken from about 4 percent of our people the vast capital sum of $32,000,000,000 and wasted it as political spoils, when otherwise it would have gone back into the reproductive channels of trade and industry to multiply its blessings of employment and opportunity throughout a land now bled white.

With the repudiation by Congress of the just principles of taxation came logically enough a repudiation of the limitations as to the objects upon which Congress might constitutionally spend the huge sums that could now be extorted.

There are now in practice no limits, either to the amount Congress may take from such citizens as it pleases, or to the objects, individuals, or private classes, upon whom it may bestow what it has taken from others. Yet every citizen with the least knowledge of our American institutions knows that no tax may be constitutionally levied but for a governmental or strictly public purpose.

This is not a constitutional power of taxation; it is a simple power of confiscation, which no just government ought or would wish to possess. For, as Mr. Justice Story has said:

"Indeed, in a free government, almost all other rights would be utterly worthless if the Government possessed an uncontrollable power over the private fortune of every citizen."

I exhort you as fellow citizens, now passing under a socialized bureaucratic despotism, to get out your copies of our Federal Constitution and learn the extent of your betrayal. I urge you to compare that plain list of 18 powers delegated to Congress in section 8 of article I with the vast new powers which Congress has arrogantly assumed.

You will find there no authority whatever for its creation, under the Department of Agriculture, of a national monopoly in our food supplies, with power to fix prices, authorized in the so-called "Agricultural Marketing Act of 1929." You will find no warrant for its creation, in the same act, of the Federal Farm Board and the gift to it of $500,000,000 of our taxes, with which to gamble in wheat and cotton, $400,000,000 of which it has lost. You will find no authority in Congress to enact the recent so-called "Emergency Agricultural Relief Act", conferring upon the Secretary of Agriculture the power, not only to make laws and impose penalties, freed from judicial review, but the power actually to levy taxes upon us all in behalf of a private class.

You will find no power delegated to Congress to authorize the loan of hundreds of millions of our taxes to favored farm groups to promote their private fortunes or to make good their losses in farm-land speculation; nor will you find any authority for like loans and gifts of other hundreds of millions to favored States, municipalities, and private corporations.

You will find no power confided to Congress for the recent waste of $400,000,000 and the proposed waste of $450,000,000 more in western irrigation schemes, designed primarily to enrich certain favored private landowners at your expense.

In the tenth amendment you will discover an explicit denial to Congress of any power to meddle with the reserved rights of the States over agriculture, education, and public health, and scores of other objects upon which it has authorized the annual squandering of additional hundreds of millions.

You will find a like denial to Congress of any power to license, regulate, and control the great grain and livestock exchanges or other trade and manufactures in the States, save as to such of their products as have actually entered into and become interstate commerce.

And, finally, you will look in vain for any mention of "emergency" as justifying an enlargement of the limited list of powers delegated to Congress. But if you will read the Civil War case of Ex parte Milligan (4 Wallace, 2) you will find the stirring words of Mr. Justice Davis declaring for the Supreme Court:

"The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and for people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government."

Within the limited range of the constitutional powers of Congress there is no room for socialistic experiments in government. Yet much of its recent legislation is based squarely upon the doctrines of Engle and Karl Marx. The calamitous result has been that every latitudinarian construction of the Constitution, adopted to permit a desired experiment, has destroyed the constitutional safeguard involved.

If the experiment fails, as in the case of the Farm Board, the precedent remains, and your constitutional safeguard that was construed away is gone, and you cannot put it back.

Thus we witness, rising upon the Farm Board precedent, a more gigantic and ominous experiment in crop and crop-price control, in the so-called "Emergency Agricultural Act of 1933."

American citizens once possessed a constitutional safeguard against executive taxation, which came down to us with the glorious fame of John Hampden. But that has been construed away, first in executive customs taxation, and now it fails to protect us against the proposed executive processing tax authorized in the new agricultural act.

The safeguard against taxation without representation by executive fiat is as fully gone also as to income and inheritance taxation and all other forms of raising Federal revenue.

No charter designed to limit the powers of government so as to preserve ordered human liberty can long survive such a process. It is a piecemeal tearing down of the Constitution, a breaking of its continuity and symmetry, that leaves no political philosophy in its place. There results a hodge-podge of conflicting tendencies and theories, impossible of logical reconciliation, leading to a capricious absolutism.

The Supreme Court was instituted as the special guardian of the Constitution and it was a valiant defender of that great charter in other days. Thus in 1874 it solemnly declared:

"To lay with one hand the power of government on the property of the citizen and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals, to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less robbery, because it is done under the forms of law, and is called taxation. We have established, we think, beyond cavil, that there can be no lawful tax which is not laid for a public purpose."

Yet today, when the citizen has been dispossessed of his free right of appeal, that Court usually refuses to take jurisdiction in suits challenging the validity of such experimental legislation or the validity of appropriations to enforce it on the ground that the questions involved are of a political nature and are therefore not justifiable.

If the Supreme Court should take jurisdiction of a suit to test the constitutionality of the recent so-called "Emergency Agricultural Relief Act" and sustain its provisions conferring upon the Secretary of Agriculture, who will act through inferior clerks, the power to levy and collect taxes on commodities and the processing of them, and then to expend these moneys as rewards for restraints of trade and the violations of every known rule and principle protecting an open field and free opportunity for all, then it may well be said that we are on our way to communism, and the Supreme Court will have ceased to be the protector of the people in their republican form of government.

What is happening to us today is what has happened to all other republics of history. In the words of Mr. Justice Story again:

"They have perished and perished by their own hands; prosperity has enervated them, corruption has debased them, and a venal populace has consummated their destruction."

Can we turn back?

The answer to that solemn question lies in the extent of virtue and capacity for self-sacrifice which remains in the people themselves.

When we consider the displacement of the three branches of our Government by the Executive and the centralization of their powers in his single person the chances of self-rescue appear remote indeed. For that is an historical stage in the progress toward the overthrow of freedom following the tyranny of the legislature, which was foreseen and predicted by none other than Thomas Jefferson himself in warning us to vigilance.

Within the next 2 years, however, the people of the 48 States will have the first—and maybe the last—opportunity since the Constitution was ratified to meet in conventions in their sovereign capacity to expunge a monstrous policy of legislative tyranny over their private conduct.

In the preambles of those ratifying resolutions they have the chance, if they will take it, to make known to Congress and to the Executive and to the courts as well their disapproval of the aggrandizement of Federal power and to demand the calling of subsequent conventions through which free and limited government may be restored.

If this chance for the peaceable withdrawal of autocratic powers from the Federal Government be lost, it will sooner or later make itself heard through force, and we shall be caught in that endless circle of which Jefferson warned, "of rebellion, oppression, reformation; and oppression, rebellion, and reformation again; and so on forever."

For more than a hundred years ours was the noblest attempt ever made by man to govern himself without master. Today we may exclaim with Byron on beholding the Acropolis at Athens:

"Shrine of the mighty! Can it be
That this is all remains of thee?"

POSHENG YEN

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, after hearing the statement by the leadership of the House, I shall not make the motion which the Speaker had promised to recognize me to make, but I am going to submit a unanimous-consent request and ask 5 minutes to explain each one. If, after 5 minutes of explanation, anyone shall object to the passage of either of these bills, of course, it will have to go over until next Monday.

I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 48, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and is for the purpose of admitting a Chinese citizen by the name of Posheng Yen to the United States Military Academy.

This citizen of China is substituted in the place of his brother who, by act of the last Congress, was authorized to be admitted, but has since found it inconvenient to be admitted himself.

I ask unanimous consent that this Senate bill may be passed with two amendments which the Committee on Military Affairs has recommended.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to ask the gentleman a question. It has been the practice, unwise in my judgment, to admit citizens, say, of China and of other countries, to attend the Military Academy at West Point and the Naval Academy at Annapolis. Why continue it?

Mr. McSWAIN. Let me say to the gentleman that I feel exactly like he does about it, and I had hoped that the last measure we passed in the Seventy-second Congress of this kind would be the last one. I so notified the War Department, but the State Department did not know our attitude, and now urges this legislation on diplomatic grounds.

Mr. BLANTON. In that connection I want to ask the gentleman this question: These establishments are for our own American citizens, to prepare them for military activities. We hope to so train them at West Point that they will be outstanding generals that will "out general" any other general anywhere on the face of the earth, and we expect to train future admirals at Annapolis so they can "out admiral" any other admiral in any other navy of the world. Why should we bring these other countries in here and give them the benefit of our inside secrets on the kind of training that we hope to use to "best" them if we ever have to go to battle against them?

Mr. McSWAIN. Let me say that the instruction of the Academy is not in technical, military matters, but largely a matter of general education and discipline and character formation, and any alien citizen acquiring this training will not have any "edge" on any Army officer trained in our advanced-service schools.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the purpose of it?

Mr. McSWAIN. It is just a diplomatic courtesy. They extend many courtesies to us.

Mr. BLANTON. To what other countries now are we extending this privilege in addition to China?

Mr. McSWAIN. Costa Rica and Siam only.

Mr. BLANTON. We are not extending it to any of the big powers?

Mr. McSWAIN. Nor the strong ones, either.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not object this time, as this Chinese boy is already here, but I think it is an unwise practice we ought to stop and I have helped to stop some of it, and I am going to give notice to the Military Affairs Committee and the Naval Affairs Committee that I am going to oppose vigorously such propositions in the future.

Mr. McSWAIN. I may say that I have notified the State Department that they should not make commitments of this sort before consulting us.

Mr. BLANTON. If we have room for some future general and some future admiral in these academies it ought to be an American and not a national of some other country.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 48

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit Posheng Yen to receive instructions at the United States Military Academy at West Point: Provided, That no expense shall be caused to the United States thereby, and that Posheng Yen shall agree to comply with all regulations for the police and discipline of the Academy, to be studious, and to give his utmost efforts to accomplish the courses in the various departments of instruction, and that said Posheng Yen shall not be admitted to the Academy until he shall have passed the mental and physical examinations prescribed for candidates from the United States, and that he shall be immediately withdrawn if deficient in studies or in conduct and so recommended by the Academic Board: Provided further, That in the case of said Posheng Yen the provisions of sections 1320 and 1321 of the Revised Statutes shall be suspended.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, after the words "West Point", insert "for the course beginning not later than July 1, 1934."

Page 2, line 10, after the word "suspended", insert the following proviso: "Provided further, That Senate Joint Resolution 179, approved March 3, 1933, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. BLANTON. I wish to offer an amendment, that after the name where it first appears insert "in lieu of and as a substitute for his brother."

Mr. McSWAIN. That is all taken care of by the amendment in the proviso just reported.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw my amendment.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

A motion by Mr. McSWAIN to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, in deference to the majority leader, I will not make the motion to suspend the rules on the National Guard bill, but will defer it until next Monday.

MANUFACTURE AND SALE OR POSSESSION OF BEER IN THE STATE OF OKLAHOMA

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H.R. 5690 to legalize the manufacture, sale, or possession of 3.2-percent beer in the State of Oklahoma, when and if the same is legalized by a majority vote of the people of Oklahoma or by an act of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain just what this bill does?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, let me say in the first place that this bill only applies to Oklahoma. The legislature of that State has submitted a referendum vote upon which the people will vote on the question of legalizing beer on the 11th of July. We have already passed an act in Congress authorizing the manufacture, sale, and possession of 3.2-percent beer, but there are a few old statutes passed years ago before statehood, when Oklahoma was an Indian country, that it is feared might interfere with the sale of beer in the event that there is a favorable vote on the referendum. That is, all this does is to legalize the manufacture, sale, and possession, provided only that the people themselves vote favorably on the referendum, or it is legalized by the State legislature.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McFADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I do it only to ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes when the gentleman has finished.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma for the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the manufacture, sale, and/or possession of 3.2-percent beer is legalized in the State of Oklahoma when and if the same is legalized by a majority of the legal voters thereof, or by an act of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma, and all acts or part of acts in conflict therewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "voters thereof" and insert "vote cast at an election held in such State."

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma what that amendment does?

Mr. HASTINGS. It is merely a clarifying amendment so as to legalize beer if the majority of the legal voters or of those who vote at the election—in other words, ratified by a majority of those voting.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I have no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HASTINGS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, let me say in further explanation, this bill, H.R. 5690, is to legalize the manufacture, sale, or possession of 3.2-percent beer in the State of Oklahoma, when and if the same is legalized by a majority vote of the people of Oklahoma or by act of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma.

The Legislature of the State of Oklahoma has submitted an act to legalize the manufacture, sale, and possession of beverages, including beer, containing not more than 3.2 percent of alcohol by weight, to a vote of the people of the State of Oklahoma, at a special election ordered to be held throughout the State on the 11th day of July 1933.

Prior to statehood in Oklahoma, when the area comprising what is now the State of Oklahoma, was occupied by many Indian tribes, and the eastern part by the Five Civilized Tribes and was known as the "Indian Territory", Congress enacted special legislation prohibiting the introduction, possession, and sale of vinous, malt, or intoxicating liquors into the Indian Territory, including the act of March 1, 1895 (28 Stat.L. 697), and by subsequent legislation the act of June 30, 1919 (41 Stat.L. 4).

The courts hold that the act of March 1, 1895, section 8, prohibiting the introduction of intoxicating liquors into the Indian country, and the act of June 30, 1919 (41 Stat.L. 4), remained in force and effect after the admission of Oklahoma into the Union as a State, and that these acts are special legislation and were not repealed by the provisions of the National Prohibition Act. (Sharp v. United States, 16 Federal, 2d series, 876.)

The present bill is intended to modify and repeal the provisions of the acts of March 1, 1895, and of June 30, 1919, supra, so as to exclude from its prohibition of said statute 3.2-percent beer, when and if 3.2-percent beer is legalized by a vote of the people of the State of Oklahoma or by an act of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma, placing the State of Oklahoma in the same position, so far as the manufacture, sale, or possession of 3.2-percent beer is concerned, as other States of the Union.

The act of June 30, 1919, was added as an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill and consisted of adding the word "or" and this amendment did not change the penalty, and added no new penalty, and if the act of June 30, 1919, were repealed it would not repeal the act of March 1, 1895, to which I have referred.

Congress has passed a beer bill legalizing the sale of 3.2-percent beer throughout the country. I believe in the referendum and favor permitting the legal voters of Oklahoma to settle the question of legalizing beer for themselves. This question is to be decided by direct vote of the people of Oklahoma on July 11, 1933. This bill clears away Congressional inhibitions so that the will of the people of the State of Oklahoma, as expressed at the polls, will prevail.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a short legal notice which I ask the Clerk to read in my time. The reason for that is this: Last week I called the attention of the House to tax evasion on the part of the Mellons, of Pittsburgh. This is a legal notice which shows an attempt to cover up evidence of the Ricsar Co. Certainly, if the books and records of this company are destroyed by this proposed dissolution, the Attorney General would be handicapped in his investigation of this private holding company organized for the purpose of evading taxes, owned privately by R. B. Mellon. This case being already in the hands of the Attorney General for investigation, he should know this. It is another reason why this House should pay some attention to the question of tax evasion, and my resolution purposing an audit of the United States Treasury. I ask that the Clerk read the notice in my time.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the Clerk will read.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

MOORHEAD & KNOX, ATTORNEYS AT LAW,
1732 OLIVER BUILDING,
Pittsburgh, Pa.

In the Court of Common Pleas of Allegheny County, Pa., No. 1802 July term, 1933. In the matter of the petition of the Ricsar Co., for decree of dissolution. Notice is hereby given that the Ricsar Co., a Pennsylvania corporation, has filed, in the above court and at the above number and term, its petition praying for a decree of dissolution, and that the court has fixed the 12th day of June 1933, at 9:30 o'clock a.m., eastern standard time, as the time and the said court as the place for hearing said petition in application for dissolution, when and where all persons interested may attend and show cause, if any they have, why the prayer of said petition should not be granted.

MOORHEAD & KNOX,
Attorneys for Petitioner.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I now desire to call your attention to another tax case in the form of a large tax refund that should have the attention of this House.

Mr. Speaker, for more than a year I have sought action by the Rules Committee and by the House on my resolution to conduct an investigation of the Treasury Department. My requests have always been refused, although not so long since I was tendered the explanation that I had not produced sufficient evidence to make such an investigation seem necessary. I have cited many instances of strange conduct by Treasury officials, including an apparent evasion of personal income taxes by Andrew W. Mellon while he was Secretary of the Treasury—an evasion, in the single instance cited, of well over a million dollars.

For reasons that are beyond my knowledge, but none beyond my surmise, the Treasury does not seem to desire that it be investigated. This unwillingness for a Treasury investigation seems to extend to other branches of the Government.

During the past week there has been much unfavorable discussion of individuals connected with the Treasury. Testimony before a Senate committee has disclosed what seem to be grave inconsistencies in the application of the income tax laws passed by the Congress. The able publicists whose services are at the disposal of the House of Morgan have poured out a stream of propaganda to the effect that Mr. Morgan is blameless for not paying his taxes, that the blame rests upon Congress. That charge is correct, though not in the sense that it is made. We are to blame because we let the racketeers entrenched in the Treasury get away with their racket.

The power to stop abuses lies in our hands and in our hands alone. If we refuse to exercise that power in the public interest, if we sit by and permit crime to go unpunished, larceny to go unretrieved, then the fault is ours. We are considering new taxes. For what purpose? So that the Morgans and the Mellons and the Mitchells will have new laws to evade? If we do not enforce the laws we have, how can we expect to collect revenue from any other laws?

Law enforcement—more than law enforcement, is the foundation of successful government. At this point in our history the Government of the United States is not a successful government.

I have been told that I should offer additional evidence of the need of an investigation of the Treasury. I will do so.

I will quote a story from an American newspaper published in the city of Raleigh, N.C. Lest it be said that this newspaper is not a credible source of information or that it is an organ of agitation or sedition, I will preface that quotation by reading to you the statement of ownership and responsibility which appears at the top of the editorial page of the newspaper. It reads—

The News and Observer—"The Old Reliable"—Published every day in the year by the News and Observer Publishing Co., Josephus Daniels, president.

Surely I do not have to offer to the majority side of this House a certificate of character for the man who served as Secretary of the Navy in the war Cabinet of President Wilson.

Now for the quotation. I will include the large and impressive headlines in the quotation. The date of the newspaper is December 20, 1928:

Cannon estate gets $1,081,026 refunded taxes. Judge I. M. Meekins, sitting in chambers, signs compromise judgment. James W. Cannon was textile king. Executors sue for alleged tax overpayment made on 1918 and 1919 income; compromise claim for 50 percent plus interest since payment.

Just another refund, you say? There is more to it than that. Let us proceed with the text of this newspaper story. I will read from it:

On agreement of attorneys for both sides, Federal Judge I. M. Meekins, sitting in chambers here, yesterday signed a compromise judgment, compromised at 50 percent, by which executors and trustees of the estate of the late James W. Cannon, textile magnate, recovers $1,081,026, alleged to have been overpaid in 1918 and 1919 income, from the United States Government.

The amount to be returned by the Government represents half of the $882,615 on 1918 income and the $628,108 on 1919 income sued for, plus interest for the time it was paid under protest.

The suit was brought by Charles A. Cannon and David H. Blair, executors of the Cannon estate, and Charles A. Cannon, David H. Blair, and the Wachovia Banking & Trust Co., trustees of the same estate, against J. W. Bailey, former collector of internal revenue, and Gilliam Grissom, the present collector.

Let me interrupt the quotation for a moment to call your most particular attention to the next sentence of this newspaper story, which I will now read to you.

An interesting feature of the case was that Mr. Blair, one of the executors, is United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue at Washington and consequently in charge of the defense of the case, although he delegated the matter to subordinates.

Yes, he delegated the matter of defending the interest of the people of the United States to subordinates—subordinates who were working under his orders and wished to hold their jobs. It is to be noticed that Mr. Blair did not delegate his interests as trustee of the Cannon estate to any subordinate. That he took care of himself.

His interest in the prosperity of the Cannon estate was not solely the interest of a trustee in his trust. If that had been the sole consideration Mr. Blair would have been torn between love and duty, because in his capacity as Commissioner of Internal Revenue he was also a trustee—a trustee of the funds of the United States Government.

Mr. Blair did not hang suspended between the claims of two competing trusteeships. There was another weight in that scale of decision, a weight which tipped the balance so far that there was no doubt in his mind as to which side of this case should receive the benefit of his personal attention and which side should be "delegated to subordinates."

Through matrimonial relationship Mr. Blair is himself a principal beneficiary of the Cannon estate. He made his choice between public duty and private profit, and having made that choice he followed it in no half-hearted fashion. He turned his duty over to his subordinates and devoted his own attention to his profits.

Let me return to the quotation:

The estate was represented by Judge Schurman, partner of Charles Evans Hughes, of New York; Pou & Pou, of Raleigh; and Cansler & Cansler, of Charlotte. The case for the Government was handled by White B. Miller, of Chattanooga, special assistant to the United States Attorney General, and District Attorney Irving B. Tucker.

Turning once more from the direct quotation of this newspaper story, I will read a few lines from Hill's Raleigh (N.C.) City Directory, volume XIX, 1929. It is just the composition of the firm of Pou & Pou, as it is shown to the directory readers of Raleigh, N.C.

Pou & Pou (J. H. and J. H., Jr., J. L. Emanuel), lawyers, Lawyers' Building, 320 South Salisbury Street, room 804–808.

Judge Schurman has a legal identity and reputation of his own, I understand, and is not dependent upon his fame upon the fact that he was formerly the law partner of the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. The Charlotte firm I do not know.

Let me return once more to the newspaper quotation.

In its answers to the executors' complaints the Government alleged that the late Mr. Cannon had resorted to and practiced certain schemes and artifices to reduce and escape his Federal income taxes. Immediately the attorneys for the plaintiff demanded a bill of particulars which was denied on September 6, after hearings held here and in Durham. During these hearings the Government attorneys denied any intention of insinuating that Mr. Cannon had tried to evade his just taxes, meaning instead, they said, that he was trying to avoid payment of more than necessary taxes and had unintentionally gone over the legal line.

The "subordinates" to whose hands Internal Revenue Commissioner Blair committed the case of the Government seem to have been quite subordinate. Stating that they had evidence that Mr. Cannon was almost criminally involved and being supported in their contention by the refusal of the court to grant a bill of particulars, yet these Government attorneys hastened to put into the record their ostensible belief that Mr. Cannon was not at fault. As an extenuating circumstance, they set forth Mr. Cannon's desire to "avoid payment of more than necessary taxes." "More than necessary taxes!" Necessary from what point of view? Necessary to comply with the law as enacted by Congress or "necessary" only to establish a pretense of complying with that law?

Let us return to the newspaper story and have its final paragraphs.

On the taxes on his 1918 income, paid to Mr. Bailey in 1919, Mr. Cannon's executors demanded the return of $882,615. The half of this was agreed upon plus the interest since payment amounted to $647,161, the amount Judge Meekins ordered should be paid.

In the second case, that against Collector Grissom and concerning an alleged overpayment of taxes on Mr. Cannon's income, paid in 1920, the executors sued for $628,108 and compromised on half that amount, which, with interest, amounted to $433,865.

Mr. Speaker, under the law no compromise in a matter of income tax payment or refund can be entered into without the consent of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. This case did not go to a trial and a verdict; it was compromised in the judge's chambers. Mr. David H. Blair was present in that chamber at that compromise. In his Jekyll and Hyde dual personality as plaintiff and defendant, he agreed with himself to pay himself Government money and then blessed the bargain by donning for the moment the robes of his authority as Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

In his office at Washington, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue issued a ruling which made this compromise and payment assume the appearance of a legal transaction. Once the deal had been consummated, he hastily withdrew that ruling. The terms of that ruling have never been applied to the case of any other taxpayer in similar circumstances. It was written solely to secure from the United States Treasury the sum of $1,081,026. When that purpose had been served, the ruling was stricken from the record.

Mr. Speaker, David H. Blair was Commissioner of Internal Revenue during that period in our financial history which will be known to the future as the "refund era." Sitting in the seat of authority he rubber-stamped the billions of dollars of tax refunds which were paid out under the auspices of Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury. Almost daily, he saw pass over his desk a stream of political subsidies and financial loot totaling a greater amount than our widely discussed gold reserve.

Never was there a protest from David H. Blair. Always the refunds passed with his signed approval. He knew that approving those refunds was his job, that is what he sat in his official chair to do. He did it.

In December of 1928, Mr. Blair was near the end of his long term of office. He had seen many refunds made. Is it any wonder that he wanted a refund of his very own to take back to private life as a souvenir of his career in public office?

The trough was full in 1928. The word "deficit" was unknown in our language and there was plenty to go around. So Mr. Blair got his.

Mr. Speaker, we have reached the bottom of our financial barrel. Revenue has dwindled to a trickle which can no longer keep up with the river of outgo which has drained our Treasury for so many years.

The Treasury is our most vital concern. Upon it and by it we will either stand or fall as a Nation. No longer can we treat it as an inner holy of holies, not to be profaned by the touch of common feet. We must roll back the curtain and see with our own eyes if the Ark of the Covenant still be within the temple or if it has been given to some political henchman as a refund or a souvenir.

The Treasury is the largest business in the world. Never, since its vaults first closed on the modest funds of the new-born United States, has the Treasury of the United States been audited. If all is well in the Treasury, to demonstrate that by an investigation will send a wave of confidence sweeping over the land. If an investigation of the Treasury is again refused, the Nation will know that someone in power fears the facts that will be disclosed.

To conceal wrongdoing may be practical politics, but it is not honest government.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that resolution calling for the appointment of a committee of this House to investigate the Treasury, particularly for the period of the past 10 years, be reported by the Rules Committee and put upon its passage.

VALUE OF COINS AND CURRENCIES OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 192, a joint resolution to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States, and all points of order against said joint resolution are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and shall continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the joint resolution for amendment the committee shall rise and report the joint resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] on the rule. I shall not consume any of the time of the House in making any explanation of the terms of the rule. It has been read from the desk and provides for 3 hours' general debate upon the resolution, from the Committee on Banking and Currency. It is an open rule. I presume there will be no objection to the adoption of the rule. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, Victor Hugo once said that "Nothing dies harder or more thoroughly than an old regime." Tennyson put it more mildly when he said that "The old order changeth, yielding place to new, and God fulfills himself in many ways."

We are in the midst of the most far-reaching revolution that has ever occurred in all the history of the human race, one more far-reaching than the French Revolution of 140 years ago. We are breaking away from the old order, which is yielding place to the new. An old regime is dying, and a new age is being born. This Government is now leading the way, in response to the appeals and the needs of mankind, in this revolution—this far-reaching change in the financial and economic systems of the world.

For nearly 4 years we have been in the greatest panic this world has ever seen. During that time I, for one, have pleaded for an expansion of the currency as the only means of meeting this situation and redeeming the American people from the clutches of this terrible depression that has carried us almost to the brink of revolution and our country to the brink of ruin. We are about to put the finishing touches on that change.

Already we see evidences of improvement. As soon as the first move for currency expansion was taken by the President to lay the foundation for this change, there was an immediate relaxation throughout the country, like waking a man from a hideous nightmare. Immediately prices began to rise, business men began to take on new hope, enterprises began to take on new life. I have said for 3½ years that, if properly carried out, this policy would raise commodity values back to where they were when our debts were made and our other obligations were incurred. Today, with this policy only a few weeks old, and with this entire program not fully consummated, we have witnessed a marvelous improvement. The people of the West are getting more than twice as much for their wheat as they did when this Congress convened on March 9. The people of the Corn Belt are receiving more than three times as much for their corn as they were receiving when this Congress convened, and the people in the Cotton Belt are receiving almost twice as much for their cotton as they did when Congress convened.

It was the only step that this Government could take that would relieve this depression and bring about this gradual and phenomenal recovery.

A great Englishman, one of the great industrialists of Great Britain, less than 2 weeks ago said that while he did not want to appear as too optimistic, yet in his opinion these changes that are being brought about by such legislation as this would bring, not only to the British people but to the people throughout the world, the greatest era of prosperity in all the history of the human race.

I say today, as I said in this House some days ago, that this is the greatest step that has ever been taken by a government on an economic or a financial issue in all the history of governments. If fully carried out, this program will not only restore prosperity to the American people, but will give the world a working basis for expansion of currency, to bring values back to what they were when our debts were made, and enable the people of the world to pay the debts incurred by the war and as a result of the war and the aftermath of the war. It will bring in a new day, a new prosperity. Indeed, it will usher in a new era in the civilization of mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the joint resolution which the adoption of this rule will make in order cannot be defended either in law or morals. It is shocking to one's moral sense, to one's sense of right and wrong. It proposes that the law of the jungle, the law that might makes right, shall be made to govern the conduct of the Government of the United States.

What it seeks to accomplish could not be done except by sovereign power, and then only upon the assumption that the State can do no wrong.

The resolution looks not only to the future, but expressly applies to every obligation heretofore and hereafter incurred. The enactment of it into law will be an open declaration to the world that the Government of the United States does not intend to keep its word; that it repudiates its obligations and contracts, solemnly made by it. In the spirit of the bully it proposes that the United States say to the purchasers of its bonds, "I know that I have agreed to pay them in gold or its equivalent, and that you were induced to buy them partly upon that promise. I made that promise and held out that inducement to you as late as April 23 of this year, but now I have your money, I do not intend to do as I have agreed. What do you propose to do about it?"

Who wants to be a party to any such transaction? The resolution itself is also evasive. It declares that every provision in any contract or bond "which purports to give the obligee the right to be paid in gold * * * is declared to be against public policy." Such provisions have been inserted in bonds and other agreements to add to their attractiveness for a great many years, how long I have not had an opportunity to ascertain in the limited time since this resolution was introduced. Who suddenly discovered that they are against public policy, and when did he find it out? Is it against public policy for the United States or an individual to carry out a lawful contract according to its terms? What becomes of the sacredness of Government obligations or of contracts in general if such a doctrine becomes prevalent in the United States? Can virtue be made a sin or good public policy be made bad public policy or honor dishonor by mere ipse dixit or by a mere declaration of Congress?

The passage of the resolution cannot be defended upon the ground of necessity or inability to pay in gold. The Government of the United States is not bankrupt. There is more money in this country today than there ever was before in the history of government. It is said that 40 percent of the gold supply of the world is in the United States.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. We have about a hundred billion dollars' worth of contracts payable in gold. How are we going to meet those contracts with three and one-half billion in gold?

Mr. MAPES. Oh, we do not have a hundred billion dollars in obligations payable in gold or in any other money all at once.

Mr. PARSONS. There are no contracts——

Mr. MAPES. I do not yield further.

The resolution is not advanced as a temporary measure. There might be some excuse for it as an emergency measure or if it applied only to future commitments, but such is not the case. It does not propose that payments in gold be suspended temporarily but permanently. It applies not only to future but to past agreements. It goes still farther than that and asks the Congress to declare by law that any provision agreeing to pay in gold any contract—past, present, or future—is against public policy.

The Constitution of the United States prevents a State from taking the property of its citizens without due process of law, and yet that is exactly what this joint resolution proposes to have the Federal Government do. The stronger a person or an institution is, the more scrupulous he should be in the performance of his obligations. What an example to set before the world? What position will the United States be in to demand payment of the debts owed to it by foreign governments after the passage of this resolution? It not only proposes to repudiate its own obligations but to allow individuals who have entered into agreements between themselves to do the same.

How can business recover with such uncertainty hanging over it as is caused by the constant passage of legislation setting aside the obligations of contract, legislation which nobody dreams will be presented to Congress 24 hours before it comes here and which is passed without being given any adequate consideration? This Congress has authorized the President to engage in open-market operations, or to instruct the Federal Reserve banks to do so. It has authorized him to instruct the Secretary of the Treasury to issue paper money.

It has authorized him to revalue the gold dollar all in his discretion, and now, without any notice, this resolution comes here, repudiating all obligations of the Federal Government in which it has promised to pay in gold or its equivalent, and making it possible for individuals to do the same. What can business or anyone depend upon from one day to the next?

I saw an editorial in last week's copy of the Saturday Evening Post, which, it seems to me, states the situation very accurately. It reads:

> It is difficult to see how men are going to plan, contract, and employ, looking to future returns, if they are to be, from day to day, puzzled and confused by volley ofter volley of suddenly launched proposals and measures affecting employment, management, and the value of money. If business men are to recover their courage, they must not be kept in constant turmoil. The measures taken, even for emergency purposes, should be related to what the community understands, and proceed with reference to those elements of faith and trust without which everyday transactions cannot take place. There is no real healing in any other course.

This Congress has undoubtedly passed some good legislation, but I submit to the earnest consideration of the House if it has not, by the uncertainty of much legislation which has been passed and by the discretionary power which has been lodged in the President to be exercised by him at will or nobody knows when, done more harm than the good legislation could possibly do good.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman tell us what amount there is at the present time payable in gold in the country?

Mr. MAPES. I do not know and I do not think the amount is very material. There has been no time to look up such questions as the gentleman has asked since this resolution was introduced. It was only introduced last Friday afternoon, sent to the Printer, and reported by the Banking and Currency Committee Saturday morning without any consideration worthy of the name, and it is called up for passage in the House today, the next legislative day after it was reported, and only 2 legislative days after it was introduced. It is a travesty to attempt to consider legislation of this importance in this way. Everyone knows it cannot be considered seriously or adequately debated under such circumstances. This is no ordinary piece of legislation. It would be hard to overestimate its importance. No one can tell how far-reaching it may prove to be.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Michigan 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MAPES. It is ridiculous to bring up in this way legislation which the gentleman from Mississippi says is the most far-reaching resolution that ever faced the human race. This procedure is something that the Congress of the United States—the House of Representatives—cannot be proud of. The Committee on Banking and Currency gave the resolution such scant consideration that apparently it did not even read the first paragraph of it. If it had, I assume that it would have corrected a grammatical error appearing in that paragraph and which is perfectly apparent to anyone who reads it.

In order to prevent railroading legislation through the State legislature the people of my State a few years ago wrote into their State constitution a provision prohibiting the passage of any bill at any regular session of the legislature "until it has been printed and in the possession of each house for at least 5 days." It might be well to have some such limitation upon the action of the House of Representatives if it persists in passing important legislation without taking time to consider it.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I agree with the gentleman when he says the Government is not bankrupt. But there is always a great shout in this House that we are bankrupt whenever the soldiers of America are concerned.

Mr. MAPES. Well, that may be. I voted against the economy bill [applause], as the gentleman from Minnesota did, but I do not see how that enters into this question.

Here is a question of honor. Here is a question of good faith on the part of the United States. Where is the spirit of Grover Cleveland in this emergency? Can it be that the people of America want the Congress of the United States to endorse a resolution of this kind, repudiating a solemn pledge?

I cannot believe that my constituents want me to vote for it.

I cannot believe the American people have lost their courage or their determination to meet their obligations. I cannot believe they will approve of any action of the House of Representatives looking toward the repudiation of its obligations by their Government.

I wonder how many have read the editorial in this morning's New York Times, which quotes at length from the speech of the President 3 days before the last election, delivered at Brooklyn, in which he stated and reiterated his belief in a sound currency and that his supporters and the American people had nothing to fear in that respect if they elected him to the Presidency. Here is what that editorial says:

THE NEW LIBEL

During his Presidential campaign the charge was frequently thrown in Mr. Roosevelt's face that he and his party could not be trusted to maintain a sound currency. It was alleged that the taint of depreciated money was in Democratic blood. Mr. Roosevelt more than once resented and denied this accusation. He did it most fully and explicitly in the speech ending his campaign which he made in Brooklyn on November 4, 1932, just before the Presidential election. He repeated and emphasized the money plank in the Democratic platform: "We advocate a sound currency, to be preserved at all hazards." Then he turned the attack upon Mr. Hoover, asserting that the President was guilty not only of misrepresenting the Democratic position but of preaching a "gospel of fear." There followed this passage, quoted from the verbatim report of Mr. Roosevelt's speech, only 3 days before the election:

"The business men of the country, battling hard to maintain their financial solvency and integrity, were told in blunt language in Des Moines, Iowa, how close an escape this country had some months ago from going off the gold standard. But that, my friends, as has been clearly shown since, was a libel on the credit of the United States."

This seems to show that Mr. Roosevelt knows a libel when he sees one—perhaps even when he utters one. But the most interesting part of his Brooklyn speech remains to be cited:

"It is worthy of note that no adequate answer has been made to the magnificent philippic of Senator GLASS the other night, in which he showed how unsound this position was. And I might add, Senator GLASS made a devastating challenge that no responsible government would have sold to the country securities payable in gold if it knew that the promise—yes, the covenant—embodied in these securities was as dubious as the President of the United States claims it was."

There is really nothing to be done when words thus conflict with deeds, except to let the words speak for themselves.

Before this debate is over reference will probably be made to the fact that England and some of the other countries of the world are off the gold standard. In that connection I desire to call attention to the fact that England, at least, did not repudiate its existing obligations when it went off the gold standard in September 1931. Furthermore the legislation passed by the House of Commons at that time was of a temporary nature and not permanent, as is proposed here.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Snowden, in presenting that legislation in the House of Commons, expressly stated, and I quote from the Record of Debates in the House of Commons:

Where we are under obligations to make payments in dollars or other foreign currencies, as, for example, some of the war bonds that were issued in New York, we shall, of course, continue to meet our obligations punctually in those currencies.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The argument is made that there is not enough gold in the world to meet the gold obligations in our bonds. Is it not true that that promise to pay in gold or its equivalent is merely a pledge on the part of the Government that it will not depreciate its currency for the purpose of cheating its creditors; and is not the deliberate intent of this resolution one of cheating the creditors of the Government?

Mr. MAPES. Certainly; that is true. It has never taken very much gold to maintain the gold standard and to meet the Government's promise to pay in gold or its equivalent as long as everyone knew that the gold was available and that the Government intended to fulfill its promise. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. AYRES of Kansas). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] that this legislation will bring about a depreciation of our currency. I assure him that he will be able to buy just as much for the dollar that will be legal tender as he was able to buy in 1924, 1925, 1926, or at any time before that, with the dollar that was then legal tender.

It was only after a conference of the conniving manipulators in London in August 1929, under the leadership of Morgan and Lord Rothmere, the very men who caused the criminal inflation, that wholesale unloading of stocks took place and criminal short selling began, which short selling they and their associates, the directors and officers of the large concerns, have continued uninterrupted for the last 3 years, forcing thousands of our banks to close and enabling these men to repurchase billions of dollars of these securities at a small fraction of their value.

It is these men who are opposed to this proposed legislation, legislation that will to some extent aid creditors to repay their obligations, make possible the recapture of our export trade, and dispose of our surplus stocks and farm commodities. It is the representatives of the bond and mortgage holders who acquired millions of dollars of bonds at ridiculously low prices, which today they desire the Government and the issuers to pay in gold, who charge that this proposed legislation will repudiate obligations. But there will be no repudiation, no dishonesty; only a fair adjustment.

To my mind this legislation is a step in the right direction, and I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] that this will do more for the Nation than anything that heretofore has been done.

I believe this legislation will do more than anything to save our banks and our insurance companies, and to save the millions of people who, due to the criminal inflation and the subsequent deflation brought about by such men as Morgan, suffered wreck and ruin.

If Wall Street had not brought about the criminal inflation and later the deflation that ruined the Nation and bankrupted 90 percent of the American people, this legislation would not be necessary. But in view of present conditions this is the only way that we can bring about, not repudiation but adjustment—I repeat, not repudiation but adjustment—throughout the Nation.

Of course, I realize that this very group of which I speak may take advantage of this legislation and use it to start another orgy of speculation similar to the one from 1927 to 1929. However, I take this opportunity to serve notice that I shall not desist in my efforts to curb their unjustifiable inflation or destruction deflation.

By adopting the securities bill we have made a step forward, but that alone will not suffice. We must go farther. We must prevent the recurrence of the happenings in the years 1927 to 1929 and 1931 to 1933. To bring home to the American people the dishonest methods that are practiced by the investment bankers, and not only tolerated but sanctioned and even approved by the New York Stock Exchange, and as a warning, I am inserting a speech made by me on the floor of this House on December 9, 1929, in this connection:

WALL STREET "SHORTS" ARE THE ENEMIES OF PROGRESS, TRANQUILLITY, HAPPINESS, AND MORALITY

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, in my effort to secure consideration for legislation that would in the future make impossible a disaster such as the country has lately witnessed and which is described by President Hoover in his message to Congress as a "crash", I wish to call attention to certain facts, not with any desire to aggravate present conditions but only in the hope that the damnable, conniving, ruinous practices of the Wall Street "shorts" will not be tolerated any longer by an enlightened people.

I ask, of what possible good or aid are these men that are permitted every few years to destroy millions of men, ruin industry, destroy stability, and bring about destruction not only of billions of dollars of values but also of scores of lives?

Who are they? They are the enemies of progress, tranquillity, happiness, and morality. Not only in peace time but even during the war they pursued their destructive manipulations.

The press continually speaks about racketeers and their evils. Why, they are nothing compared to these rapacious parasites. Racketeers take the chance of being apprehended and punished, but these "Wallingford" financiers operate smugly and complacently, live in regal luxury and splendor in the most exclusive and expensive apartments with jewel-bedecked wives and mistresses, a menace to society by their mode of living, causing envy and discontent among families who cannot compete with them on their honestly earned incomes.

What justification is there for tolerating their beastly and dastardly activities? Most of you and I have witnessed the panics of 1893, 1907, and 1921, each of which was brought about by similar tactics of the destructive "shorts." As now conducted, many of the stock exchanges are open to the charge that gambling, pure and simple, constitutes a large proportion of their business. The governors of these organizations had it in their power to stop in time the activities of the short-selling forces but failed to do so.

Therefore, it is high time that we put an end to these parasites by legislation. Is it possible that their influence and power is so great that they have been permitted to manipulate without any restraint whatsoever to the grave detriment of the country and the party in power which since time immemorial has claimed "with pride" sole credit for all prosperity?

In keeping with this policy, ex-President Coolidge during his administration began an advertising campaign of prosperity, which Mr. Hoover followed, proclaiming that the resources of the United States were still untapped, that business conditions were showing improvement each year, and that savings were increasing. As stated in a New York World editorial:

"* * * After a sharp decline following a report of a huge increase in brokers' loans, Mr. Coolidge amazed even Wall Street itself by announcing that neither he nor Mr. Mellon saw any danger in the expansion of brokers' loans * * *."

This kind of propaganda continued even after it was pointed out that depressions had set in in many lines and that stocks were selling at levels ridiculously out of proportion with their earnings. But notwithstanding this warning, many other similar statements were issued from time to time to imbue the public with the confidence that stocks would never react but would keep on climbing to greater heights in this so-called "Hoover era of higher prices."

The beautiful, enticing picture painted by the administration forces, who would not listen to the warning voice of economists or the threat of rapidly rising brokers' loans, furnished a rife field for corporate promoters. New corporations were organized for exploiting purposes, old corporations split up their stocks, gave so-called "rights to purchase additional stock", and all the old tricks and many new ones were used. No trouble was encountered in listing these issues on the various old and hastily organized new exchanges. Interest rates increased. Country banks were lured into sending their cash to New York for use as "call loans." Corporations sent to the "call-loan market" not only their huge surpluses, which should have been distributed among stockholders, but also the moneys received by increases in capitalization, which had been obtained for development and expansion.

The people, impressed with the assurances of the administration, were easily taken in, and buying of all kinds of stocks reached new levels daily. Large corporate interests, with their capital stock increased by millions of shares, easily induced even their own employees, by means of alluring reports, to become "partners" in these great industries, and every conceivable scheme was resorted to in order to unload these stocks at artificially created prices on employees, their families, and the public. Then came the pyramid of pyramids—the investment trust—a new medium for obtaining millions upon millions of dollars from a misled and inflamed public.

Nearly everyone was in. Now for the first time the Federal Reserve Board served notice that brokers' loans were excessive and must be decreased. Rediscount rates were increased, interest rates soared, credits were curtailed, and moneys gradually withdrawn.

Conditions were ripe, and the Wall Street "shorts" pirates were ready. They were not going to mold or construct but to hammer and pound to destruction. The first drastic decline was not enough. The conspirators continued unmercifully to throw upon the market thousands upon thousands of shares of stocks which they never owned with the sole purpose of destroying the market value of securities in order that they could repurchase them at their own prices and reap the richest harvest in the history of the Nation.

The press of the country carried in headlines the report of the formation in Morgan's office of the Big Six, with the cheering news that their wealth and power would be used to stop further activities of the "shorts." Encouraged by this, a tremendous number of careful, conservative investors, including insurance companies, trust estates, and widows' funds, purchased stocks at prices proclaimed to be lower than value levels.

What a horrible awakening they had a few days later when the Big Six not only failed to support the market as announced, but some of them, according to common rumor, even unloaded a large portion of their holdings on the temporary bulge which these reports caused. In this way not only the reckless but the most prudent investors were mulcted and fleeced as the "shorts" again started their vicious drive.

Washington did nothing except raise the smoke screen that business was not affected by declines in the stock market. The Federal Reserve Board took no action, although deposits at the banks were being withdrawn in alarming amounts, and collateral loans and the banks holding them jeopardized. And the avalanche continued. Vicious rumors of all kinds became current and the people became panicky. Stocks were forced to be thrown overboard, and billions of dollars and the life's savings of millions of investors were swept away.

I felt strongly that some action was necessary to help restore confidence, and so on November 12 I wired the President as follows:

"Today's press dispatches state that the professionals are still selling short. I am satisfied that 99 percent of the American people feel that this outrageous destruction of the small investors has gone far enough and that immediate steps are needed to save the Nation from disastrous conditions that are bound to follow. It is the consensus of opinion of well-informed men that you, Mr. President, should call upon the financiers of this Nation to stop profiteering and formulate and carry out a plan to save the Nation from dire calamity.

"Congressman A. J. SABATH."

I also wired to Secretary Mellon and the Federal Reserve Board, demanding some statement that would allay the fears of a faltering public. Feeling that the professional "shorts" had precipitated the break, I also wired the various stock exchanges, demanding cessation of short selling, and they responded by asking their members for a report on all loanings and borrowings of stock, which action was helpful, because the most influential of the destructive short sellers did not wish their names to become known and to be held responsible for the ruination of millions of men and women who lost their all because of their manipulations and conspiracy to destroy the market value of stocks.

After the issuance of this questionnaire conditions and confidence were partially restored, but business on the exchanges was reduced. The avaricious appetites that the "shorts" had worked up during the two preceding weeks were not satisfied, as there were still some that had escaped the slaughter, and so on Monday, November 25, the questionnaire was withdrawn, and immediately on Tuesday the attacks were renewed.

I feel satisfied that the country is convinced by this last attack that short selling of commodities or stock which one does not own or possess are responsible for the destruction of actual values and for the crash and the havoc that usually follows such concentrated action. For the sake of argument, I concede that exchanges cannot be abolished as they do serve as a market place for the purchase and sale of securities and commodities and as a means of obtaining new or additional needed capital. But what possible reason there is or can be for permitting formations of pools for the purpose of selling stocks or commodities which they do not own or possess is beyond my comprehension, and I will be pleased to hear anyone give a sound reason why this pernicious and destructive practice should continue. I pause, but I hear no one.

In the interest of our country generally, I feel that short selling should cease immediately, until, at least, confidence is restored. The newspapers are doing splendid work in encouraging our people. The President has called in the leading business men of the Nation. This alone will not do, as Mr. Hoover in his last message to Congress points out the seriousness of existing conditions when he states:

"The long upward trend of fundamental progress, however, gave rise to overoptimism as to profits, which translated itself into a wave of uncontrolled speculation in securities, resulting in the diversion of capital from business to the stock market and the inevitable crash."

In times like these heroic steps must be taken. I realize that all ills cannot be cured by legislation, and we are often scoffed at for proposing legislative remedies. However, I have been urged by many bankers and representative business men to demand cessation of this destructive short-selling practice.

The great majority of those who believe that the short-selling evil should not be tolerated in the future suggest a heavy penalty on all such short sales, contending that a tax on this nonproductive business will deter "shorts" from pursuing their destructive tactics and be a further source of revenue to our Treasury. I have therefore introduced a bill to place a tax of 5 percent on all short sales.

However, if this legislation, for which I will endeavor to secure early consideration, is not stringent enough to cope with this vicious practice, I have also prepared another bill which will make any short selling a crime punishable by a heavy penalty and imprisonment.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the House, I feel it necessary that serious consideration be given to the legislation which I have proposed, because I believe that such legislation will in the future prevent such a panic as we have seen during the past few weeks and which more or less is still with us, and panics that the country has suffered in years gone by.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. KELLY. The gentleman states that he has introduced a bill levying a tax on these short-sale transactions.

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. KELLY. Is it not possible for Congress to act with respect to the transmission of orders by the United States mail, and by telegraph and telephone and in other methods, and prevent the issuance of contracts where such methods are used?

Mr. SABATH. I am satisfied that Congress can, and I have prepared such a bill which I think will make it possible to frame legislation of that kind under the commerce clause of the Constitution and to make it legal.

Mr. KELLY. Congress will have no power to prohibit the contract on the stock exchange.

Mr. SABATH. No; it will not, because Congress has no power to legislate for the State of New York alone or for the State of Illinois, or for the gentleman's State, but under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution Congress has jurisdiction and the power to preclude this gambling through communications between the States over the telephone and the telegraph, the radio, or through the mail. Such communications for all short sales, which are nothing more nor less than destructive gambling, should be denied the stock exchange, and why it has not been done in the past I do not know. We should not permit it in the future in the interest of the legitimate commerce of the Nation and the safety of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. The Senate hearings held last year and those being held at present have borne out my fears and justified my attacks on Wall Street.

I repeat again, I think this legislation will do more than anything else I can think of to restore prosperity, to put the 16,000,000 people who are now out of employment back to work, and to start the wheels of industry turning. I feel we will again have the prosperity that the Nation enjoyed under the last Democratic administration and the splendid leadership of Woodrow Wilson. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY].

MAKING ILLEGAL THE GOLD CONTRACT CLAUSE

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, we are now taking our first real step toward recovery. Two main things have been necessary to recovery. First, abandon gold as a yardstick of value. Second, the Government must place money and currency in the hands of trade and business to replace the bank credit which is frozen because of present conditions of the banking system. Money and bank credits, while they serve as parts of our media of exchange arrangement, are wholly different in their natures. Money is a direct debt and obligation of the Government, while bank credit represents, not money, but the values found in tangible property, farms, houses, stocks, chattels, and so forth, which may be sold by the bank when pledged to restore credit to the bank which has been loaned.

THE FIGHT HAS BEEN A LONG ONE

A very few Members of Congress have given special study to our financial situation during this unequaled of all panics. Some of us were laying the situation before Congress and the country when we had few sympathizers in the House, few in the business world, and none in the administration in power then. At repeated times we came before the Congress with our appeals asking that our responsibility be met and the things we are doing today be done to save the people and restore them to happiness and prosperity.

On December 19, 1931, I spoke in this House as follows:

The currency systems throughout the world are in deplorable confusion because of the methods of credit control exercised by American and international bankers whose only yardstick of value is gold. These international credit venders have arranged loans and placed contractual burdens to pay bonds and bank obligations in gold until a solution of the dilemma is impossible if these bonds and these promises to pay gold are to remain.

At another place in this same speech I said:

The vaunted utility and stability of the gold standard is contradicted by the physical facts. The contracts to pay in gold to the extent of $100,000,000,000 or more are impossible of performance.

And again in describing the gold standard:

The gold standard is the kind of a currency basis that is favored by the banking systems of the world. A close check is kept on the movements of gold. Every day information may be had as to the exact amount of gold held by each country in the world. The movements of gold can be, and is, controlled by the big world bankers. When we consider that 12 banks in the United States 2 years ago had resources of over $20,000,000,000, which is practically twice the amount of the world's supply of monetary gold, it is very apparent that the movements of gold will be directed in accordance with profitable business for the banking systems. Big bankers will always insist that gold is the only proper basis on which to found the currency of any country. They will always insist that a currency based on any other value than that of gold will be a failure.

Mr. Speaker, these same fundamentals have been often repeated on the House floor by myself and a few other Members. The depression has been the convincing proof that has alined the people back of the argument and has brought the result we are about to witness today.

Mr. Speaker, it would be useless for me to tell you that this is the day at which I have long hoped we might arrive. We have had, since the early sixties—in fact, it dates back prior to that, although it came to particular notice at about that time—a statute which has always been impossible of performance, a statutory obligation to bondholders that could not be fulfilled by the Government.

The gold standard simply means that the Government will buy gold at $20.67 an ounce or sell gold at $20.67 an ounce to all comers. The gold standard also requires that all money issued or coined by the Government be redeemable in gold under the parity act.

By contract we have agreed to redeem or pay off more than $20,000,000,000 of bond obligations issued directly by the National Government; that each dollar of that may be demanded in gold. The States and counties have issued gold contracts or bonds, railroads and private corporations have issued contracts or bonds payable in gold. When they advertise an issue of bonds for sale to the public, they advertise them as "gold bonds", to make them more enticing.

I direct your attention to the fact that as closely as I can estimate, from all available sources, $130,000,000,000 of obligations are required to be paid, if the contracts are carried out as written, every dollar of it in gold. The Government has never had more than $5,015,000,000 in gold at one time and this did not all belong to the Treasury. So I call your attention to the fact that the Gold Standard Act is now and always has been a farce, impossible of performance, and would not work when it was called upon to do its legal duty and pay off the currency. Such was the case in March when, after 3 days' run on the Treasury it ceased to pay gold and refused to comply with the "parity" statute.

We have come to this particular time, under the leadership of our President, when he asks us to do away with this travesty which has existed so long on our statute books.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] suggested to you a while ago we ought not to abrogate contracts or that we ought not to abolish contracts to pay in gold. When he was asked the question if he thought these contracts were possible of performance, he did not reply directly to this question; he knew they were not.

I repeat they are impossible of performance, because the amount of gold that might be available to carry out these contracts is so insignificant. Not long ago I pointed out in a speech in this House that any fair-thinking individual would know that it cannot be done—

Theoretically, a country on gold standard must keep on hand a stock of monetary metal sufficient to supply at all times any demands which may appear for the redemption in gold of paper money, silver, bank deposits, foreign exchange, and balances. Every private contract in a gold-standard country is payable in gold. Every bank deposit is repayable in gold. The wide scope of responsibility that the gold standard assumes will be appreciated when we recall that the bank clearances of our State and national banks reached the figure of $702,533,000,000 in 1929. Each dollar of these clearances in theory could have been demanded in gold.

Mr. TERRELL. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. TERRELL. I would like the gentleman to emphasize one point right in this connection. Since we all know that the Government cannot pay its contracts in gold, if the Government pays them in currency, silver, and gold, the only kind of money it has, to the extent of its ability, has it not performed its duty?

Mr. BUSBY. I so regard the Government's obligation as being fully met.

The gold-content element was brought into this matter by the bankers who dominated legislation in the days when it was first enacted following the decisions in the famous Legal Tender cases. Up until 1860 we had no currency at all except coined currency. We had no currency except metal currency. There were no national banks after the United States Bank was abolished to issue paper currency until the National Bank Act of 1862. So all of the money we had was coined silver and coined gold and minor coins of other metals, except State bank notes, which were not in very good repute. So that the money which the Government sponsored until the National Bank Act was gold and silver currency and when that bank act became the law the bankers said, "You have got to agree to pay the currency in gold or in specie." When the Government began to issue new bonds and the bankers were asked to buy them they dictated the provisions that should go into these bonds. They said, "Regardless of the number of bonds you issue, you have got to agree to pay them all in gold." So the gold obligations piled up far beyond any possible power of the Government to get together enough gold to meet the obligations which it had undertaken. A contract to do an impossible thing is held by the courts to be unconscionable and of no effect. Its provisions are not given force. It is void.

Before I leave this subject I direct your attention to a serious thing that confronts us today.

WE FORCED OURSELVES OFF THE GOLD STANDARD

On March 3 last I stated on this floor:

> You cannot remain on the gold standard as much as you have worshiped the golden calf. People are lined up at the Treasury today—and have been for 4 days—taking gold out of the Treasury as fast as they can get to the window to do it, and the newspapers have not said anything about it. It will take you almost an hour, standing in line, to get to the gold window and convert your Federal Reserve notes into gold right now, and the only thing that will save gold is for a proclamation to come from the White House abandoning the gold standard. [Applause.]

Several gentlemen smiled with a sort of derisive smile in response to my statement. It seemed to me very plain that we could not remain on the gold standard because the demand was being made on gold to perform its legal requirement as provided in the law, and when it is called on it cannot meet the call. The people were demanding gold, and therefore we had to go off the gold standard. The gold standard has never been anything more than a theory. It is strange to me that any reasoning man would seriously try to defend our law setting up such an arrangement as we had.

THE TREASURY IS WRONG IN SAYING COLLECTED GOLD FORMS BASE FOR OUR CURRENCY

Now the Treasurer of the United States is saying that we want to get all the gold in the Treasury so we can base our money on it. This is not a fair representation of the situation.

UNLAWFUL FOR AMERICANS TO HAVE GOLD

We are not basing our money on gold, and they will not give you gold for your money; in fact, we passed an act which makes it unlawful for a man to own more than $100 worth of gold.

AMERICAN GOLD IS FOR FOREIGN PEOPLES AND FOREIGN BANKS ONLY

Here is what we are using gold for today, not as a base for United States currency, not to redeem our money, not to pay off obligations, but to collect it all into the Treasury so as to strengthen the foreign exchange issues against this country and owned by foreign bankers, traders, and peoples.

Nobody will deny that. Why do we do this? So the foreigner can see that all the gold in the United States is in the Treasury and there to pay his exchange obligation against this country. For the American people it is unlawful for them to have gold. They cannot use it, they cannot get it, except by license. To put it plainly, the American people are prohibited from owning, possessing or controlling gold, except in very small quantities. The reason for that is that the gold may be gathered together so that it can be used to keep our dollar high in the world money market and pay the foreigners the exchange they may have against this country for payment in gold.

All international exchange is payable in gold. A country may not have any gold in its treasury but exchange against it is payable in gold.

I would propose this: I would repeal the act of March 14, 1900, which provides that the gold dollar, as there set up, shall be the standard of value. The statute is this:

> The standard of value shall be the dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine tenths fine, and all money coined and issued shall be kept at a parity with that standard; and this shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Since that has been abandoned, except for the benefit of the foreigner who comes in to get our gold for their exchange, we ought to repeal it. Why? Because when the foreigner gets a dollar's worth of exchange he does not get just the exchange, he calls on the Treasury to cash that exchange and gets at the rate of 26.8 grains standard gold for each dollar.

GIVE THE AMERICAN AN EVEN BREAK WITH THE FOREIGNERS

We ought to repeal it so as to put the American people and the foreign trader on the same basis, and not discriminate against our people in favor of the foreign banker or trader. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks and incorporate therein excerpts from speeches previously made on the same subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BLANTON). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein 1 or 2 excerpts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, the gold clause providing for the repayment of the debts in gold dollars of 23.22 grains of gold is going to be stricken from contracts, private and public. There is no way to escape this situation. There are now $22,000,000,000 worth of outstanding obligations of the National Government. There will be approximately $27,000,000,000 worth of these outstanding obligations of the National Government by the time this Congress adjourns. It is utterly impossible to pay these obligations in gold with 23.22 grains to the dollar. In addition to these obligations of the National Government carrying this gold clause, there are billions of dollars of private obligations carrying such a clause. Likewise there are billions of dollars of State, municipal, and district public obligations carrying a similar clause. It is probably safe to say that there are at least $50,000,000,000 worth of private and public obligations which require payment in gold dollars of the weight and fineness of the dollar at the time of the execution of the contract. That weight and fineness is 23.22 grains of gold fine. There are only about $4,000,000,000 of gold in the United States.

In the first place this so-called "gold clause" was a Shylock provision in the contract. The creditors did not lend gold in the first instance. They lent currency and bank credits. So in the light of fairness and decency they have no moral right to request a repayment of a dollar different than the dollar which they lent.

Now these contracts are not going to be paid in gold of 23.22 grains per dollar. This provision of the contract is not going to be fulfilled. There is no way to fulfill it. There are two ways in which the gold clause is going to be reached. We must take our choice between those two plans.

First, in the case of private debts, it is through the process of bankruptcy and receivership. In that event, the creditors may get gold dollars of 23.22 grains to the dollar but they will not get as many dollars as they lent. So they must take their loss in the number of dollars received. In the case of Government obligations, the corresponding plan is repudiation or defaulting. Bankruptcy and repudiation is the dishonest plan, dishonest in that it lacks frankness. It is the plan which would bring the greatest chaos to society and the most suffering to the people.

The other plan is for the Government to declare that the creditors must accept as payment for its debt money such as has been declared to be lawful money by the Congress under the constitutional authority of Congress to coin money and to regulate the value thereof.

I choose for Congress to meet the situation honestly, fearlessly, and frankly. In doing so it must recognize that the debts cannot be paid under the provisions of this clause. In doing so it must cheapen the value of the gold dollar by reducing the gold content of the dollar. By this manner, we recognize and pay the debts by not reducing the number of dollars due but by reducing the value of the dollar which pays the debts. This is true whether it be a private or public debt. Under all the circumstances, this is the honest way. This is the frank way to meet the situation. What is more, it is the civilized way. It is the way which will bring the least economic chaos and disorder and the least human suffering. This resolution leads to this plan. I choose to take this plan; therefore I am supporting the resolution.

Those who are opposing this resolution are taking the position wherein they deceive themselves and deceive the country. In their opposition, they are leaving the inference that these debts, private and public, can be paid in gold dollars of 23.22 grains to the dollar. They infer that the Government and the private debtors of the country are taking a dishonest position and are refusing to pay that which they can pay. The truth is that it is their position which is dishonest, because it is a physical and utter impossibility to pay these debts, private and public, in gold dollars of 23.22 grains to the dollar.

Likewise, it is impossible to pay them in currency redeemable in gold of 23.22 grains to the dollar. This Government cannot redeem its outstanding currency with gold at the ratio of 23.22 grains to the dollar. If the Government should today repeal the recent banking act, undertake to go back on the gold standard, and redeem its currency with gold of 23.22 grains to the dollar, there would not be a hatful of gold left in the Public Treasury in a month's time. There are about $45,000,000,000 of bank deposits in the country today. All of these bank deposits are a potential threat against our gold reserve held in the Federal Treasury. It is true that each depositor cannot write a check and demand gold for the check. He can go to his bank, write a check and demand currency and then in turn take the currency and demand gold from the Treasury. If we were to repeal the banking act and offer to redeem the currency in gold of 23.22 grains to the dollar, everyone knows that in a week's time there would be a raid on the banks for something like $45,000,000,000 of deposits. The approximately $7,000,000,000 of outstanding currency would soon be swallowed up through this effort to convert $45,000,000,000 of bank deposits into currency. Such an effort would mean that every bank in the country would instantly be closed. Such was the experience during the first week in March. Then with the holders of six or seven billion dollars of currency demanding gold, the $4,000,000,000 in gold would soon be withdrawn from the Public Treasury and Federal Reserve.

The first right of every government is to preserve itself. No government can be secure with its gold held by hoarders and its banks closed. Yet, those who are opposed to this resolution and crying out to the country that the Government is dishonest in repudiating the gold clause are taking the position wherein, if they could have their way about it, the banks would be closed, the gold would be out of the hands of the Government and the Federal Reserve and in the hands of a few private hoarders of gold. In short, they are taking the position which would mean the overthrow of Government.

If there ever was any chance during the last 3 years for the old order to be retained and obligations redeemed in dollars worth 23.22 grains of gold, that chance was flittered away by the Seventy-second Congress. Two things happened in the Seventy-second Congress which made it utterly impossible for the established order, of paying debts worth 23.22 grains to the dollar, to survive. Those two things were the establishing of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by these sound "conservative and constructive" statesmen. When they established the Reconstruction Finance Corporation they abandoned traditional Americanism and turned to the precepts of Marxism. When they turned to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation they became mere socialists and established a policy of taking money away from one citizen by the power of government or taxation and lending it to another. They were taking money away from the great mass of people and using it for the benefit of their selected few. Of course, they think that it was not socialism because in the beginning it was only the financial institutions which were receiving the contribution of credit from the Government. In taking this plan, they have been responsible for increasing the national debt over 2½ billion dollars to date. The more the national debt is increased, the more impossible it is to meet the debts of the Government with gold dollars worth 23.22 grains of gold to the dollar.

The other thing which happened in the Seventy-second Congress, which meant that it was only a matter of time until the Government could not meet its obligations with dollars worth 23.22 grains of gold was when the "liberals" in Congress turned down the sales tax, thereby refusing to meet their constitutional responsibility of providing sufficient revenue to run this country. Anyone who studied the situation at that time knew full well that there was no way to obtain sufficient revenue to meet the expenses of this Government except through the process of a general sales tax. At any rate, those who turned down the sales tax owed to the Government the responsibility of providing some substitute means of raising sufficient revenue to meet the expenses of the Government. They refused to provide the substitute. They were dishonest in that they claimed that they had a substitute in the form of special sales taxes and an increased income tax, which would provide sufficient revenue to meet the expenses of the Government. I cannot extend to them the charity that they were mistaken. This is because it was so obvious that these special taxes would not furnish sufficient revenue to meet the obligations of the Government.

The defenders of the special sales tax were to a great extent those who were demanding additional expenditures of the Government in various projects of one kind or another. They were primarily insisting upon taking public money and expending it for the special benefit of various large blocs of our citizens. So the "liberals" of the Seventy-second Congress are responsible for denying to the Government sufficient revenue to meet its expenses. The "liberals" and "conservatives" together are responsible for increasing the expenses of the Government. The "conservatives" increased the expenses for the purposes of furnishing public money and public credit to the financial class. The "liberals" were responsible for increasing the expenses of the Government for the purpose of furnishing public money and credit for various groups. In the end, the history of the Seventy-second Congress is that it increased the expenses of the Government by the billions and at the same time refused to provide a sufficient amount of revenue to meet the ordinary current expenses. Consequently the Seventy-second Congress must bear the responsibility for the national debt's having been increased by approximately $5,0000,000,000. With this program, it is utterly impossible for the Government now to meet its obligations with dollars worth 23.22 grains of gold.

Now the time has come and we must either take our choice of the debts either not being paid in the number of dollars due or dollars worth less than 23.22 grains of gold.

Maybe conditions were such that the Seventy-second Congress could not escape doing what it did do. If so, then no one is to blame if conditions are such now that the Government is unable to meet its obligations with dollars worth 23.22 grains of gold. On the other hand, if the Seventy-second Congress was to blame for increasing the national debt, it is a mistake which has been made and cannot now be corrected. In any event, the fact still remains that the Government to date owes a debt which it cannot pay in dollars worth 23.22 grains each. This being true at this late date, it is not fair for these superconservatives to say that the act which this Congress and this administration are about to take is dishonesty on the part of this Congress.

Just how much the value of the dollar is to be decreased in gold value is going to depend very largely upon how soon we provide enough revenue to meet governmental current expenses and how quickly we stop the policy of increasing the public debt in order to obtain funds to finance private business. To date there is little promise of the Congress ceasing to follow these paths of folly. Last week the "liberals" turned down the general manufacturers' sales tax, with drugs, food, and clothing exempt. Last week the "conservatives" enlarged the socialistic Reconstruction Finance Corporation program by authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to engage in buying stock in defunct insurance companies. Hence there seems to be no disposition to provide sufficient revenue for the Government. There seems to be no disposition to check the raid on the Public Treasury through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That means continued increasing of the public debt. That will mean cheaper dollars with which to repay the debt.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, in the 2 months or a little over that President Roosevelt has been Chief Executive of our country, I believe there is one conclusion that all of us have reached, and that is that he is frank, that he is honest, that he is courageous. In his inaugural address he led us to believe that he was going to throw down the gauntlet to the "money changers" of America, and I think he is keeping his word with the American people. He is bringing in the Golden Rule in government and doing away with the rule of gold. The depression has demonstrated one fact, among others, that in time of great emergency, when the stress is put upon our Government, its credit and its financial standing, as in other countries the gold standard has broken down. There is a scientific reason for this. When times are good, any of the money of the country is accepted without question. Gold is not demanded at the hands of the Treasury, but when times of panic and depression come upon us, with a clause written into the bond and many private obligations that they must be paid in gold of a certain standard and fineness, those who may have contributed chiefly to bringing about the money panic or depression want to be in a position of pushing their Government into a corner and saying that they stand upon the promise in the bond. With $100,000,000,000 of debt, public and private, with something like $4,000,000,000 of gold with which to pay it, we know that the basis for our financial system is too narrow and fictitious. We know that if in such extreme emergency a demand be made that all these contracts be kept and paid in full in gold only 1 person out of 25 would be able to receive his money. Our monetary system ought to be so arranged that in time of emergency it would protect the Government and make it thoroughly honest, rather than in time of prosperity. I am glad that the President of the United States has had the courage to stamp this kind of a money system with the hypocrisy that is apparent upon its face. We are going to an honest basis of payment, not repudiation, and will say to every creditor of the United States, "You will be paid every dollar in full and will be paid in lawful money—all creditors will receive equal treatment, and you will be given no right to stand upon a contract that upon its face is written to take advantage of your Government in time of distress."

The chief purpose of law is to protect the weak and restrain the strong. That is what the President of the United States and the Congress, cooperating with the President, propose to do now. In this hour of distress, brought upon us by the manipulation of our big bankers, our Government says to these creditors who claim a priority under a contract they knew could not be kept, if all such contracts were insisted upon, "You will be treated the same as every other creditor. You will be paid your bonds and your interest in lawful money, the same as others who do not enjoy the privilege under the written conditions of an ancient statute; a fossilized tradition that ought never have found itself into our system of government." We know the supply of gold is restricted. We know that in proportion the gold of the world is falling behind in the advancement of the volume of business. Under normal conditions business increases on the average about 3 percent per year, but gold increased but slightly over 2 percent, and during a period of several years gold in volume has been falling behind in proportion to the normal increase in volume of business.

It is perfectly natural to suppose that the amount of blood that would keep a baby alive would not be sufficient for a full-grown adult. By that same comparison, if gold in circulation is one side of every business transaction, is inadequate, then we should find a new basis upon which to build our money system, to keep the volume of it somewhere in proportion to the volume of business. Even now the currency of the United States that is issued with gold reserve is issued on the basis of only 40 percent reserve. Among the countries of Europe much currency is issued with only 10 percent reserve. Under those circumstances 90 percent of that is pure fiat. In the United States 60 percent of our issues are backed only by the credit of the Government with no gold reserve. It never was contemplated there should be full gold reserve, and it is an impossibility. Nations under pressure of the times reduce the necessary reserve, so that a large part of our money has value only as far as the Government's stamp is on that money. Most of our currency is Government fiat. Its chief security lies in economy of expenditure, a balanced Budget, and capacity of our people to pay taxes. The administration is putting our house in order and will meet every obligation.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. May I interrupt the gentleman there?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. That is true of gold the same as any other form of currency, is it not?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The principal value of the gold dollar is the fiat of the Government, and if it were stripped of that fiat and thrown into the market as a commodity, its value would largely disappear, would it not?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes. Its principal value is given because of its monetary value and the authority of the Government that makes gold the basis for our currency, creates its chief value. Therein is where it has its advantage over silver. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to continue the use of gold. I should be glad to use silver as a basis also, for increasing the base for our currency, but there is one thing about this resolution; it is destroying the hypocrisy of the previous system we have had and trying to put our monetary system and currency system upon an honest basis. I am backing the President and the Congress of the United States in getting back to an honest policy of currency.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I only have a few minutes. I would rather not yield at this time.

There is no repudiation about this. Every creditor of the United States will receive 100 cents on the dollar in lawful money. Did any purchaser of bonds pay for them in gold? He may have, but the probabilities are that most of the purchasers who purchased the obligations of the Government, paid for them with lawful money of the United States, and they will be paid with the same kind of money with which they purchased the obligation in the beginning.

My colleague from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] exclaimed: "What has become of the spirit of Grover Cleveland?" I suppose he was speaking of that quality of honesty and of courage that old Grover had. Well, we have just such a man in the White House now. [Applause.] He has got the courage to say to these men who hold this particular type of contract in which they claim a certainty or priority of having gold payments on their contracts, "You knew when you purchased your Government bond that the Congress of the United States had the power under the Constitution of the United States to coin money and regulate the value thereof"; and the Congress of the United States now, under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt, is reaching out to exercise that constitutional power. These creditors will be treated justly but given no strangle hold on Uncle Sam.

I am glad to add my word of praise to the leadership that destroys a gross hypocrisy that has existed for years, claiming there was some sanctity in gold, while the depression, not only in this country but in the world, has shown that only so far as governments get behind the gold has it any sanctity; and only so far as the Governments will make good on their gold has it any advantage over any other character of money. So, for one, I am glad to correct this hypocrisy. I am glad to see that our country is endeavoring to create a volume of money and of credit that will permit the farmers and wage earners, the debtor class of America, to pay their debts in the same character of money, somewhere near the same value that they borrowed, when, 4 or 5 or 10 years ago, they placed mortgages on their homes. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD] has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. AYERS]?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYERS of Montana. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, last week this House and all this Nation listened with eager ears to the astounding developments that were being made over in the other end of the Capitol Building by Ferdinand Pecora, special counsel for the Senate Banking and Currency Committee in its investigation of the house of Morgan.

This great banking and securities company is headed by one of the richest men in all the world, yet according to his own admissions, under oath, he has failed to pay his own Government an income tax for the past 3 years.

The admissions and testimony in that hearing have already shown that during the time Morgan failed to pay this Government an income tax he was loaning to European governments and European financial institutions American dollars by the hundreds of millions. Surely he was not doing this for pastime. He was getting interest on that American money, and although he was escaping an income tax in his own country he was paying an income tax to the government of England.

While failing to help support his own Government with an income tax, he was using various schemes to show no income in this country, one of which was fake and fraudulent stock sales whereby he was favoring American individuals in high place and in high public office with fabulous assignments of valuable stock which instantly, by the simple twist of the wrist, made them 85 percent on their investment.

I do not know what they call that procedure in high places and in financial circles and when high Government officials are the benefactors but out in my State where we do not embellish such acts with elaborate or scientific names, we call it fraud, crookedness, and bribery, and particularly so if it later develops that the donor receives special privileges at the hands of those persons in high places, and in public office, as this hearing has developed that Morgan has received, ah, even to the extent of not being required under such circumstances and under such wealth to pay any tax in support of his government.

To my way of thinking this hearing has thus far developed a direct responsibility upon the house of Morgan and like banking and investment houses for the depression that we are now going through. They have gathered the moneys of this country for the purpose of making these fabulous loans to Europe, and in addition to that they have given the countries of Europe the argument that they must pay the House of Morgan before they pay the debt they owe our Government.

It is the likes of Morgan who have brought about the condition that has forced this Government off the gold standard; it is the likes of him who have caused our bondholders at home and abroad to demand payment in gold instead of American money as usual; it is the likes of him who have brought about the condition that causes every thinking man and woman in this House to vote for the resolution under discussion, to confirm the fact that we are off the gold standard.

Under present conditions which have been brought about in a large degree by the things exposed by the Senate hearing, we have the choice of either cowardly admitting bankruptcy and not paying our obligations or bravely going off the gold standard and paying our obligations with American money according to present values. Our Government obligations are over $20,000,000,000 and our gold supply is less than 4½ billion dollars. That will not pay our obligations in gold. Square plugs will not fit round holes. Square plugs are what we have; our creditors have round holes. Now, in order to plug the hole we must round the plug, our creditors refuse to square the hole, and the only way we can round that plug and maintain our honor in the family of nations is to confirm the fact that we are off the gold standard.

In his inaugural address the President said, "The money changers must be driven from the people." I am sure the President is undertaking to carry out that declaration, and I am likewise sure that this House is willing to help him in that undertaking. Pecora is unearthing the evidence to help our President drive the money changers from the people, and certainly he should not be handicapped by failure of expenses to put his evidence before the committee, to the end that the President and the people of this country may know what is going on.

This investigation is farther-reaching, and the results of its developments will culminate in greater good to the American people than did Senator Walsh's investigation of the Teapot Dome. Mr. Pecora is the present-day Senator Walsh in this investigation, and for his untiring labors and his masterly skill in the unearthing of these frauds he is receiving only $255 per month.

Being a lawyer myself, I know that according to the hours he is devoting to this case he is not receiving the compensation that masons and carpenters are receiving on the public works of this city today. He is earning far more money than he is receiving, he is entitled to more compensation. [Applause.]

The funds that have been allotted for the inquiry and investigation of such matters by the Senate Committee do not warrant any greater salary, and such funds will be exhausted when the investigation of the House of Morgan is completed. Other such houses, for instance, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and Dillon, Read & Co., must be investigated. They are banking and investment houses, half-brother to the House of Morgan, and then the Senate Committee is not through with the New York Stock Exchange.

No one will dispute that Mr. Pecora is entitled to more money than he is receiving. Surely he should receive a salary equal to that of an Assistant Attorney General of the United States, for he is doing equally as much work and fabulously more good than any Assistant Attorney General I have ever heard of.

Senator BYRNES of South Carolina, Chairman of the Contingent Expense Committee of the Senate, Saturday said, "I am in favor of going into the affairs of all these private bankers. Unless we have more money, we would have to stop with Morgan and that would be unfair." Mr. Speaker, certainly it would be unfair, and when I say unfair I mean it would be unfair to the President, it would be unfair to the Senate, and it would be unfair to the people of this country. We must know the whole truth, for it is said "The truth shall make us free." Mr. Pecora's estimate is that it will take $75,000 to bring the evidence which he has lined up, before the Committee. Now let us give him sufficient funds to produce that evidence. It will be the best-spent money this Government ever spent.

In manipulating his income-tax returns so as to show losses instead of profits, it seems that Morgan made material use of the last business day of one year and the first business day of the next, but Pecora insisted on knowing what business took place on the days covered by the 2 days' return which would cause security valuations to depreciate $21,000,000. He finally developed the fact that on 1 of these 2 days, profits and commissions exceeding $2,000,000 were registered in the firm's books. He further showed that the total Morgan assets reached their peak of $703,909,000 on one of these days, and that this was the day which concerned the alleged $21,000,000 loss that exempted Morgan from paying an income tax. This is a case where figures were made to misrepresent facts.

With all these developments one would think the record would show a refusal or a protest on the part of the Internal Revenue Department to accept Mr. Morgan's returns. But not so. The Internal Revenue Bureau never raised objection to the methods employed by Morgan. But why should it when the officers of the companies of the Secretary of the Treasury and also his relatives were recipients of Morgan benefits? Morgan knew what he was doing when he played that 85-percent-benefit game. He reached the leading men of official life, of big business, and of both political parties. Among his scores of benefactors we find R. B. Mellon, brother of Andrew; Charles F. Adams, then Secretary of the Navy; George Allen, director of the Aluminum Co. of America, Mellon's company; Newton D. Baker, ex-Secretary of War; Walter S. Gifford, president American Telephone & Telegraph Co.; Charles A. Mitchell, fellow banker, now under indictment as a tax dodger; John J. Raskob, ex-chairman Democratic National Committee; Charles D. Hilles, New York Republican leader; Owen D. Young, chairman General Electric; William H. Woodin, present Secretary of the Treasury; and Calvin Coolidge, ex-President of the United States.

Mr. Morgan played no favorites in politics or business; he played the field. He wanted to sew up all favors for himself; he wanted a closed sack, and I guess he got it. Does any Member of this House think I have made a bad guess on that subject?

Pecora is on the right trail. Now let us keep it free from snow and ice and rocks, to the end that he, by unearthing these frauds, do a great good to the people of this land. Let us in adopting this resolution to furnish him funds for this investigation never forget that "the truth shall make us free." [Applause.]

The resolution referred to is set forth in full, as follows:

Concurrent resolution

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That—

Whereas an inquiry and investigation is now being carried on by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, pursuant to Senate Resolution 84, agreed to on March 4, 1932, as supplemented by Senate Resolution 70, agreed to May 15, 1933, investigating the business of banking, financing, extending credits, and the actual effect of "short selling" on security values, as in said resolutions mentioned; and

Whereas said Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, under the authority of said resolutions, is now investigating the private banking concern of J. P. Morgan & Co.; and

Whereas such investigation has disclosed that other banking concerns and investment banking houses should likewise be investigated; and

Whereas that part of the contingent fund of the Senate allotted to inquiries and investigations is not sufficient to further carry on such investigations; and

Whereas it is estimated that $75,000 additional is necessary for such committee to complete its investigation into the affairs of other banking and investment houses which the testimony before said committee thus far taken indicates should be investigated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That for the purpose of continuing such investigation by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, pursuant to said resolutions, the said committee is hereby authorized to make such additional expenditures as it deems necessary, not exceeding $75,000.

UNIFORM VALUE OF COINS AND CURRENCIES OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 192, to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 192, to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States, with Mr. RANKIN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the joint resolution was dispensed with.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, this joint resolution recognizes the existing status with respect to gold payments upon obligations that were established under Executive order of the President issued under authority conferred by Congress in the Emergency Act of March 9, 1933.

Under the proclamation of the President the Government has assumed complete control of the Nation's supply of gold. This has been done to prevent hoarding and to prevent the withdrawal of gold by citizens of foreign governments.

This resolution ratifies and reaffirms the former action of Congress and everything that has been done pursuant to the authority conferred upon the President.

This resolution declares that contracts requiring the discharge of obligations solely by payments in gold are contrary to public policy; that hereafter no such contracts may be made and that all such contracts now in existence or that may hereafter exist shall be payable in lawful money of the United States.

The Government has a financing program in contemplation during the coming months reaching an enormous amount. It is necessary in undertaking to finance this program that the Government shall make clear and definite what the future policy is to be with respect to obligations incurred by the Government. In the existing situation it seems to me the Government could not be expected to execute further contracts payable in gold; and surely it is not desirable to have outstanding two classes of obligations incurred by the Government—one to be discharged by the payment of gold and the other by a different kind of money.

The world is in confusion. International trade and commerce are out of joint. International exchanges demand adjustments and stabilization before we may have a return to normal conditions. Pending this, Congress has specifically authorized the President of the United States to take all necessary action that he deems wise to prevent the hoarding of gold or the withdrawal of gold so the action contemplated by this resolution simply supplements the authority already extended to equip the President with power to deal intelligently and constructively with the work of readjustment that awaits the administration in connection with our international economic relationships.

The occasion for the declaration in the resolution that the gold clauses are contrary to public policy arises out of the experiences of the present emergency. These gold clauses render ineffective the power of the Government to create a currency and determine the value thereof. If the gold clause applied to a very limited number of contracts and security issues, it would be a matter of no particular consequence; but in this country virtually all obligations, almost as a matter of routine, contain the gold clause. In the light of this situation two phenomena which have developed during the present emergency make the enforcement of the gold clauses incompatible with the public interest. The first is the tendency which has developed internally to hoard gold; the second is the tendency for capital to leave the country. Under these circumstances no currency system, whether based upon gold or upon any other foundation, can meet the requirements of a situation in which many billions of dollars of securities are expressed in a particular form of the circulating medium, particularly when it is the medium upon which the entire credit and currency structure rests.

There can be no substantial question as to the constitutional power of the Congress to make this legislation applicable to all obligations, public and private, both past and future. The power of Congress to issue a currency and determine the value thereof and to provide for the borrowing of funds by the Government is express and undoubted. It is also undoubted that Congress has all powers necessary to make the exercise of these two express powers effective. Contracts of private individuals, past or future, are valid and enforceable only insofar as they do not conflict with public policy as enunciated by Congress in the exercise of its constitutional powers. When, therefore, as is declared in this resolution, the enforcement or making of gold-clause provisions obstructs the proper exercise of the congressional powers, such provisions must yield. Nor does the fact that outstanding obligations of the Government are expressed as payable in gold coin impose a limitation, under the circumstances obtaining, upon the exercise of the powers conferred by the Constitution. The Government cannot by contract or otherwise divest itself of its sovereign power. All contracts of the Government are made in the light of this inalienable power to legislate as the public interest may demand. It is too well settled to admit of controversy that contracts or provisions of contracts, even though not inconsistent with public policy when made, may subsequently become contrary to public policy, as authoritatively announced by the legislative branch of the Government, and that, in such event, they become invalid and unenforceable.

So far as the future is concerned, the power to borrow, both of the Government and of private interests, will be seriously impaired unless outstanding obligations and future obligations are placed upon the same footing in respect of the medium of payment. Considerations of both equity and practical necessity demand that this be done, and it is the purpose of the resolution to accomplish this end.

The second section of the resolution is a clarification of a clause in the act approved May 12, 1933. Under that act, as passed, coins of the Philippines would be legal tender in the United States, and abrased gold coins would be legal tender at their face value. This situation, which occurred through inadvertence, should be corrected as is done by the resolution.

The Court has often sustained the authority of the Congress to do the things undertaken by the passage of this measure.

Section 8 of article I of the Constitution provides:

> The Congress shall have power * * * > to borrow money on the credit of the United States; * * * > to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin * * * and > to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers * * *.

The weight of the gold dollar was reduced by the act of June 28, 1834, and the standard of fineness was changed by act of January 18, 1837. The Supreme Court has stated, "No one ever doubted that a debt of $1,000, contracted before 1834, could be paid by 100 eagles coined after that year, though they contained no more gold than 94 eagles such as were coined when the contract was made." (Legal Tender cases (12 Wall. 457, 548).) The Thomas amendment authorizes further reduction of the gold content of the dollar.

The Supreme Court has held that the Congress has power to provide for the issuance of currency and make such currency legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except interest on the public debt and import duties which remained by express statute payable in coin.

The currency to which the Legal Tender cases refer was authorized as a war-time measure. In Juilliard v. Greenman (110 U.S. 421), the Court upheld the exercise of the same power in peace time. The Court said:

> The power of making the notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of private debts, being included in the power to borrow money and to provide a national currency, is not defeated or restricted by the fact that its exercise may affect the value of private contracts. * * * the question whether at any particular time, in war or in peace, the exigency is such, by reason of unusual and pressing demands on the resources of the Government, * * * that it is, as matter of fact, wise and expedient to resort to this means, is a political question, to be determined by Congress when the question of exigency arises, and not a judicial question, to be afterward passed upon by the courts. * * * (P. 448, ff.)

Nor is it necessary that the effect of the legislation enacted during an emergency be confined to the period of the emergency. The notes made legal tender by the statutes of 1862 and 1878 and upheld by the Legal Tender cases and Juilliard against Greenman have remained legal tender to this day.

The power of Congress to issue currency includes the power to secure "a uniform currency" for the whole country. (Veazie Bank v. Fenno (8 Wall. 533, 549).) In the exercise of this power the Congress has declared its policy with respect to the uniform coinage and currency system of the United States. In the act of March 14, 1900, defining the present standard unit of value of the money of the United States, the Congress provided "all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity. (Act of Mar. 14, 1900, c. 41, sec. 1, 31 Stat. 45, title 31, sec. 314, U.S.C.)

In the act of November 1, 1893, the Congress adopted a policy to "maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts." (Act of Nov. 1, 1893, c. 8, 28 Stat. 4; title 31, sec. 311, U.S.C.)

Provisions of obligations which obstruct the power of Congress to regulate the value of money and to maintain coins and currencies at a parity may be forbidden and rendered unenforceable by appropriate legislation enacted in the exercise of the implied powers of the Congress.

While it is true that the Federal Government may exercise such powers as are expressly conferred upon it by the Constitution or may be reasonably implied thereupon, nevertheless "it is not indispensable to the existence of any power claimed for the Federal Government that it can be found specified in the words of the Constitution or clearly and directly traceable to some one of the specified powers. Its existence may be deduced fairly from more than one of the substantive powers expressly defined, or from them all combined. It is allowable to group together any number of them and infer from them all that the power claimed has been conferred." Legal Tender cases, supra.

The classic statement of the proper construction of congressional powers is that of Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316):

Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited but consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional * * *. Where the law is not prohibited and is really calculated to effect any of the objects entrusted to the Government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial department and to tread on legislative ground. This court disclaims all pretentions to such a power (pp. 421 and 423).

If in the exercise of its expressed powers to borrow money and to coin money and regulate its value, the Congress finds that provisions which purport to give to the obligee a right to require payment in gold—the basis of the Nation's currency—or in any particular kind of money or in an amount in money measured thereby, obstruct the power of Congress to regulate the value of money and are inconsistent with the declared policy of Congress to maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts, the Supreme Court will accept such findings. If the Congress adopts appropriate and reasonable means to prevent the interference of such provisions with the exercise of its power to regulate the value of the money of the United States, the Supreme Court will uphold such action as a valid exercise of the implied powers of the Congress.

In Veazie Bank v. Fenno (8 Wall. 533) the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of a tax on State-bank notes used for circulation, the avowed purpose of the tax being to drive the circulating notes out of existence in order to create a uniform currency. The Court held that such action by Congress in pursuance of its powers to coin money and to regulate the value thereof included the power to take appropriate steps to assure "a currency, uniform in value and description, and convenient and useful for circulation." The Court said:

Having thus, in the exercise of undisputed constitutional powers, undertaken to provide a currency for the whole country, it cannot be questioned that Congress may constitutionally secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation. To this end Congress has denied the quality of legal tender to foreign coins and has provided by law against the imposition of counterfeit and base coin on the community. To the same end Congress may restrain by suitable enactments the circulation as money of any notes not issued under its own authority. Without this power, indeed, its attempts to secure a sound and uniform currency for the country must be futile (p. 549). (Italics supplied.)

In Juilliard v. Greenman, cited above, the court stated:

Under the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States and to issue circulating notes for the money borrowed its power to define the quality and force of those notes as currency is as broad as the like power over a metallic currency under the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. Under the two powers, taken together, Congress is authorized to establish a national currency, either in coin or in paper, and to make that currency lawful money for all purposes, as regards the National Government or private individuals (p. 448).

In the Legal Tender cases, cited above, Mr. Justice Strong said:

Every contract for the payment of money, simply, is necessarily subject to the constitutional power of the Government over the currency, whatever that power may be, and the obligation of the parties is, therefore, assumed with reference to that power (p. 549).

And Mr. Justice Bradley stated in his concurring opinion:

I do not understand the majority of the court to decide that an act so drawn as to embrace, in terms, contracts payable in specie, would not be constitutional. Such a decision would completely nullify the power claimed for the Government. For it would be very easy, by the use of one or two additional words, to make all contracts payable in specie (p. 567).

Not a taking of property without due process of law.

The joint resolution provides that obligees shall receive the amount of the obligation dollar for dollar. It is the declared policy of the Congress to maintain all coins and currency of the United States at a parity with one another and to maintain the equal purchasing power of every dollar, in the markets and in the payment of debts. So long as this parity and equal purchasing power can be maintained, there is no taking of property. The purpose of the resolution is to protect the parity, not to destroy it.

In this connection mention should be made of the decision of the Supreme Court, New York County, N.Y., reached May 24, 1933, in the case of Irving Trust Co., etc., v. Hazlewood, etc. (New York Law Journal of May 26, 1933, p. 3160.) In his opinion Mr. Justice Ingraham stated:

By Presidential proclamation all gold coin and gold certificates have been withdrawn from circulation. Upon surrender of gold coin or certificates the holder has received other currency of equal coin value. The case of Bronson v. Rodes (74 U.S., 229) is not in point. Different circumstances there prevailed. Two varieties of money were in general circulation: the gold dollar and the paper dollar. The latter had a much-depreciated value. At the present time there is but one lawful medium of exchange, and this has the same coin value as gold of equal amount. The case of In re Societe Intercommunale Belge d'Electricite-Feist v. The Company, decided by the Court of Appeals of England in March of this year and reported in the Times Law Reports (p. 344), decides the question involved here. I accordingly instruct the trustees to accept current funds and upon payment of the amount due to satisfy the mortgage.

Even should the Congress fail to maintain the parity of all coins and currencies and their equal power in the markets and payment of debts so as to give rise to the contention that the effect of such failure combined with the effect of the resolution would amount to a taking of property, this would not be without due process of law. Bronson against Rodes did not decide that Congress could not have made notes legal tender for obligations payable in a particular kind of money. Its actual holding was a construction of the Legal Tender Act of 1862 to the effect that it was not intended by Congress to apply to obligations expressed as payable in gold and silver coin, lawful money of the United States.

In the Legal Tender cases the Court said:

Nor can it be truly asserted that Congress may not, by its action, indirectly impair the obligation of contracts, if by the expression be meant rendering contracts fruitless, or partially fruitless. Directly it may, confessedly, by passing a bankrupt act, embracing past as well as future transactions. This is obliterating contracts entirely. So it may relieve parties from their apparent obligations indirectly in a multitude of ways. It may declare war, or even in peace pass nonintercourse acts, or direct an embargo. All such measures may, and must, operate seriously upon existing contracts, and may not merely hinder, but relieve the parties to such contracts entirely from performance. It is, then, clear that the powers of Congress may be exerted, though the effect of such exertion may be in one case to annul, and in other cases to impair the obligation of contracts. * * * (Pp. 549 and 550.)

In the same decision the court deals in like manner with the "closely allied" objection that the Legal Tender Acts "were prohibited by the spirit of the fifth amendment, which forbids taking private property for public use without just compensation or due process of law." It states:

* * * That provision has always been understood as referring only to a direct appropriation and not the consequential injuries resulting from the exercise of lawful power. It has never been supposed to have any bearing upon or to inhibit laws that indirectly work harm and loss to individuals. A new tariff, an embargo, a draft, or a war may inevitably bring upon individuals great losses; may, indeed, render valuable property almost valueless. They may destroy the worth of contracts. But whoever supposed that, because of this, a tariff could not be changed, or a nonintercourse act, or an embargo be enacted, or a war be declared? By the act of June 28, 1834, a new regulation of the weight and value of gold coin was adopted, and about 6 percent was taken from the weight of each dollar. The effect of this was that all creditors were subjected to a corresponding loss. The debts then due became solvable with 6 percent less gold than was required to pay them before. The result was thus precisely what it is contended the Legal Tender Acts worked. But was it ever imagined this was taking private property without compensation or without due process of law? * * * (P. 551).

The Supreme Court upheld the Philippine law prohibiting the exportation of silver coin from the Philippine Islands upon similar reasoning. (Ling Su Fan v. United States (218 U.S. 302).) It was contended that the statute was a taking of property without due process of law. The Supreme Court stated:

To justify the exercise of such a power it is only necessary that it shall appear that the means are reasonably adapted to conserve the general public interest and are not an arbitrary interference with private rights of contract or property. The law here in question is plainly within the limits of the police power, and not an arbitrary or unreasonable interference with private rights. If a local coinage was demanded by the general interest of the Philippine Islands, legislation reasonably adequate to maintain such coinage at home as a medium of exchange is not a violation of private right forbidden by the organic law (p. 311).

The case of Louisville & Nashville R.R. v. Mottley (219 U.S. 467) is directly in point although the statute which operated as an impairment of the obligation of contract was passed in pursuance of the commerce power of Congress. The defendant railroad agreed in settlement of a claim for personal injury to issue to the plaintiff annual passes upon its lines for the remainder of their lives. Thereafter an act of Congress prohibited carriers from receiving a different compensation than that specified in their published tariffs. This was construed to prohibit the issuance of the passes in question. The Supreme Court denied the right of the plaintiffs to specific performance of their contracts with the railroad. The court said:

The agreement between the railroad company and the Mottleys must necessarily be regarded as having been made subject to the possibility that at some future time Congress might so exert its whole constitutional power in regulating interstate commerce as to render that agreement unenforceable or to impair its value. That the exercise of such power may be hampered or restricted to any extent by contracts previously made between individuals or corporations is inconceivable. The framers of the Constitution never intended any such state of things to exist (p. 482).

Also of importance at this point are the broad statements of the Supreme Court in Juilliard against Greenman and Veazie Bank against Fenno, quoted above in this memorandum. Furthermore, while it is not contended that the operation of constitutional guaranties may be suspended by an emergency, the Supreme Court has in actual practice—as, for example, in dealing with the emergency rent legislation made necessary by the World War, as well as in other cases—taken into consideration, both in the general construction of the powers of Congress and in the application of the due-process clause, the existing practical emergency which the congressional enactment was designed to meet. Obviously such an approach would be peculiarly justified by the exigencies of the present economic emergency.

The foregoing discussion applies to provisions contained in obligations of the Government as well as obligations of private persons. It is fundamental that "governmental powers cannot be contracted away" (North American Com. Co. v. United States) (171 U.S. 110, 137); Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park) (97 U.S. 659)) and rights conferred by the Government remain subject to the power of Congress "to make regulations in the exertion of the authority of Congress over matters within its constitutional powers." (United States v. United Shoe Machinery Co. (258 U.S. 451, 463, and 464); Shaus v. American Publishers' Association (231 U.S. 222, 234).)

That a statute valid when enacted may cease to have validity owing to a change of circumstances has been recognized with respect to State laws in several rate cases. That the doctrine is applicable to acts of Congress was conceded arguendo in Perrin v. United States, 232 U.S. 478, 486. (Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries Co., 251 U.S. 146, 162.)

It is not contended that Congress has the power to render unenforceable a contract with the Government where such action is not the incidental result of the necessary exercise of power in the interests of the general welfare. (Cf. Choate v. Trapp (224 U. S. 665).) But where the acts of the Government are of a public nature and general in their application, the validity of the general action is not impaired by the fact that contractors with the Government are incidentally affected. (Horowitz v. United States (267 U.S. 458); United States v. Warren Transportation Co. (7 Fed. (2d) 161).)

When Congress finds certain provisions of obligations, including obligations to which the Government is a party, obstruct the powers of the Congress and are inconsistent with its policy to maintain all coins and currencies at a parity, appropriate action to protect the monetary system of the United States is constitutional even though persons holding obligations of the United States are affected equally with all other obligees. In its capacity as a creditor the Government is equally affected.

Furthermore, when, as is now the case, a limitation of the effect of such action to contracts between private persons and future contracts of the Government, would seriously impair the power of the Government to borrow money to meet its general needs and to cope with the necessities of the emergency, the constitutional power to take such action cannot be doubted.

The right of this Federal Government to coin money and regulate its value is one of the supreme purposes for which the Union was established. This power carries with it all incidental powers necessary to carry out the purposes contemplated by that provision of the Constitution.

No citizen may contract to destroy or to limit this right of the sovereign people as expressed and embedded in their Constitution.

It is said that it is immoral to take this action—that it involves repudiation of a moral obligation. I assert that there can be no moral obligation that can bind a citizen to do a thing in contravention of the fundamental purposes of the Constitution that is inimicable to the public welfare or to the perpetuity of the Government itself. There can be no duty imposed upon a Representative in Congress that can supplant or be substituted for his obligation to support the Constitution of the country.

No man need go beyond the Constitution to find the end of the inquiry as to his duty both from a legal and from a moral standpoint. These contracts that have been made payable in gold are impossible of fulfillment. I was taught in my limited study of law that any contract against good morals or against public policy or that in its nature is impossible of fulfillment could not be enforced, either at the bar of public conscience or in a court of law. We have more than $100,000,000,000 of such obligations in this country, some owing by the Government, but the greater portion by corporations and individuals. According to the terms of the obligations they may only be discharged in gold, yet we have less than $4,000,000,000 in actual gold with which to discharge these debts. If a citizen or a corporation owed debts of $100,000,000,000 and had only $4,000,000,000 of assets with which to discharge them, a court would intervene for the purpose of securing an equitable distribution of those assets, and any effort to apply the assets of such a corporation or of such an individual to the discharge of a portion of its obligations would be set aside by any court of equity in the world, because it would be inequitable and immoral.

There are other debts amounting to fully $100,000,000,000.

We cannot pay either class of these debts in gold and it is against public policy, it is contrary to every dictate of common sense and justice to undertake to differentiate between creditors whether of the Government or of individuals. Common sense and common honesty suggest that there should be one standard of value in this country and one kind of requirement to discharge an indebtedness on the part of a citizen or on the part of the Government.

I want to ask who in this country paid in gold when they contracted with the Government or with individuals for the obligations that are made dischargeable in gold? People who bought our bonds during the war paid for them with bank credits. They paid with bank checks. People who bought our bonds and who have purchased this stupendous amount of obligations in this country did not pay for them in gold. They did not even pay for them in currency of any kind. They paid for them in bank checks. [Applause.]

After all, fairly and equitably construed, the meaning of these contracts that we made payable in gold was that they would not be discharged in any kind of depreciated money, and this resolution provides a yardstick applicable to every obligation of any citizen or any institution. So there is no discrimination between citizens as to the manner in which debts may be discharged. It is applicable to all alike.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. In just a moment.

Let me say further that the time has come when we must recognize that the public welfare and the future perpetuity of this Government are the things that should command first consideration at the hands of those in positions of official responsibility in the United States. [Applause.] We have been worrying over the integrity of the dollar and its standing at home and abroad. We have been losing sleep over the maintenance of the gold standard. In the meantime, commerce and trade were dying, agriculture perishing, and citizens of this country losing their homes, with their families being turned into the streets and 15,000,000 working people unable to find an opportunity to labor and support their families. The talk about the immoralities of this resolution carries no weight with me. Who can defend the moralities of a transaction in which a citizen incurs an obligation that may be discharged by 1 day of labor and through manipulation or other causes beyond his control this citizen finds it takes 2 days of labor to discharge this same debt?

I repudiate as dishonest a dollar that presses down upon the struggling people of this country in such fashion. We cannot work out of this depression so long as we devote our chief efforts to maintaining the integrity of the dollar. We must dignify humanity and the rights of mankind if we are to solve the problems that confront us. This is what we are undertaking to do. We want a dollar that serves mankind—not one that enslaves! We want an honest medium of exchange that will afford equal opportunity to all to be a reasonable reward for honest toil.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman. Then I must desist, in order to save time for others.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My attention was attracted by the use of the word "yardstick" in the address of the gentleman from Alabama a moment ago, and I think he stated, in effect at least, that all citizens would be treated or measured by the same yardstick with respect to their rights under contracts entered into after this measure shall have passed. I hope I am not misquoting or misunderstanding the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. STEAGALL. Not only hereafter but as to contracts now existing; all are to be on an equal footing and all debts may be discharged in the same kind of money——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now, I should like to ask my question. Is it not true, however, that the Congress has already authorized the President in another act to change the length of the yardstick from time to time?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then citizens cannot be treated all alike, if I am treated with one yardstick tomorrow and another gentleman with a different yardstick the next time.

Mr. STEAGALL. But whenever the yardstick is changed again, it will be the measure of every citizen's rights, and it will not apply one method to one citizen and one institution and another method to another citizen or another institution. When we have done this we have done all that is demanded morally or legally; and when we do less than this we set up a discrimination between citizens or a discrimination between classes of citizens in this country. There has never been a contract to pay a laboring man in gold. Gold payments are only required by the creditor class. The masses of people who labor in fields or forests or shops or mines accept gladly any currency tendered, so long as it represents the wealth and good faith of the Government.

It is not only faulty, but it operates as a class discrimination.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. STEAGALL. I will.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Cannot the gentleman see that changing the length of the yardstick brings about a discrimination between citizens?

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not so construe it. As for the devaluation of the gold dollar, I do not know what is going to be done in that connection. I do not know what action is going to follow the passage of the resolution. I hope it will be followed by further steps that will free us from the existing order which has brought so much of suffering and distress.

So far as the resolution itself goes it simply reaffirms the existing status. I do not see how this action alone could bring about the cheapening of money which is so much deplored by those who oppose the resolution. If I had my way I would not under any conditions permit one citizen to contract for the discharge of a debt in one kind of currency and another citizen to contract for the discharge of a debt in another kind of currency. It seems to me sound public policy demands that there be no discrimination.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I want to ask the gentleman, suppose Congress should demonetize gold. Does the gentleman think the holder of the gold bonds would be satisfied to be paid in gold?

Mr. STEAGALL. Certainly they would not. They would demand payment in dollars backed by the Government. We are within constitutional limits; we are fulfilling the highest duty to the Nation and to the world when we take this step to establish an honest currency suited to a great productive citizenship and to free our people from the fetters which through the years have deprived them of the measure of prosperity and happiness which God in His goodness intended for all the people of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. HESS. Mr. Chairman, this is a very important question, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifteen Members present—a quorum.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, with much that the chairman of our committee has said I am in accord; with some of it I will take no issue; but he misses the vital point; he has glossed over the real question before the committee.

This proposal has nothing directly to do with inflation. It has nothing directly to do with the money question as such. All the time that has been so far devoted to the praise of inflation has only taxed, and that which may hereafter be devoted to the praise of inflation will only tax, the patience of the committee.

There is but one question here. I have set it forth briefly and somewhat sketchily in the minority views that accompany the report of the committee.

Unfortunately, this matter came before your Committee on Banking and Currency without warning. Saturday a large number of the Members of the House assumed that there would be nothing done and had absented themselves for the week-end. There were but two of the minority members of that committee informed of the meeting with sufficient time for their attendance.

We had no witnesses before the committee. We had no explanation of the bill at first hand. We were not given, by those who framed it, the reasons why the bill was requested. We were working in the dark.

The request to file a report before midnight was made at noon in a small House, which was quickly adjourned, the Members scattering. There was no opportunity to present a draft of minority views to other members of the committee, so they bear only my own signature. But I am certain that others of the committee would have signed the minority views had it been physically possible.

Mr. BEEDY. If the gentleman will yield, permit me to say that I should have welcomed an opportunity to sign the minority views.

Mr. LUCE. I have no doubt that my friend from Maine would have signed, and I am sure others would have signed also.

Mr. WADSWORTH. You would have had my signature, too.

Mr. LUCE. I wish it were possible, although I realize it is not, to acquaint the 300 and more Members of the House absent at this moment, with the nature of this proposal. I shall, perforce, be obliged to confine my hope to acquainting one quarter of the Membership. I trust, however, that other speakers will have a better audience later in the afternoon. Perhaps there are some of the hundred Members or so of those present who may think it worth while to ask absent Members to read the minority views, and so acquaint themselves with the argument.

The present occupant of the Chair, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], spoke with some emphasis of the importance of this question, and I suspect there were those here who thought he was extravagant in the statement, but if he had thought it wise to tell the House that now, for the first time in the history of this country, we are being asked to repudiate "a solemn pledge", then perhaps it would have been thought his words were not too strong. For the first time in the history of the United States we are asked to go on record as renouncing a "solemn pledge." That language is not mine. It is the language of the statute, a law enacted 64 years ago. From that day to this no man has stood on this floor and asked that language to be changed. For 64 years we have lived and transacted our affairs and made our contracts and conducted the business life of the country on the basis of this "solemn pledge" of the Congress to the people.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Oh, please allow me to finish. I dislike very much to decline to yield, but gentlemen who rise with questions often break the thread of thought and lessen the speaker's opportunity to persuade and convince, if he can. So, in all courtesy, I ask the gentleman not to ask me to get off the track. With his permission I will get back on the track now, with the words of the law.

Unfortunately there is a misprint in the minority views. I said therein that "equivalent" meant "equal worth", but it has been printed "equal work." Bearing in mind that "equal worth" is the meaning of the word "equivalent", observe what was said in that law of 64 years ago:

> The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligations has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold or silver.

Let us take away the explanatory words and return to the heart of the matter:

> The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged.

I repeat, the faith of the United States is "solemnly pledged", and now, with hardly 48 hours' notice, without explanation of the cause, without adequate disclosure of what is in mind we are asked to repudiate the solemn pledge of the United States to millions of its citizens.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Again I beg of the gentleman not to break the thread of my thought.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. No.

I am going to reiterate, because the interruption of the gentleman may have disturbed the solemn thought that I tried to arouse in the minds of the Members of this body as I read the language of the law. So I shall read it again:

> The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged.

Sir, there are situations under which temporarily it becomes necessary to waive the law. Those situations exist in time of war, and by reason of the belief of the administration in which we share, they today exist likewise in time of peace. We have passed much legislation suspending temporarily the laws of the United States, suspending temporarily the Constitution of the United States—all in the belief that we shall be sustained upon the ground that this is a time of great emergency. In the first place, observe, you are not asked for a temporary suspension of law in this case. You are asked for a permanent, constant, and complete abrogation of a solemn pledge. You are asked to enact new law that for all we know may be the same tomorrow, a week after, a month after, a year after, forever. You are asked to enact permanent law, while in previous exigent enactments of this session, we have said that the provisions should be enforced only for 2 years or until the proclamation of the President declaring the emergency ended.

So there is no excuse to be found in that direction, unless we should see fit to change the terms of the resolution and make its life temporary.

Let me conclude with the second element contained in the proposal, to which I raise no objection. If it is thought by the Treasury that future emissions of currency or of obligations ought not to contain the gold clause, at the moment I am ready to say well and good. As they come along they may be subject to criticisms, but on the whole I am willing to leave to the judgment of the Treasury what ought to be done in the issue of bonds, in refinancing next month, or in any other of the things touched by this resolution. I am curious indeed to know what is thought will be accomplished, for apparently we find $3,000,000,000 worth and more of gold to be retained in the Public Treasury with a wall around it, a wall so high and a wall so solid that not an ounce of gold is to come out. Every ounce of gold that gets in is to be kept, but none of it is to go out. None of it is to be used as a basis for the fiscal operations of the Government. It is to be buried there; and why it should be desired to kill and bury $3,000,000,000 worth and more of gold I cannot see. The wise men at the other end of the Avenue who are advising the administration no doubt have some plan in mind that the ordinary mortal cannot comprehend or envision. We will let that go. If they want to bury $3,000,000,000 and more of gold and make it perfectly useless, no longer a support for any kind of obligation, no longer functioning as money, no longer serving any advantage whatever—if that is their intent—the responsibility is theirs, and I am not here now to criticize. So we may dismiss that element in this bill.

Empower the Government, if you want, to bury the gold and erect a tombstone over it and carve thereon "Hic jacet $3,000,000,000 worth and more of yellow metal." All right. We will leave it buried there and come back to the instant proposition.

The important thing and the only thing in this resolution I care to debate is found in the repudiation of the public promise, and I hope this bill may be known from now through all history to its eternal infamy as "the repudiation bill, passed by the repudiation Congress of 1933."

The first time since 1789 that this Congress has pledged itself to destroy a pledge, the first time that the Congress has denied its plighted word!

First let me ask what may be the effect of this thing? There are gentlemen here, judging from the speeches we have heard in the last few weeks, who never think of money without conjuring up some diabolical image of a man of huge wealth somewhere who, with other men of huge wealth, is conspiring to do public injury. Every time there is any money bill brought forward you are told that you must help the weak and helpless, the poor and distressed, by taking money away from other people. Let us not argue that, but let us see who will lose in this instance. Who bought the Liberty bonds at the time of the war? Is there a man within my hearing who bought no Liberty bonds if he were of age at that time? Is there a man here who still has none of those bonds? Ah, but you may say you are of the prosperous class and, therefore, are not of the class for which we are met here; that we have not come here to legislate for the patriotic millions who bought and who still hold Liberty bonds; not come here to legislate for the thrifty; not come here to legislate for those who are willing to work; but that we have come here to legislate for the morons of society; to legislate for the thriftless of society; legislate for those who never laid aside a penny for a rainy day; legislate for the infirm of mind.

Well, I think once in a while it is fair to remember that the great mass of the people of the United States are not of that class; that the great mass of the people of the United States are hard-working people and are grieving today that they do not have a chance to work; that the great mass of the people lay aside something against the needs of sickness and of old age; and that the great mass of our people are prudent, are out of debt, are self-reliant, and that once in a while, Mr. Chairman, occasionally, say in 1 hour out of every month, we have the right to pay some attention to the middle classes of this country, many millions in their number, men who have made this country, men who support this country, men who deserve at least an atom or two of our thought. So I want to ask you, Who holds these bonds, these securities?

I would call attention, in the first place, to the fact that more than a billion dollars of them are held by trustees of colleges, universities, and professional schools, and that the first duty of the treasurer of every such institution is to invest its money with safety. Yes! "Safety first" is the motto of every trustee, whether he be with some public enterprise or treasurer of a private enterprise, or whether he be trustee for estates where the funds go to the widows and orphans. The first duty of the trustee is and always has been to protect the money in his charge and to secure the safest investment. So through all these years the trustees of the land, those who conduct the money affairs of our colleges, law schools, medical schools, other professional schools, a thousand private hospitals and more, and all the various instruments of philanthropy, have had as their first duty the investment of the funds in their trust where they could be most safely invested; and relying upon the "solemn pledge" of the United States, they have in large part invested those funds in obligations bearing the promise that the principal and interest shall be paid in gold.

Who other are interested in this matter? There are outstanding in the United States, according to the World Almanac, more than 120,000,000 life-insurance policies. All the reserves backing up those policies must be invested, and the greater part of them is invested in securities, and so, too, for the sake of the holders of the 120,000,000 life-insurance policies, "safety first" has been the duty of the directors of the life-insurance companies, most of them mutual companies, not profit-making companies.

Then there are deposits in our savings banks amounting to more than $9,000,000,000, with securities the chief line of investment. As I have repeatedly pointed out on this floor, the depositors in the savings banks are not millionaires, are not men of large means, but for the most part men of moderate means, or the simple, humble folk who have laid aside in the savings banks, funds that shall protect them and their families in the years to come.

If time permitted, I could go on enumerating scores of directions in which the pledge by Government or corporation has been an important element in the buying of the securities in question.

Gentlemen are likely to try to sweep this aside on the ground that nobody has paid much attention to those promises. I would recall to you that in the panic of 1893, when the railroads were in as sore stress as they are in today, many found it necessary to reorganize, and then it was that the gold clause in corporate bonds first became of material importance. There were some of those roads that could not have reorganized at all were it not for the gold clause in their bonds. Many others were helped materially by that clause. All were able to issue their securities at a lower rate of interest than otherwise would have been the case.

It is estimated that there are now outstanding securities, other than Government securities, to the extent of $100,000,000,000 which have, in large part, been issued at lower rates of interest on account of this gold clause. Through these years you have allowed owners of these securities to accept a lower rate of interest in the confident belief that the "solemn pledge" of the Government would be kept. If the sacrifices thus made through the years could be calculated, the total would be of astonishing amount.

You now are asked to say that from some unexplained motive of temporary expediency you will permanently deprive one party to these contracts of all their benefits.

These contracts fulfilled every requirement of a contract. My good friend, the chairman of the committee, has ventured into the field of literature relating to the legal tender act and other matters distracting attention from the fundamental fact. Perhaps most of you are lawyers. Perhaps I shall not be able to turn such of you aside from legalistic attitudes to the common-sense view of things taken by others who are here. Yet that view is not to be ignored.

To the everyday man language means what its says. When these contracts were made both parties understood the language to have the common, everyday meaning. The minds met. Complete understanding was had by both parties.

A few weeks ago in the British courts of chancery a judge was able, by Jesuitical interpretation, to read into the law something that not a man here would have seen there 2 months ago. I have read that English decision, and for the life of me I cannot understand how any man who thinks straight, who has a reasonable degree of intelligence, could have reached that interpretation, but the English court did. Last Wednesday a district judge in New York, one of the United States district court judges, relying in large part apparently upon the English reasoning, came to the same preposterous conclusion.

I have been told that the English case will go to the British House of Lords. Of course, we know this case here will go to the American Supreme Court, and when the final word is said then perhaps somebody will have to retract his words, possibly myself; but for the time being I am convinced that language means what it is ordinarily understood to mean, and that it is a terrific wrench to common sense to read into a contract conditions that were never in the minds of either of the parties.

Last Thursday the decision of this New York court got into the papers and was read in Washington, and Friday the measure that is now before you was prepared. On Friday the gentlemen at the other end of the Avenue saw their opportunity. Were I to resort to the language of the street, I should say that they were mighty quick on the trigger. They got down here in a little more than a few minutes with a bill taking advantage of the absurd decision of that New York judge to do what, to my mind, is an infamous thing, to repudiate a "solemn pledge" made by the Government of the United States, to deprive millions of people of further reliance upon that pledge, to take away from them some substantial part of the fruits of their labors.

In the World War and the period immediately afterward we saw Germany maintain itself by resorting to the mysterious intricacies of finance. Germany financed the war and recovery therefrom by robbing the bourgeoisie, the middle class of Germany, of all their wealth. The end of that war found but two classes of people left as they were before, the rich as wealthy as before, or even wealthier, and the poor, who had nothing that might be taken, and were still with nothing to give. The Government had taken all the resources of the bourgeoisie to finance the war and recovery therefrom.

You are resorting here to the German method. You are entering upon the path of taking the savings of the middle classes with likelihood of still further enriching the wealthy, while giving nothing more to the poor. In juggling the currency the rich as a class are always the winners.

However, if it be the wish of this Congress deliberately to disown the pledges of its predecessors, to throw overboard an assurance that has been in the law, as I have said, for 46 years, let us concern ourselves for a moment with the expediency of it.

Large sums of money are owed to us by foreign nations. At first we demanded our pound of flesh. Then we made great concessions, and now some would wipe out all the debts, but there are those here who still believe the foreign nations should repay at least some part of those funds we lent.

How, after this bill passes, will you have the face to ask further payment? Do you not know that they will turn around and say: "You do not pay your own people what you promised in your own obligations; why should we meet ours?"

My friend who preceded me said he wanted the same standard. You will have the same standard of dishonor.

The standard you apply to your own folk will be applied to you by others; and when you pass this bill the further payment of the foreign loans may well be forgotten.

In various measures we are making huge loans to States, to counties, to municipalities, and we are asked to make them to school districts—huge loans in their total. Will you have the folly to believe that they will ever be repaid if now you enact this measure, a refusal to pay your own debts?

This is the beginning of an orgy of bad faith throughout the land and throughout the world, an orgy that may lead to the destruction of the very cornerstone of society, indeed that of civilization, for civilization rests upon good faith.

You say it is desirable to do this in order that the country may gain. But what shall it profit a man if he gains the whole world and lose his own soul?

The good faith of this country is its soul. We showed this to be the fact in 1790 when Congress took over the State debts and proceeded to funding the debt of the new Nation. Did you know that then the political predecessors of the gentlemen on my right, led by James Madison, tried to do in spirit the same thing you are trying to do, and that the House voted Madison down and Hamilton had his way? To Hamilton we owe the foundation of the credit of this country, the foundation upon which we have built the financial structure that, thank God, we have kept intact up to the present moment.

Like juncture came to the Nation after the crisis in 1873. Before the resulting depression had run its course, the currency question became critical. There were those who believed in more paper money as the remedy. Others demanded that we should resume specie payment and, luckily, they prevailed. Great apprehension followed. Fear was felt that it might not be successfully accomplished, yet on the 1st of January 1879 the "solemn pledge" of 10 years before was kept. Conditions bettered, business increased, and then for a dozen years and more there was prosperity in the land because the country kept faith.

Today, you are asked to break faith in order to restore confidence. Good heavens! Restore confidence by breaking faith; bring back business by breaking faith; start the wheels turning by breaking faith; lead merchants to lay in stocks of goods by breaking faith. No; a thousand times, no!

Your action today, if it be completed, will lessen confidence. It will postpone the return of recovery by months, if not by years. It will undermine, as I say, the foundations of society. It will destroy the greatest asset, not only of any individual but of any nation, the greatest asset in life—trust in pledges. So because you gave a solemn pledge, I demand you keep that solemn pledge. [Applause.]

Mr. PARSONS and Mr. ZIONCHECK rose.

Mr. LUCE. I yield to my friend here who rose first.

Mr. PARSONS. I desire to ask the gentleman why the pledge was made in the first place, on March 18, 1869, after we had gone along as a Nation from 1791 or 1790, when the Government's debt was first refunded under Hamilton, to 1869, without any such law or without any such clauses being written into contracts?

Mr. LUCE. I have not been able to ascertain whether there were like pledges in previous statutes and am assuming this was the first instance.

Mr. PARSONS. It is.

Mr. LUCE. I imagine that pledge was given because then, as now, there was fear throughout the land. The issue of paper currency had so distressed the people, had so injured business, had brought us so near the edge of ruin, that to allay fear, to renew confidence, and to start men once more in their ordinary activities, the Government promised that gold should be paid when gold had been pledged. [Applause.]

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Would the gentleman from Massachusetts be kind enough to explain to us in his lucid manner how he is going to pay debts of $100,000,000,000 with $3,000,000,000 of gold?

Mr. LUCE. A Senator from Massachusetts, George Frisbie Hoar, used to have a story that he told under similar circumstances. It was of an undertaker in a Maine town who was asked by one of his neighbors why he did not keep a larger supply of coffins. "Why", he said, "they are not all going to die at the same time." [Laughter.]

Mr. McGUGIN and Mr. PARSONS rose.

Mr. LUCE. Let us take it by turns. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas, if he will hasten, because there are others who desire to express themselves on this question.

Mr. McGUGIN. Maybe they will not all die at the same time and maybe they will not all demand gold at the same time, but it was our experience about a month ago that they were all demanding it at the same time at the Treasury and we had to suspend such payment. Is not that true?

Mr. LUCE. If the Treasury had then asked for this bill it would have had more excuse than is now found in reliance upon the casuistical opinion of a judge whose wisdom I do not trust. [Applause.]

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I quote from the law under which the Liberty bonds were issued: "The principal and interest thereof shall be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of values." How does the gentleman interpret the expression "the present standard of values"? I interpret it in this way, that there is an agreement upon the part of the Government to pay gold, not a certain number of ounces of gold, but gold having the purchasing power that the gold had at that time these certificates were issued. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. My dear sir——

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. If that is true, how is there any repudiation of an obligation involved in the present measure?

Mr. LUCE. I share what I think is the gentleman's thought. It would be a very wise thing if we altered the law about the standard of values, if we substituted some better standard than we have now, but, certainly, the statute at the time it was enacted meant the standard prescribed by law.

Mr. BOILEAU and Mr. PARSONS rose.

Mr. LUCE. I have answered the gentleman from Illinois once. Let us take turns. I yield to my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. On the opening day of this session, March 9, we passed a resolution giving full force of law to the executive regulations which prohibited people from having gold. Why do we want to continue having the United States obligations payable in gold when the people are not supposed to have it and cannot have it?

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman could not have been here when I started my remarks, and when I stated that I should not have objected to this measure if it had been made a temporary measure. I am objecting to having it made permanent.

Mr. BOILEAU. I have heard all the gentleman's remarks and I have enjoyed listening to the gentleman, although I do not entirely agree with him.

Mr. LUCE. I would not have objected to this measure if it had been made temporary. I object to it as a complete and perpetual renunciation and repudiation of a "solemn pledge."

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. I should like to know what the gentleman's idea is of the Kansas decision which denied the brewers the right to recover damages for their breweries upon the passage of the prohibition law, a decision by the Supreme Court which, in my judgment, covers the same point.

Mr. LUCE. My judgment does not agree with that. It seems to me a horse of a very different color.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Aside, sir, from the legal question involved and considering only the ethics of the situation, does not the gentleman admit that we are in the midst of an economic war of serious consequence to millions of people, and will not the gentleman further admit that in war times our conception of ethical relations between man and man has to yield to the necessities of the situation?

Mr. LUCE. For the third time I will set forth that I would not have objected to this bill if it had been made a bill for the exigency alone. I object to a permanent repudiation of a "solemn pledge." [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, I was very happy that my colleague on the Banking and Currency Committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], was listened to with such great attention by the members of the Committee, and I was very much gratified by the applause he received from his side, because of my great respect for his ability and my great admiration for his character.

The gentleman from Massachusetts and myself, it seems, are fated not to agree on the principles of substantive legislation. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that he is not an attorney at law. Therefore, without criticism of his legal attainments, I can say that I do not believe there is an attorney in the United States who is not either a political partisan or who has not been employed on the other side who would have the slightest difficulty about the constitutionality of this legislation. If there ever was a piece of legislation offered to this body which was constitutional beyond peradventure, it is this legislation. No one can read the Legal Tender cases without knowing that this legislation comes within the purview of the constitutional powers of the Congress. No one who understands the circumstances and conditions under which gold contracts began to be made in this country can have the slightest doubt that all these contracts mean is that obligations requiring payment in gold shall be paid in money with a normal purchasing power.

These contracts began to be made after the Civil War to protect creditors from being paid in what was known as "greenbacks", a currency which was not worth dollar for dollar with gold. Since the Gold Standard Act of 1900 the Government is required to keep all currency on a parity with gold, that is, to see that all currency will buy just as much as gold, dollar for dollar.

Now, then, is that a fair statement? Suppose the American Congress—as it would have the right to do—should demonetize gold, suppose gold should cease to be lawful money in the United States, would these holders of gold contracts say that they were being properly paid if they were paid in something—gold—which was not currency at all? Why, of course not. And yet, if the contention of those who regard the legislation as unconstitutional and dishonest is carried to its logical conclusion, then these contracts could be paid in something worthless as money.

As long as the Government of the United States sees that it has an honest dollar, then the holders of these bonds will get all that they thought they would get at the time they bought the bonds. That is all there is in it, and anybody who argues any other way is making an argument for those who are not after an honest dollar, but who want to be able to threaten the Government with a demand for gold. There are $22,000,000,000 of gold bonds owed by the United States, $14,000,000,000 gold bonds owed by States and municipalities, $11,000,000,000 gold bonds owed by the railroads, $34,000,000,000 gold bonds owed by other domestic corporations, $10,000,000,000 gold foreign "dollar bonds", a total of $91,000,000,000 of bonds payable in gold, all to be paid with $4,300,000,000 in gold, which is all the gold there is in the country; as a matter of fact, there is only $11,000,000,000 of gold in the world.

These gold contracts cannot mean anything except that those who have them will be paid in honest money and not depreciated currency. That is all there is to it.

This legislation means that no longer can the great bankers who hold these bonds come to the Federal Treasury and say, "When these bonds come due, we will demand payment in gold unless you put a 4-percent interest rate in the next bond issue."

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I am sorry; I have not the time. It means that no longer can the bankers threaten the Government of the United States and say, "Unless in your next issue we receive an interest rate of 4 percent we will demand the payment of our bonds in gold, and that will destroy the credit of the United States."

For hundreds of years the peoples of the world, and for 150 years the people of this country, have had their backs bowed down with this "cross of gold." Brother LUCE speaks about the conditions after 1879, when there was a resumption of specie payments. Does the gentleman know that bread lines covered the country from 1879 until 1896? That is what the resumption of specie payments did for the people of this country. It destroyed the productive power of the people; it sucked their earnings into the hands of the money lender; and it was not until the discovery of gold in the Klondike and in South Africa, in 1896, 1897, and 1898, that this condition ceased; and from then on until 1914, all the people of this country, including the creditor class, with which my brother LUCE is so exclusively concerned, and at whose shrine he falls down and worships whenever I hear him speak—all classes of people prospered as they never prospered before in the history of the world.

What does this legislation mean? This legislation does not take the country off the gold standard. I wish to God it did. The gold standard has been the curse of the world for hundreds of years. [Applause.] It has destroyed the working classes, it has destroyed the producing classes, it has contracted the currency. It has made it possible for the great bankers to control the value of one product, gold, so that the production of all other classes of the people could be sucked into their coffers. Thank God, we are nearly through. We have only one more step to take after this legislation is passed, and that is to go off the gold standard permanently, to go on a managed currency, to go on a currency based on the buying power of the dollar, to go on an all-commodity basis, and then the American people will be free. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, since the 4th of March we have established in this country the principle that it is possible for us to go off the gold standard without suffering any public calamity. We are off the gold standard now, for a period of two years, or until the proclamation of the President should shorten that period. We have established a principle that in order to reestablish a legitimate price level and start production it is proper to issue currency which is not based on any metallic reservoir. We have adopted the principle that in order to achieve and maintain an equitable price level it is legitimate to reduce the amount of gold in the dollar—provided we are going to stay on the gold standard at all—and today we are establishing a principle that what a bondholder is entitled to is an honest dollar with an honest purchasing power; and we have only one more step to go, and that is to go off the gold standard entirely; and may God, in His infinite goodness, grant that this day may come soon. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there is no purpose on my part—I know there is no purpose on the part of any Member of the majority of this House—to reflect upon any member of any class of our citizenship, or to legislate in a manner which will be derogatory to any member of any class of our citizenship. What the majority party is endeavoring to do is to reestablish the economic vitality of the country, start the production of the country on a reasonable, profitable basis, to raise the price level to such a point that it will be fair as between the debtor and the creditor, so that the debtor can pay his debts, and the creditor may be able to receive what is due him. What the majority party in this Congress is trying to do is to avoid national bankruptcy—which means revolution—when the gold dollar or any kind of a dollar would be worth nothing. There cannot be any question but that when the Democratic Party came into power on the 4th of March this country was headed straight for bankruptcy and straight for revolution. No other administration, in this length of time, has ever restored confidence in a people as has been done since the 4th of March last, by the present administration.

Let us avoid this harsh criticism; let us avoid this accusation of repudiation. I say to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] whom I regard so highly, that now the producers of this country are called upon to pay in what they produce three times as much as they paid at the time, on an average, when they borrowed the money which they owe. Is that a fair proposition? Is that an equitable proposition?

The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], the distinguished former Senator, spoke about changing the yardstick. The very thing that the Democratic majority in this House wants to do is to keep the yardstick stable—not the yardstick of the number of ounces of gold in a dollar, not the yardstick of paying a bond in something that may or may not have value, but the yardstick of maintaining a dollar with a fair purchasing power, the yardstick of maintaining average general commodity price levels, so that when a man borrows a dollar or a thousand dollars he may know that he can pay it five years from now with the same kind of money he borrowed, with the same kind of production, on the average.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is just that last thought that was in the gentleman's mind, that was in my mind. I was not speaking about the yardstick as of 10 years ago or 20 years ago, but the yardstick of tomorrow, for, as we pass this bill and abrogate the gold clause, at the same time we must remember that we have given the President the power to inflate currency hereafter, and he may change the yardstick by Presidential decree.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The President may do it, but I have no reason to anticipate that the President is going to do anything which will not be equitable as between the debtor class and the creditor class. I should say right here, also, that the right treatment of each class is necessary for the permanent prosperity of either. I may say to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] that the creditor class in this country is going to suffer equally with the debtor class unless there is a reflation of the currency, because you cannot continue on a falling price level without bankruptcy, and bankruptcy means loss and destruction for all classes. The President of the United States and this administration cannot do everything it would like to do at one stroke, but the endeavor is to build up this theory of a commodity dollar, and to follow legislation which has been passed and which will, in my judgment, pass this House today with legislation which will stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar and be fair to all our people so that the distress and destruction of values and the human misery and suicides which we have had in the last year may never occur again in the history of this Republic. [Applause.]

With the hope that the day is approaching when we can have a currency which will insure stability and fairness to all classes and a currency not dependent in any degree on how much gold metal is dug out of the ground, in other words, a managed currency, I am suggesting the following bill:

A bill to provide an American money of stable purchasing power, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That henceforth it shall be the primary object of the monetary policy of the United States to provide an American money that will maintain the purchasing power of the dollar in the wholesale commodity markets of the United States substantially stable at the average level of the year 1926.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury shall forthwith cause to be printed, of the best materials and designs, so as to render counterfeiting as difficult as practicable, a supply of new paper money of $2,000,000,000 face value, in bills of $1, $5, $10, $50, $100, $500, and $1,000, and shall further cause to be printed, as required under the provisions of this act, additional amounts of such paper money, including bills of $3, $30, $300, $3,000, $5,000, and $10,000.

SEC. 3. Said new paper money shall not constitute promises to pay, but shall, like metal coin, in itself be, and on its face purport to be, money of the United States; shall like metal coin be irredeemable; and shall be legal tender at its face value in payment of all debts, taxes, duties, and other monetary dues and obligations, public and private.

SEC. 4. All agreements and conditions, heretofore or hereafter made, insofar as they provide for the payment of a monetary obligation in gold or other specific coin of the United States, are, except as such payment has been specifically authorized by the Congress of the United States, hereby declared to be contrary to public policy and void from the beginning, on the ground that they discriminate against other money of the United States, interfere with the proper exercise of the constitutional power of the Congress of the United States to regulate the value of money, tend toward unfair advantage, overreaching and oppression, particularly in times of war or financial stringency, and are otherwise detrimental to the welfare of the people of the United States.

SEC. 5. The value in exchange, or purchasing power, of said new paper money is to rest not on the value of the material composing it or on any promise of redemption or on any collateral but on the more reliable basis of the limitless demand which its legal-tender quality will create for it, combined with the strict control and limitation of its supply hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 6. The Bureau of Labor Statistics shall continue to ascertain weekly, substantially in the manner heretofore practiced, the average wholesale price of commodities in the United States, and shall regularly each week publish an index thereof. In said index the average price level of the year 1926 shall be designated throughout by the base figure 100, and price levels of other periods shall be expressed by comparative figures, in percentages of 100. The weekly index shall contain, together with the current figures, those for the preceding 3 weeks, and also for the twenty-sixth and fifty-second preceding week. Copies shall be regularly and promptly mailed, free of charge, to all weekly and daily newspapers requesting them, and other copies, printed on suitable heavy paper in larger type, shall be regularly and promptly mailed to all post offices and postal substations in the United States, and shall there be posted for public view for the duration of 1 week. When by reason of extraordinary conditions, such as an extensive crop failure or war, the prices of some commodities, represented in said index, are temporarily thrown greatly out of line, the Commissioner of Labor Statistics may direct, subject to the control of the Secretary of Labor and the President, that the price of such commodities temporarily be represented in said index by substituted index figures that reflect the abnormal situation only in part. But in every such case all publications of said index which embody, or are based upon, such substituted figures, shall contain a complete enumeration of such commodities, with their true as well as substituted index figures, and a clear statement of the reasons for the use of the substituted figures, and of the extent to which their substitution affects the index of the price of all commodities combined.

SEC. 7. The Secretary of the Treasury shall place the new paper money into circulation only through the purchase from the United States Treasury from the Federal Reserve banks or in the open market of securities, as follows:

(a) Obligations of the United States, bearing interest at a rate of at least 4 percent and having a maturity of not more than 2 years.

(b) Other first class monetary obligations, such as high-grade State, municipal, or public utility bonds, and notes, drafts, and commercial bills in amounts of $1,000, or multiples thereof, issued for goods or livestock actually delivered, which are well secured by endorsements and by ample collateral, and have a maturity of not less than 1 nor more than 9 months.

Under normal conditions about 20 percent of the securities on hand shall consist of obligations having a maturity of less than 1 year, and purchases shall be arranged so as to have a substantial amount fall due every month.

SEC. 8. The Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase securities under section 7 hereof as long, and only as long, as the average wholesale price of all commodities, according to the price index, shall stand below 100. In case a cessation of such purchase of securities by the Secretary of the Treasury shall be insufficient to prevent a rise of such price above 100, then he shall forthwith sell for cash, to be impounded, such an amount of the securities purchased by him under this act as will suffice by the reduction of the monetary circulation thus to be effected to lower said price to 100. It is hereby made one of the primary and principal duties of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the average wholesale price of all commodities in the United States as nearly as practicable at the level indicated by the figure 100, according to said price index; to prevent to the best of his ability deviations from said level exceeding 1 percent, and promptly to rectify any deviations that may occur.

SEC. 9. All of the new paper money printed under this act, together with the securities purchased therefor, and all money withdrawn from circulation through sales of any such securities, shall be kept in a special fund to be known as the "stabilization fund." All of the assets of said fund shall be kept in separate vaults, strictly apart from all other assets and funds of the Treasury, and shall never be commingled with any such other assets and funds or be used in lieu thereof or be used to defray ordinary or extraordinary expenses of the Government, and separate books and records shall be kept concerning all transactions of said fund. No part of said fund shall ever be used in an attempt to control the value or price of any commodity or other thing save only the purchasing power of the dollar with reference to the average wholesale price, in the United States, of all commodities combined.

SEC. 10. All income received, by way of interest or otherwise, from the operations and securities of the stabilization fund shall be used as follows:

(a) To reimburse the Treasury for all expenses incurred in the manufacture of the new paper money delivered to the stabilization fund, and for all expenses of the administration of said fund;

(b) To keep the total value of the securities in said fund always at 100 percent of the paper money issued under this act, and outstanding, by making good any losses or deficiencies that may occur;

(c) To increase the revenues of the United States by payment of all surplus into the general fund of the Treasury.

SEC. 11. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell at any time securities of the stabilization fund the retention of which appears inadvisable, and to purchase others in lieu thereof.

SEC. 12. The Secretary of the Treasury shall furnish weekly a report setting forth clearly the transactions of the stabilization fund during the preceding week and a summary of the assets of said fund, also quarterly a detailed report showing all assets, receipts, and disbursements, to the President, to the Vice President, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to every member of the Committees on Banking and Currency of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and shall also mail copies of said reports to all newspapers requesting them.

SEC. 13. The assets of the stabilization fund shall be kept distributed, mostly in the interior of the United States, in suitable depositories.

SEC. 14. Separate auditors appointed by the Committees on Banking and Currency of the Senate and House of Representatives, respectively, shall examine the records and assets of the stabilization fund from time to time and shall each report their findings to both of said committees and to the President. The expenses of such audits shall be paid by the Treasury and shall be reimbursed to it under section 10 (a) hereof.

SEC. 15. The Secretary of the Treasury shall replace worn or defective paper money issued under this act, subject to the same rules, analogously applied, as now govern similar replacement in the case of the present paper money of the United States.

SEC. 16. The issue of United States notes, Treasury notes, and silver certificates shall cease upon the beginning of the circulation of said new paper money. All United States notes, Treasury notes, and silver certificates then outstanding shall be exchangeable at the Treasury for the new paper money aforesaid, at par, during the period of 1 year from the beginning of the circulation of said new paper money. Thereafter they shall be void.

SEC. 17. The issue of gold certificates shall forthwith cease. Outstanding gold certificates shall be presented for redemption in gold or for exchange at par against the new paper money aforesaid within the period of 1 year from the beginning of the circulation of said new paper money. Thereafter they shall be void.

SEC. 18. All minting of gold coins and silver dollars by the mints of the United States shall forthwith cease. But any gold or silver hereafter offered at said mints shall be made into bars of 250 grams or multiples thereof, 0.90 fine, and shall be stamped as to weight and fineness, at a reasonable charge, covering cost, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 19. Gold coins shall cease to be money for any purpose in the United States after the lapse of 1 year from the beginning of the circulation of said new paper money. During said year they may be exchanged at the Treasury for said new paper money at par.

SEC. 20. The issue of national-bank notes and Federal Reserve bank notes shall forthwith cease. None of them, however, shall be retired from circulation before the lapse of 6 months from the beginning of the circulation of the new paper money aforesaid. Thereafter said notes shall be withdrawn from circulation as fast as practicable and shall thereupon be surrendered and canceled. After the lapse of 1 year from the beginning of the circulation of said new paper money they shall cease to be money for any purpose, but shall remain redeemable by the banks that issued them for another year, and no longer, in any lawful money. The Secretary of the Treasury shall, on demand, cash at face value and accrued interest all United States bonds that have been deposited as security for the redemption of any of said notes, applying the proceeds to such redemption.

SEC. 21. Each Federal Reserve bank shall maintain the total of its outstanding Federal Reserve credit as nearly as practicable constant from the time of the passage of this act until the lapse of 1 year from the beginning of the circulation of said new paper money. No Federal Reserve bank shall, without approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, reduce its liability for outstanding Federal Reserve notes before the lapse of said 1 year. Thereafter about 10 percent of the then outstanding Federal Reserve notes shall each month be retired and canceled. All Federal Reserve notes shall cease to be money for any purpose at the end of 2 years from the beginning of the circulation of said new paper money but shall remain redeemable by the banks that issued them for another year, and no longer, in any lawful money.

SEC. 22. The Federal Reserve Board, the Federal Reserve banks, all member banks of the Federal Reserve System, and all other banks and banking institutions in the United States are hereby directed to conduct all their operations in subordination to and, to the extent of their legal powers, in support of the policy announced by section 1 hereof, it being hereby expressly declared that a reasonable management of bank credit is of great importance for the proper regulation of the value of the money or the United States.

SEC. 23. The President of the United States, upon recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to order such temporary limitations on the rate of interest to be charged or to be collected on loans made or to be made, either generally or with reference to specified classes of loans, as from time to time may become necessary for the orderly regulation under this act of the value of the money of the United States.

SEC. 24. The President of the United States, upon recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to order such temporary increases of the reserves of the Federal Reserve banks, or of their member banks, or of both of said Reserve banks and member banks, as from time to time may become necessary for the orderly regulation, under this act, of the value of the money of the United States.

SEC. 25. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to appoint a temporary conservator, with plenary powers of management, for any bank or banking institution that shall by unwarranted reduction of loans or by other unfair means interfere with the orderly regulation, under this act, of the value of the money of the United States.

SEC. 26. After the lapse of two years from the passage of this act all deposits of such banks and banking institutions within the United States as are not members of the Federal Reserve System, shall be subject to an excise tax of 5 percent per year.

SEC. 27. The President of the United States is hereby empowered to prescribe and publish by Executive order such regulations as may be necessary for the carrying into effect, and for the enforcement, of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 28. Any person who shall willfully or by gross negligence violate any duty imposed by this act or by regulations prescribed and published under section 27 thereof, or shall willfully and unlawfully in any manner defeat or interfere with the performance of any such duty, or shall counterfeit, forge, steal, embezzle, or with felonious intent shall alter, falsify, carry away, destroy, or mutilate any of the moneys, funds, securities, documents, records, books, or reports made, issued, kept, purchased, or intended to be offered for purchase, or required to be kept or made, under the provisions of this act, or pursuant to regulations prescribed and published under section 27 thereof, or with felonious intent shall prepare or attempt to do, or assist in the doing of, any of the things in this section above mentioned, or shall willfully violate any order made under section 23 or section 24 hereof, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in the amount of the loss caused by the wrong committed, to be paid to the party or parties injured, and in addition thereto, and in addition to other penalties provided by law, shall also be fined not more than $50,000, or be imprisoned for not more than 25 years, or both, according to the character and gravity of the offense committed. All penalties inflicted hereunder shall be subject to summary mitigation by a United States Circuit Court of Appeals at any time.

SEC. 29. All laws heretofore enacted, insofar as they are in conflict with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

SEC. 30. If any part of this act should be held to be invalid, the validity of the remainder thereof shall not be thereby affected.

SEC. 31. This act may be cited as the "Currency Act of 1933."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this repudiation bill is in direct opposition to the Democratic Party platform of 1932 upon which Franklin D. Roosevelt was elected President of the United States. It constitutes a violation of every campaign pledge he made before the people while he was barnstorming the country asking for votes. It is a repudiation of the faith of Jefferson. In a particular sense, I represent the members of the Democratic Party in my district, since I was nominated by them as their candidate at the last congressional election. I was also nominated by the Prohibition Party in my district. And I was nominated by the Republicans. I represent all the people of my district by virtue of my office and I represent all of the political parties of my district by reason of the fact that I was nominated by every one of them in turn. This gives me the right to protest in the name of the Democratic Party in my district against this repudiation bill. Mr. Chairman, the Democrats in my district are not welchers. They do not profess one thing and do another. They do not go to the country on one platform and in office act upon another and an entirely different one. They do not set up a party platform and, after winning a popular vote on the strength of it, cynically cast it aside and laugh the people and the people's government to scorn. So far as the people of my district are concerned, the Democratic Members of the House do not need to haul down the Stars and Stripes from the roof of the Capitol today. They do not need to vote under the Union Jack at the dictation of Franklin D. Roosevelt. His political credit is gone. His star has begun to wane. No Democrat needs to follow him into political oblivion.

Mr. Chairman, a law was passed here on May 12, 1933. On May 26, 1933, this bill was introduced asking us to amend the law passed 13 days earlier. Mr. Chairman, this is making a mock of government. The stuff that has been sent to this House during this special session to be obediently and subserviently passed into law, and the manner in which it has been sent and the nonsense that has accompanied it, has been enough to sicken the strongest stomach. It has been said in connection with this repudiation bill, this latest outburst of delirium, that President Roosevelt wishes to have it as a legal record of what has already been done. Mr. Chairman, what has been done was done illegally, and I do not doubt that those who have broken their oaths of office are anxious now to have Congress furnish them with a clean bill of health, but I think it would have been better if Congress had been permitted to function properly from the beginning. It is the custom, I believe, among certain malefactors to break the law and pay the fine afterward; to break the law and then say, "What are you going to do about it?" The crime of kidnaping proceeds that way. The kidnaper says, "Punish me or try to take me and I will kill the child." So with these wreckers and violators of law and order in office. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be more orderly and less expensive and that it would tax the patience of the country less if Roosevelt sent his backers home to their chosen lairs in Wall Street and himself attended to his own Executive business. If he has a yearning to be a legislator, let him resign his Executive office and get himself elected to Congress. He will be welcome here if the people send him to Congress, but he has no business to interfere with the deliberations of this House while he is acting as President of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, this repudiation bill was framed and brought here in the interest of the foreign debtors of the United States. Its aim is a cancelation of war debts by fraud and treachery toward the American people. It gives the foreign nations a way of making entirely fictitious payments on the war debts. It permits them to use the Federal Reserve currency and the United States Government credit which was unlawfully taken by the Federal Reserve Board and its agents and exported abroad. The United States Treasury has been drawn upon by the Federal Reserve Board for paper money and for credit exchangeable for money and these, unlawfully taken, have been sent to the debtor nations. Now comes Roosevelt asking us to pass a law so that the debtor nations may pay their debts to us in that stolen Federal Reserve currency and credit. This repudiation bill also gives them the right to pay us in debased coinage. It repeals the Gold Standard Act of 1900—the sheet anchor of this country's national currency—and it decrees that hereafter the United States shall issue no more national currency for itself at all but shall have nothing more than a debased subsidiary coinage and Federal Reserve currency in the form of Federal Reserve notes and Federal Reserve bank notes, issued at the will of the Roosevelt money changers who now control the Nation.

Mr. Chairman, the people of the United States are not coolies. They will not transact their business and make their interchanges of goods and services with the debased tokens of a subsidiary coinage and slips of paper. The Democratic administration, in violation of its campaign pledges and its party platform, is now endeavoring to foist upon this country currency of no value. It has given the gold and lawful money of the country to the international money Jews of whom Franklin D. Roosevelt is the familiar, and it has sent this bold and dishonest bill here so that it may have the pleasure of seeing Congress jump through another paper hoop and turn another somersault under the whip of the ringmaster.

Mr. Chairman, there is not a man within the sound of my voice who does not know that this country has fallen into the hands of the international money changers, and there are few Members here who do not regret it. Why should the fact be hidden? Is it not because those who have betrayed the United States are afraid to face the consequences of their misdeeds? Is it not because every man who hears me knows that there are few things more terrible than citizens armed in a righteous cause defending themselves and their children, their homes and their firesides from the invader? Do you not think at times, Mr. Chairman, of that old wooden bridge built by the Colonists at Concord? Do you not think at times, Mr. Chairman, of what happened there?

By the rude bridge that spanned the flood
Their flag to April breeze unfurled;
Here once the embattled farmers stood
And fired the shot heard round the world.

Mr. Chairman, we are on Concord Bridge today. Our enemy—the same treacherous enemy—is advancing upon us. Mr. Chairman, I will die in my tracks before I yield him a square inch of American soil or so much as a one dollar rebate on his war debt to us.

Mr. Chairman, the Constitution of the United States has served us well. I am in favor of defending it against all comers. In the Constitution of the United States, it is written that the United States shall guarantee a republican form of government to every State in the Union. This guaranty has been broken by Franklin D. Roosevelt in his unlawful assumption of dictatorial powers. It is also written that no State shall make anything but gold or silver coin a tender in payment of debts. This repudiation bill and its predecessors nullify this provision of the Constitution. It is also written in an amendment to the Constitution, "The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned." Mr. Chairman, this repudiation bill questions the validity of the public debt and repudiates it. It repudiates the Liberty bonds; it repudiates the veterans' adjusted-service certificates; it cancels the war debts due to the United States from foreign governments.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have come to the place where we must decide whether we shall serve God or Mammon. Shall we nullify the Constitution at the behest of the money changers who have unlawfully taken all our gold and lawful money into their own possession or shall we take a stand here in defense of the faith of our fathers? Mr. Chairman, my mind is made up. I will stand by the Constitution. If I should fail to do so, I should expect to be met at the train when I go home to my district by a delegation of honest Pennsylvania citizens with 50 or 100 feet of rope. I should expect to be escorted to the nearest tree to be taught what it means to vote for a nullification of the Constitution in the House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this repudiation bill were foretold by a writer in the Dearborn Independent some years ago. There is, therefore, nothing novel or original about them. The writer of the article in the Dearborn Independent made the following quotation prophesying some of the measures which have been introduced here by the President of the United States:

(2) Confiscation of money in order to regulate its circulation.

(3) We must introduce a unit of exchange based on the value of labor units, regardless of whether paper or wood are used as the medium. We will issue money to meet the normal demands of every subject, adding a total sum for every birth and decreasing the total amount for every death.

(4) Commercial paper will be bought by the Government, which * * * will grant loans on a business basis. A measure of this character will prevent the stagnation of money, parasitism, and laziness, qualities which were useful to us as long as the Gentiles maintained their independence, but which are not desirable to us when our kingdom comes.

(5) We will replace stock exchanges by great Government credit institutions, whose functions will be to tax trade paper according to Government regulations. These institutions will be in such a position that they may market or buy as many as half a billion industrial shares a day. Thus all industrial undertakings will become dependent on us. You may well imagine what power that will give us.

"Remember that when next you hear the Jewish plan that 'Gentiles' shall do business with their own bits of paper, while Jews keep the gold reserve safely in their own hands. If the crash comes, 'Gentiles' have the paper and the Jews have the gold." Says Protocol XXII: "We hold in our hands the greatest modern power—gold; in 2 days we could free it from our treasuries in any desired quantities."

The Jews are economists, esoteric and exoteric: They have one system to tangle up the "Gentile", another which they hope to install when "Gentile" stupidity has bankrupted the world. The Jews are economists. Note the number of them who teach economics in the State universities. Says Protocol VIII:

"We will surround our Government with a whole world of economists. It is for this reason that the science of economics is the chief subject of instruction taught by the Jews."

Mr. Chairman, have not most of these predictions come to pass? Is it not true that, in the United States today, the "Gentiles" have the slips of paper while the Jews have the gold and lawful money? And is not this repudiation bill a bill specifically designed and written by the Jewish international money changers themselves in order to perpetuate their power? What else do you make of it, Mr. Chairman? Does it not cancel the war debts? Does it not defraud the holders of Liberty bonds and every other obligation calling for the payment of money? Does it not defraud the veterans of the World War and take the value out of their adjusted-compensation certificates?

Mr. Chairman, I demand that the gold stock of the United States be taken from the Federal Reserve banks and placed in the United States Treasury. I demand an audit of United States Government financial affairs from the top to the bottom. I demand a resumption of specie payments based on full gold and silver values. I demand the currency of the Constitution. I demand the rights of the people guaranteed to them by the Constitution, and that means that I demand a vote which will defeat this repudiation bill.

No man can serve two masters. A vote for this bill is a vote for the money changers. A vote for an audit and an investigation of the Government's financial affairs is a vote for the people.

Mr. Chairman, all I ask of this House, and I ask it in the name of all the people, Jews and Gentiles, citizens and resident aliens alike, is that it, the people's own representative legislative assembly, shall stay close to the people and vote in their interest. Do not cancel the war debts and bind down upon our suffering veterans and our men of toil and our broken-hearted mothers and our starving children, the endless slavery of paying tribute to the "united front" of the war debtors. Do not force Americans to pay tribute to foreign rulers and potentates. Take back this country or perish in the attempt. Let this be our own country again. Let us rebuild it for our own. Let us keep the Stars and Stripes floating over the roof of the Capitol. Let us cling to the Constitution of the United States. This is the way to freedom and prosperity. The way of repudiation is madness. Remember, Mr. Chairman, that the ship of state has women and children aboard. Do not, therefore, guide it into uncharted waters. Do not allow the great Democratic Party to steer it onto the rocks while the world waits for it to founder and go down so that the international salvage crews may set to work on the wreck of it. [Applause.]

Mr. CROSS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I have been intensely amused at my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] and my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN.] My friend from Massachusetts has painted a terrible picture. He tells you we are going to wipe out the middle classes by this legislation. He tells you that the thousands of insurance policies will be destroyed, because they will not be paid with dollars of the present purchasing value. Does he not know that the middle class is the class which this depression and this contraction has practically already wiped out?

It is the man who had a little property, the little farmer, the home owner, who had borrowed on his farm and on his home, who had struggled to pay the premium on his insurance policies and who, by reason of this depression, this contraction, has not been able to pay his premiums, has not been able to meet his obligations, and as a result their policies have been canceled or they have been cashed in for what they could get on them.

Mr. ELTSE of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSS. No; not now.

Mr. ELTSE of California. I wanted to ask why the income tax in the small brackets was pushed up?

Mr. CROSS. Then I listened to the powerful prayer for the eleemosynary institutions which hold securities. Does the gentleman not know that if you destroy the ability of the people to take care of the many more times afflicted people who are being taken care of by their relatives than are being taken care of by those institutions what suffering would result?

If we are going to destroy and take from the middle classes all their property, and we are not going to help the lower class, which has been referred to here as the non-property-owning class, who in the name of God is going to get all this property?

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROSS. Not now, please.

Now, I did want to spend the little time I had in discussing the question at issue. There are but two questions here. One is whether we have the power under the Constitution to pass this act. The other is, Is it right and just to pass such an act? There can be no question about the Constitution. That question has long since been decided. That question was decided clearly by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Parker against Davis in Twelfth Wallace, which came to the Supreme Court from the State of Massachusetts, and I would like to read what the Court had to say. There had been a number of cases previously. The Hepburn case had been considered, and in that case an act similar to this resolution was held unconstitutional. The Hepburn case was tried in 1868, but this case repeals the Hepburn case and lays down the fact that Congress has the inherent power, the sovereign power to make money, to make any kind of money, to declare it legal tender, and that it is essential for the preservation of free government.

There is not a government in all the world, my colleagues, that writes its bonds payable in gold except this country—neither England, nor France, nor Germany, nor Italy; and it was not written into contracts in this country until the Uriah Heaps in their greed to control the redemption metal, aided and abetted by their Quints, Gammons, and Smacks conceived the idea of writing in the so-called "gold clause."

Now I should like to state what the Supreme Court has to say. I am merely going to read a few brief excerpts that you may get the view of the Supreme Court of the United States in passing upon this question. Of course, it was a Legal Tender case. The case to which I now refer is that of Parker against Davis, in Twelfth Wallace, Seventy-ninth United States Reports:

I quote:

If it be held by this court that Congress had no constitutional power under any circumstances or in any emergency to make Treasury notes a legal tender for the payment of all debts, a power confessedly possessed by every other independent sovereign country in the world, the Government is without those means of self-preservation which all must admit may in certain circumstances become indispensable.

Listen to this. Quote:

If legal-tender notes are rendered unavailable the Government has become an instrument of the grossest injustice, all debts are loaded with an obligation that was never contemplated they should assume, a large percentage is added to every debt and such must become the demand for gold to satisfy contracts that ruinous sacrifices, general distress, and bankruptcy may be expected.

Is not this our condition today? And then again, quote:

These consequences are too obvious to admit of question, and there is no well-founded difference made between the validity of an act of Congress declaring Treasury notes legal tender for the payment of debts contracted after its passage—and of an act making them a legal tender for the discharge of all debts as well as those incurred before as those made after its enactment. But the obligation of a contract to pay money is to pay that which the law will recognize as money when the payment is to be made. If there is anything settled by the decisions it is this, and we do not understand it to be controverted.

In 1834 the amount of gold in a gold dollar was reduced 6 percent so that all gold dollars prior to that time contained 6 percent more grains of gold than all the gold dollars thereafter.

For a long time there were four kinds of legal tender in this country, the gold dollar made before 1834, the gold dollar made from 1834 on, the silver dollar, and the greenbacks.

If a man made a contract and the kind of legal tender was not mentioned, then the debtor could pay with whatever legal tender he saw fit. Then it says:

> The eagles coined after 1834 were not money until they were authorized by law, and had they been coined before without a law fixing the legal value they could not any more have paid a debt than uncoined bullion, or cotton, or wheat. Every contract for the payment of money is necessarily subject to the constitutional power of the Government over the currency, whatever that power may be, and the obligation of the parties, therefore—> the obligations of the parties, therefore, are assumed with reference to that power.

I wish you to pay particular attention to this—

So that when a man enters into a contract he enters into it with the understanding, with a knowledge of the law, that the Congress has the right to change the kind of money it shall be paid with, to increase it, to diminish it, because the Constitution gives that specific right.

Now, I heard my friend from Massachusetts with great contempt speak of a case recently decided in England. Why, that case was tried in the lower court before Judge Farwell after thorough argument and consideration.

It was then appealed to the Court of Appeals and there tried before the English judges than whose reputation for honesty and legal ability none is greater; and Lord Hansworth, the keeper of the rolls, wrote the opinion. The case was that of an Englishman who had purchased a bond from a Belgian company. This bond was for the sum of £100, to be paid in gold of the weight and fineness of gold in England on the 1st day of September, 1928.

When the bond fell due later on, England had gone off the gold standard. The Belgian company tendered him the money in sterling, which was far under what gold would have been. He declined to accept it and went into court. England had gone off the gold standard and the bank notes of England were made legal tender. The English court said that Parliament had the right to makes notes of the Bank of England legal tender and that he had to accept it, that it was a contract to pay a debt and that he had to take whatever the legislature said should be legal tender, although the bond specifically stated it was to be paid in gold.

Then, in the New York case the decision was rendered by Judge Graham. In that case the question came up as to whether the trustees of a fund should accept payment when the obligation they held against the parties set out specifically it was to be paid in gold of the present weight and fineness irrespective as to what might be legal tender thereafter. The court there held, this country being off the gold standard, that the trustees should accept the currency. My friend should be more tolerant of the opinion of our learned judges and not condemn them with such feeling merely because they do not agree with him.

Now, let us talk about the moral part of this a moment. Oh, they say it is repudiation. Why, all we propose to do is to see that equal justice is done to both creditor and debtor. Is this being done now? Does not everybody know that the gold dollar today is three or four times more powerful in purchasing power or in real value when measured in property, in those things that supply the necessities, comforts, and luxuries of life than it was at the time it was borrowed?

Listen! Let us see the equity of it. If I had loaned you $10,000, 5 years ago, we would and we should have assumed that conditions would remain practically the same and that the purchasing power of the dollars I loaned you would be paid back in dollars having the same purchasing power; but if perchance our minds met on that, then my mind never met on any proposition that the gold dollar would run amuck and multiply itself in purchasing power, nor did yours; but the gold dollar has and is still run amuck and as a result, in accordance with the letter of the law, it enables me to rob you of twice what I loaned you, and I take your property, kick you out and let you go, and yet they say that this is fair under the letter of the law.

Why, this Congress is a great court of equity, and here justice can be done to everybody, because the Constitution says that we shall regulate the price of money; and like every other parliamentary body in the world, when great crises come you boys who think that the Shylock bond ought to be kept, not in spirit but in letter, and that this one clause ought to be protected, say, "They signed the bond, did not they." But if the shoe was on the other foot, if perchance some chemist should tonight discover a means of converting clay into gold as easily as water can be changed into steam, and gold thereby rendered worthless, they would appeal to Congress for relief and we would justly grant it.

Then they say, "Oh, you are giving the President too much power." I grant you that we have given him much power. I regret that this was necessary; but, Mr. Chairman, I had rather see the President with this power or I would rather see him as a dictator than to see a Danton or a Robespierre or a Lenin as a dictator, and we were verging on to that.

Little as those who possess great wealth in this country may think it, those who stand here and fight for this measure are their true friends. They can hate Pecora as much as they please, but, after all, he is doing them a great service because he will probably save them in the end.

Your people back home, tens of millions of them, are looking to this Congress and are hoping and praying that you will come to their rescue and that you will do something to equalize measures and bring back justice. Are you going to do it? Let me tell you that this resolution will solve the question, because our obsession over the gold dollar and our persistence in staying on the gold basis when every other nation had quit it have caused our people to become overburdened with intolerable debts, shackled with impossible debts, and this resolution is a cleaver that will cut in two these shackles, and the frown upon these tens of millions of men will be transformed into smiles of happy contentment. This resolution, enacted into law, and the sighs upon the quivering lips of countless half-fed children will be turned into the lilt of merry laughter. Will you do it?

Here is a law that justice demands and good conscience demands. The people are demanding it and, believe me, this Congress is going to enact it. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, let it be understood at the outset that I do not speak for the rich. I, myself, think that references to classes are odious. I think that a correct analysis of the situation in this country today will reveal the fact that the old line of demarcation which once obtained between the debtor and the creditor is now obliterated.

I have long been a debtor. I go back as far as my memory will admit, and I can remember when my people labored for a mere pittance. I remember that they were then struggling with a debt problem—the lifting of a mortgage on a humble home. I know what it is to belong to the debtor class.

In these later days the burden of debt has borne heavily upon nearly all of us. I take it that I differ little from the average man in this respect. Those who have long been debtors in later years have become creditors. Many of us recently purchased a $100 Liberty bond. Some more fortunate purchased a thousand-dollar Liberty bond. Many of us are fortunate in having something laid aside in the savings banks. Many are now carrying the burden of payments for life insurance. To this extent we are members of the creditor class.

So, let us, in the name of common justice, cease our odious references to the debtor and creditor classes. The people of America today are all in the same boat, and the debtor class is merged with the creditor class. The aim of this Congress and the aim of this administration should be to serve the best interests of all alike.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] made a slip in the course of his remarks such as I have seen made frequently before in the course of debate. He contradicted himself within a period of 5 minutes. He first asserted with a great deal of vehemence that the pending bill does not take us off the gold standard, and this statement he followed with a still more vehement declaration that he "wished to God it did." Within the next few minutes he opened a new phase of his discourse with a statement that "we are now off the gold standard." Surely, if we are already off the gold standard, his is a futile wish to God the present bill would take us off the gold standard.

The indisputable fact is that it is the purpose of the present administration to take us definitely off the gold standard. It is unquestionably the best opinion of the present administration that we are not yet in fact and in law off the gold standard, but that this legislation is necessary to accomplish that purpose.

What does it mean to the average man that the country is to go off the gold standard? Let us state it in simple terms, so that the average citizen can understand. To go off the gold standard means to strike the only firm, reliable, and substantial foundation from under the currency of the country. A currency system which is not based on gold—or some other precious metal, and it is conceded that gold is the most stable in value—is of necessity based upon the faith and credit of a nation. And in these days we have ample proof that credit is fluctuating and uncertain. The pending resolution is even proof that a nation's faith, alas, is uncertain and transient.

Today we find ourselves surrounded by men loyal to the administration who in this House advocate that the United States Government break its solemn faith and disavow its solemn pledge that it would honor the gold clause wherever it is written into its contracts, a pledge which has been held out to our own people and the world for 64 years. So I say that both national credit and national faith do not constitute a sound basis upon which to issue currency. Currency issued upon any such basis is in no sense sound.

To disavow the gold standard and to launch upon a policy of issuing so-called "lawful paper money" resting upon the highly uncertain base of national faith and national credit is to open the door to future evils, the extent of which is beyond our power to foresee.

But the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] for one reason seeks to justify the present proposal on the ground that it is constitutional. I have no doubt that it is. It is true that while the Constitution of the United States places a limitation upon the several States as against their right to pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts, it contains no such limitation upon such a right in the Federal Government. I suppose no such limitation was imposed upon the Central Government because it was thought that the Nation, composed of States, each of which was enjoined against the passage of a law impairing the obligation of contracts, would certainly take no such action.

But the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] in further justification of the proposal, asserts it to be constitutional because we could have met our full legal obligations under the gold clause by paying our every bond in other than gold dollars, namely, in any legal currency. This is an admission indeed. The gentleman from Maryland has unconsciously lifted the curtain.

If it be true that this Government at any time within the past 64 years could have satisfied its every obligation involving the gold clause and have been strictly within the Constitution by paying such obligations in any money which was legal, what is the purpose of this bill? Clearly, it accomplishes but one object. It would permit foreign nations to meet their obligations to us, even though they carried the gold clause, in any form of legal money, in depreciated paper currency. This is, indeed, one of the principal objects of the pending legislation.

If we could know the whole truth, it would be disclosed that the President, in his recent conferences with representatives of foreign governments, has made some commitment to those governments which makes it necessary that this bill be introduced.

The pending bill is certainly most welcome to the international bankers. They have flooded this country with foreign obligations, obligations running into the billions and carrying the gold clause. Of course, these bankers now understand that the foreign bonds which they have sold to the American people will never be paid in gold. They, therefore, welcome this legislation as a means of making possible a nominal payment of the bonds in question.

I stated to the House a few days ago that one of the causes which contributed to wrecking the last administration was the insidious influence of the money power. I then stated that there were already indications that this same money power has fixed its talons in the present administration. If the American people need proof of the truth of such a statement, they have it in the pending bill, which accomplishes no other thing as to our own obligations than could have been accomplished under existing law, but which when enacted will relieve foreign debtors of their obligations to pay their debts to us in gold.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEEDY. If I yield to answer the gentleman's question, others will ask to interrupt me, and I have a train of though which I should like to develop without interruption.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman made a statement which raises a real question. It is this. The gentleman just stated that European bondholders knew that these bonds would never be paid in gold. Why should they not anticipate the payment of those bonds in gold if we are able to stay on the gold standard?

Mr. BEEDY. Pardon me, my attention was diverted. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman said that the European bondholders knew that these bonds would never be paid in gold.

Mr. BEEDY. The gentleman misunderstood me. I did not make such a statement. I said that the international bankers who floated these bonds now understand that they cannot be paid in gold even though they carry the gold clause and that they, therefore, welcome and sponsor this legislation because it will help them to clean their own houses.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes more to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, some of the Members defending this bill have said that it will help to restore business confidence. I predict that it will work exactly the contrary result. Let me ask my Democratic colleagues a simple question. Do you know of any merchants in your districts who, in the face of this astounding proposal, and threatened with a possible issue of greenbacks aggregating $3,000,000,000, will go into the market to buy merchandise? Do you know that for some time it has been the policy of merchants to reduce their stocks? The gentleman from Connecticut, our distinguished colleague, Mr. MERRITT, has just told me of a firm in his district which has recently reduced its merchandise on hand by $3,000,000. This concern has thus reduced its force of employed labor and in the face of this legislative proposal, with the threat of evils incident to a policy of cheap paper money, does not dare go into the market as a purchaser.

Such concerns dare not gamble on what may happen tomorrow. Jobbers will not buy of manufacturers. Manufacturers must of necessity sell piecemeal to retailers.

Legislation proposing an abandonment of the gold standard, coupled with power already granted the President to issue cheap paper money, money resting on the unstable base of fluctuating credits and broken faith, is but the harbinger of prolonged hesitancy and an indefinite postponement of business recovery. The country will await assurance of a sound monetary base for our national currency before any genuine business recovery can be realized.

But let me call your attention to an inevitable result of the pending legislation. We are on the eve of an International Economic Conference. The President endorses such a conference. He has led this country to believe, and undoubtedly by premature commitments to foreign representatives, he has led other nations to believe, that international agreements respecting trade and currency can be had, which will rehabilitate the commerce and the currencies of the world.

The pending bill will certainly inspire little confidence in the United States on the part of foreign nations. Why, gentlemen, if this bill becomes a law, I predict the utter loss of any lasting benefits through the coming conference of nations. I ask you, if the present administration succeeds, through the passage of this legislation, in repudiating its solemn obligation to its own people, what reliance will other nations place upon any promises which we make them in the coming conference? Surely a nation which will not keep its promise to its own people will not be expected to keep its promises to aliens.

I confess that events are transpiring which confuse and bewilder me. If the American people receive this proposal of President Roosevelt with the same measure of blind acquiescence with which it is accepted by the Democratic membership of this House, I am at a loss to understand what has become of the American standard of honor in party politics and public life.

During the last campaign President Hoover upon more than one occasion gave the country to understand that if they elected Franklin Roosevelt they would put in power a man who leaned toward a policy of unsound currency. Mr. Roosevelt resented such charges and ridiculed statements that there had been any danger of this country going off the gold standard in the closing days of the Hoover administration. He made light of the possibility of any abandonment of the gold standard by the United States in the near future.

Let it be a matter of record here and now that in his speech in Brooklyn on the night of November 4 last, Franklin Roosevelt made the following statement:

> The business men of the country, battling hard to maintain their financial solvency and integrity, were told in blunt language in Des Moines, Iowa, how close an escape the country had some months ago from going off the gold standard. This, as has been clearly shown since, was a libel on the credit of the United States. No adequate answer has been made to the magnificent philippic of Senator GLASS the other night in which he showed how unsound was this assertion, and, I might add, Senator GLASS made a devastating challenge that no responsible Government would have sold to the country securities payable in gold if it knew that the promise—yes; the covenant embodied in these securities—was as dubious as the President of the United States claims it was.

In this statement, Mr. Roosevelt referred expressly to "the covenant embodied in these securities." The covenant referred to was the pledge of the United States given the American public and the world at large that wherever the promise had been made to pay its securities in gold, that promise would be kept. He upbraided President Hoover for attempting to convince the American people that he, President Roosevelt, or his party, would treat such a covenant as in any sense "dubious." He referred in that speech to the "magnificent philippic of Senator GLASS * * *" in which he showed how unsound was this assertion", namely, the assertion of President Hoover that the country had faced and would continue to face the possible danger of abandoning the gold standard.

In a notable speech delivered on April 27 last by Senator GLASS, of Virginia, who is appalled by the policy of repudiation endorsed by our President and the Democratic Party, he stated that "Franklin D. Roosevelt, now President of the United States," wired him that his speech assuring the people that this country, under Democratic control, would be in no danger of abandoning the gold standard, "was to him an inspiration." But President Roosevelt in his speech of November 4 last went still farther. He not only declared President Hoover's statement a libel upon the credit of the United States, but he declared also in his Brooklyn speech that:

> The President is seeing visions of rubber dollars. This is only a part of his campaign of fear. I am not going to characterize these statements. I merely present the facts. The Democratic platform specifically declares, "We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards." That is plain English. In discussing this platform on July 30 I said, "Sound money is an international necessity, not a domestic consideration for one nation alone." Far up in the Northwest at Butte I repeated the pledge of the platform, saying, "Sound currency must be maintained at all hazards." In Seattle I reaffirmed my attitude on this question. The thing has been said, therefore, in plain English three times in my speeches. It is stated without qualification in the platform, and I have announced my unqualified acceptance of that platform. So much for that misrepresentation.

In the face of these utterances of the President, on the very eve of his election; in the face of his assurance that he had three times repeated his unqualified acceptance of the Democratic platform, namely, that "sound currency must be maintained at all hazards"; in the face of his labeling President Hoover's statement that Franklin D. Roosevelt was inclined to a policy of unsound money as a "misrepresentation," I myself am unable to understand the present position of the President as the leader of his party. By what standard does he judge this solemn assurance of a candidate for the Presidency of the United States? What solemnity or value does he attach to the declaration of his party platform which endorsed a "sound currency"? It will not avail this administration to argue that any money which is declared to be legal tender is in fact sound money. There is but one meaning which has attached to the phrase "sound currency" or "sound money" throughout the entire history of the Republic, namely a currency backed by gold.

When President Roosevelt told the people at Brooklyn that he stood for sound currency, they understood him to mean—and the entire country had the right to understand him as meaning—that he stood for the necessity of maintaining at all hazards a currency based upon the stable foundation of gold. Within 3 months of his induction into office, our President astounds his own country and the civilized world by breaking his own pledge and asking his party to follow him along the dark pathway of broken faith.

The question as to wisdom or even as to the honesty of the pending proposal depends wholly upon our point of view. I come from the State of Maine. Within her rugged borders I was born. According to the beliefs of her people, I was taught that a promise made is a promise to be kept. It is the unfaltering belief in my section of the country that to keep faith is the rule of conduct which should obtain not only among individuals but among nations. It is the belief of my people that mere power to repudiate is not a justifiable ground for evasion. I am proud to represent a State and to claim membership in a party which believes that the path of repudiation is the path of dishonor.

No good can ever come to this country through the violation of its sacred pledges. If the party in control embarks this Nation on the program proposed in this pending resolution, it will have opened the door to an era of unprecedented suspicion, distrust, and lack of confidence. It will have given us "a new deal" in betrayed trusts and broken faiths to the lasting shame of all mankind. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] has again expired.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. My friend, Mr. MCFADDEN, referred a moment ago to the protocols of Zion which have been disproved and repudiated years ago. Mr. MCFADDEN says, "Is not this repudiation bill specifically designed and written by Jewish international money changers themselves in order to perpetuate their power?"

I deny that Jewish international bankers are responsible for this legislation or that there is any foundation for such an accusation.

This resolution is the product of the brain trust, practically all of whom are gentiles. It is just another brain storm of the brain trust. This resolution is repudiation and nothing but repudiation of the grossest character. Are we to become known in the future as the great repudiation Congress, a badge of dishonor and perfidy? It would amount to a dishonest and dishonorable act.

What an astounding recommendation to come from any administration, especially so from a President elected on a sound-money platform and who in his inaugural address advocated sound money, less than 3 months ago. What faith can be placed on the promises and statements of the administration in regard to national and public credit?

For over 60 years this country has been on a gold basis. My Democratic colleagues, let me remind you that Grover Cleveland, the sturdy defender of the gold standard, and Woodrow Wilson would not have been guilty of this perfidy. I wonder what my Democratic colleagues from the State of New York will do? You are already in bad enough by voting for additional income taxes on the lower brackets which affect the small-income taxpayers, the so-called "white-collar class", the small business and professional man, already overburdened with taxation and struggling to keep his head above water, while the people of our State already pay more than one third of the income tax of the United States. How long will they stand it?

The public mind is excited by the disclosures in banking circles, but that is ephemeral, will pass away. National repudiation of its obligations will be a stain and a dishonor for all time to come. Americans have held their heads high and pointed with pride to their national credit and public faith; it was one of our great glories; but now, with a larger gold supply than ever, we resort to repudiation and hang our heads in shame. We own 40 percent of the gold of the world.

Better things might have been expected from a President and a Secretary of the Treasury from the State of New York. It is national dishonor. How can we expect foreign governments to fulfill their obligations to us when we needlessly repudiate ours?

Only a year ago England and France made every endeavor to drive the United States off the gold standard, but thanks to the efforts of the Hoover administration they failed. Now the Roosevelt administration plays their game, possibly with a view to reduce the amounts on the war debts of England and France to us.

Abraham Lincoln, during the Civil War, when the credit of the United States was greatly depreciated, the dollar being worth only 40 cents, insisted on fulfilling its promises, and interest on Government bonds was paid in gold.

Less than 20 years ago the administration of Woodrow Wilson, of which Franklin D. Roosevelt was a part, issued Liberty bonds, redeemable in gold, and which were bought by patriotic men and women to help carry on the war. Until now the interest on these bonds has been paid in gold; today President Roosevelt decrees that these patriotic men and women should be paid in debased currency. [Applause.] Our standard of national credit is about to be lowered before the world, and no longer will be one of our abiding glories.

For years we have resented Uncle Sam being called a "Shylock" by European war debtor nations, even by those which are only called upon to pay back sums less than the amounts loaned after the armistice. Now the debtor nations will call Uncle Sam the repudiator.

Soviet Russia will join in the chorus, and almost by right demand recognition on the ground that one of the main arguments against recognition is the fact that she has repudiated her international debts and cannot be trusted.

The following is a leading editorial from the New York Times, of May 29, 1933, which is self-explanatory:

THE NEW LIBEL

During his Presidential campaign the charge was frequently thrown in Mr. Roosevelt's face that he and his party could not be trusted to maintain a sound currency. It was alleged that the taint of depreciated money was in Democratic blood. Mr. Roosevelt more than once resented and denied this accusation. He did it most fully and explicitly in the speech ending his campaign which he made in Brooklyn on November 4, 1932, just before the Presidential election. He repeated and emphasized the money plank in the Democratic platform: "We advocate a sound currency, to be preserved at all hazards." Then he turned the attack upon Mr. Hoover, asserting that the President was guilty not only of misrepresenting the Democratic position but of preaching a "gospel of fear." There followed this passage, quoted from the verbatim report of Mr. Roosevelt's speech, only 3 days before the election: "The business men of the country, battling hard to maintain their financial solvency and integrity, were told in blunt language in Des Moines, Iowa, how close an escape this country had some months ago from going off the gold standard. But that, my friends, as has been clearly shown since, was a libel on the credit of the United States."

This seems to show that Mr. Roosevelt knows a libel when he sees one—perhaps even when he utters one. But the most interesting part of his Brooklyn speech remains to be cited: "It is worthy of note that no adequate answer has been made to the magnificent philippic of Senator GLASS the other night, in which he showed how unsound this position was. And I might add, Senator GLASS made a devastating challenge that no responsible government would have sold to the country securities payable in gold if it knew that the promise—yes, the covenant—embodied in these securities was as dubious as the President of the United States claims it was."

There is really nothing to be done when words thus conflict with deeds, except to let the words speak for themselves.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, this is the most forward and advanced step taken since Moses called a halt to the worship of the golden calf. Gold as money, as a medium of exchange is a relic of a past and primitive age which has withstood and survived the progress of civilization and advancement before which other handicaps and burdensome customs and usages have yielded or have been overcome.

This Congress found the country staggering, reeling, groaning under the international gold standard, forced upon this and other nations by the manipulating financiers and bankers in their mad, modern craze to double the World War debts and bonds owned and held by them and which standard other nations has already thrown off to save their people from disaster. It is now to relieve this country from these burdens and avert chaos, disorder, and disaster that gold payments were suspended and this resolution is only to declare the status we found and have been compelled to recognize.

This resolution is not in the form of the remedy I have urged and contended for. I have always favored the painless or indirect way of expanding the volume and supply of money and credit and thereby raising values and the price level, which would in turn reduce the comparative value of gold and accomplish the same effect as this resolution without the technical apparent legal objection of impairing the obligations of contract. But all legislation is a compromise, no Member can have anything he wants at the time he wants it nor in the precise form that he may prefer.

But there is no equitable or moral objection. This only restores value and the price level openly and directly which was forced down secretly and indirectly by the contraction and withdrawal of money from circulation. It does not in fact impair the obligation of contract. It only makes the creditor take the dollar which he loaned and prevents him from collecting a dollar calling for many times the value of the one the debtor agreed to pay.

When there was no stable governments to fix, regulate, and guarantee by decree the volume and value of money, gold as one of the precious metals served the useful and double purpose as a medium of exchange with intrinsic value, that is of value within itself. This precious metal served the purpose faithfully and well until more people came to use money, then there was gold for the use as money, and then governments began to fix by decree the volume and supply and the value of money and using other material for money. And today when stable governments, exercising governmental power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, by sovereign mandate and decree, pledging all the property of all the people, and all the services of all the people, and all the earnings and income of all the people, and all the wealth and resources of all the nations, and exerting all the powers of the Army and Navy to make good and vindicate that decree, gold has become a mere commodity for convenience in international exchange. But the money changers to prolong their power have continued gold as redemption money and thereby to maintain their grasp and strangle hold upon money and to control the value and use of money.

The gold standard for redemption is a fiction of money and finance without real or tangible existence and which has been continued and maintained to hold the people under the strain of impossible obligations and contracts. And writhing under the obligations of impossible ordeals to pay gold when there is no gold with which to pay, men, and nations, as well, are coerced to sell their birthright for forbearance, to postpone the impossible obligations and defer the pound of flesh from being torn from their writhing bodies.

While the fetish worship of gold is maintained to fix the standard of money the people and the nations as well have been led and coerced into obligations to pay $100,000,000,000 in gold under contracts, with only $4,000,000,000 in gold with which to pay. One hundred billion dollars in gold demanded with only $4,000,000,000 in gold with which to make compliance, is a bond to exact the remorseless pound of flesh. One hundred billion dollars in gold cannot be paid with only $4,000,000,000 in gold. But by maintaining the impossible obligations the contracts can be renewed with increasing and exacting burdens, and the bond for the pound of flesh is prolonged and continued on in force to coerce the helpless people and defenseless nations. This resolution cuts the binding cords, the fibers of the bands lashing down toil, labor, and human service to the millstone and the crushing weight of cornered monopolized redemption money.

This bill is to release the imperiled debtors from conscienceless contracts providing for the relentless pound of flesh.

We are living in an age of chance, speculation, and gambling. The grain and produce markets and the stock and security markets are controlled and manipulated by speculators and prices and values gambled upon. And all modern banks and banking systems are operated, organized, and conducted upon a chance, speculation, and gambling basis and made subject to all the hazards of speculation and gambling operations. From the very nature of the business conducted, banking attracts a certain class of men, known as "speculating and gambling financiers", who speculate, gamble, and take chances upon the people's money and credit.

Bank dealings and operations are predicated upon a basis and principle of chance, speculation, and gambling per se, from the hazards and uncertainties of which depositors must be safeguarded by double liability of stockholders and by insurance of their deposits. For every $100 cash assets banks are allowed to loan $1,000; loan $900 they do not have in the bank and draw interest on $900 they do not own, and take a chance that deposits or money will be paid in or all will not be checked out at one time. This is one of the speculating and gambling operations, one of the hazards and uncertainties increasing the liability of stockholders, jeopardizing the savings deposits, and creating a doubt in the public mind.

But there is another class of bankers, of speculating, gambling financiers, who not only gamble upon private deposits, make loans and loan money without money to loan, and who manifest cannibal characteristics, first devouring their weaker fellow bankers and then in turn eating up and devouring each other. And there is still another class of bankers known as international financiers and manipulating bankers, who prey upon and take from the public and make nations their victims as well. These speculating, gambling financiers control the money systems of the nations as they control our own Federal Reserve System, the great fountainhead of money and credit. They are shrewd, crafty, and resourceful. They know the laws of money and of financial credit operations. They know how, when, and where to act to increase, double, and multiply the value of their money, bonds, and property.

In their speculating, gambling maneuvers, they secretly manipulate the money standards. They expand the volume of money and credit. They contract and withdraw from circulation the volume and supply of money of a country, force down the price level and the wage scale and thereby take millions from the people. They make kings their puppet rulers through whom to enforce their systems upon the people. They lead Presidents unwittingly to name their tools for Cabinet positions, to parade in the cloak of public office. Already in control of the Federal Reserve Board, they seek only the portfolio of the Secretary of the Treasury to make their power absolute and complete, to take and exact from the people their earnings and income, their substance and all.

But the administration of the currency has become even more vital today than the enactment of currency legislation. No matter what Congress may do nor what action may be taken here for relief, the Secretary of the Treasury, in cooperation with the Federal Reserve Board, now dominated, directed, and controlled by international financiers and bankers, can neutralize, defeat, or nullify any measures Congress may enact or any orders that the President can make to provide relief.

Now, I am not speaking of men as individuals nor of them as tools and puppets in a personal way. Their conscience and their conceptions of right or wrong, of justice and injustice to their fellow man is the creature of their education and associations, of their surroundings or the environment in life. I only speak of them in their public relations, of the public and political systems which they represent and enforce upon governments and men, and under, by, and through which they take and exact from the people their earnings, substance, and property—the fruits of their toil and labor.

I do not impugn the honor or motives as men are measured today, following the laws of selfish human nature, the honor or motives of Mellon, Morgan, Glass, or Woodin. But they are the financial rulers, the power behind many thrones, or the servient, obedient tools who are taking more tribute from the people today than ever conquering kings and monarchs exacted from their vanquished subjects in the days of conquest and subjugation of old. Mellon, a monopolizing financier and banker was unwittingly placed in control of public finance as Secretary of the Treasury under the Coolidge and Hoover administrations to levy and exact toll and tribute under the secret power of money. GLASS has long worn the cloak of public office, posing as a servant of the people. When offered the portfolio of the Treasury, he declined in favor of Mr. Woodin, now exposed as a favored patron of Morgan.

For 12 long years the farmers have plead and prayed to the Pharaoh of finance and money of the Coolidge and Hoover administrations for relief from their bondage of debt, but they remained hard-hearted and would not let the people go. Now comes the Moses, Franklin D. Roosevelt, leading the people out of bondage, only unwittingly to surrender them again over to the same financial interest and power which has held them to make brick without straw. The people are to be congratulated by the forced abdication of Mellon as Secretary of the Treasury, by the verdict of the people at the polls. They are further to be congratulated by the providential declination of Glass as Secretary of the Treasury. And they could be still further congratulated and the Roosevelt administration relieved of embarrassment by the graceful resignation of Woodin, now acting as Secretary of the Treasury.

Woodin as a favored beneficiary of the international financiers and bankers has been revealed by the Morgan administration. There is only one course for him to pursue. He should tender his prompt resignation and relieve Roosevelt of the embarrassment and allow him to hold the confidence he has won and justly deserved and by which he is now holding the poise and balance of the waivering mind facing a great national crisis.

The Republican Members of this Congress, who defended and supported Mellon in office, or failed to ask for his resignation while he ruled as czar of the Treasury under the Coolidge and Hoover administrations, and now calling for Woodin to resign, are partisan tricksters and frauds upon the people, and neither truth nor consistency is in them. And the Democratic Members of Congress who censured and condemned Coolidge and Hoover for appointing and keeping Mellon in office and now fail to demand the immediate resignation of Woodin are placing themselves on the same inconsistent basis and level with the Republicans of whom they have complained.

President Roosevelt has been enjoying great and unprecedented popularity and deserving the explicit confidence of the people of the country, regardless of party. And his administration and course in office have inspired the country with faith and assuring hope of the promised change and new deal. But unless his administration is relieved from this intrusion and embarrassment of the international financiers and bankers, the magic spell of confidence will be broken, as it was broken in the Hoover administration by the domination of Mellon and Mills.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one half minute to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss].

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on Public Act No. 2, and to insert certain tables and a short excerpt from a letter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope this Congress does not adjourn without first rectifying some of the injustices that will occur under the provisions of Public Law No. 2.

The existing regulations under Public Law No. 2 ought to be modified. In the independent offices appropriation bill, which has passed the House and is today pending in the Senate, $103,786,000 has been allotted to World War veterans, and, of this sum $64,902,000 is scheduled to be used for pensions for the combat wounded and the remainder for emergency officers' retirement pay, death compensation, and the comparatively few cases of disability allowance. It is my understanding the Veterans' Administration has ordered all cases of disabled veterans, whose cases are presumed to have been incurred during the war, off the rolls. Still unable to come within the amount fixed, the Veterans' Administration has revised its rating charts, and is now cutting the pensions of the combat wounded.

Daily, I am receiving communications from veterans of the Spanish-American War, and veterans of the World War, which are actually heart-rending. Let me quote you a few paragraphs from one of the leaders of the Spanish War veterans in my State, when he says:

> The passage of the economy bill and the drastic reductions, being made by the Veterans' Administration, are far beyond anything that was expected. Terrible is too mild a way to express my opinion of the action being taken. It is hard to look my fellow comrades in the face and tell them "All we can do is hope for the best." It is a heart-breaking situation and is causing much uneasiness, it is driving some to suicide, others are worrying themselves sick, but they grumble not! They hope for relief from you men in Washington.
> My comrades are asking: "What will become of me?" "Shall I lose my home?" "Will I go to the poorhouse?" "Where shall I go when sick?" "Shall my wife and I become paupers?" These, and similar questions are asked of me and I would like to answer them by saying, "Our representatives in Washington will see that we are treated right."

The Spanish War veterans are all nearing or past the age of 60. Many of these have no income other than their pensions. Many of them will be thrown on their cities and States for aid. It seems to me a reduction in their pensions, rather than taking many of them off the rolls entirely, would be a more just way of handling many of these cases.

In order that you may have something definite to peruse, in order that you will understand some of the drastic cuts caused by the new regulations, I set forth below a table. The extent of the reductions being made will be indicated by a comparison of some of the ratings assigned for the same conditions in the schedule of 1925, based upon the World War Veterans Act, and in the schedule of 1933, based upon Public, No. 2.

	Monetary benefits	Percent reduction in monetary benefits
Disarticulation of arm:
Schedule of 1925, p. 48	Right arm, 94 percent, $94.
Amputation of hand:
Schedule of 1925, p. 48	Right hand, 70 percent, $70.
Do	Left hand, 61 percent, $61.	Right hand, 42 percent.
Amputation of first finger (thumb):
Schedule of 1925, p. 49	Right, 25 percent, $25
Disarticulation of thigh:
Schedule of 1925, p. 50	Right, 85 percent, $85	29 percent.
Do	Left, 85 percent, $85
Schedule of 1933, p. 16	Right or left, 75 percent, $60.
Amputation of thigh at knee joint:
Schedule of 1925, p. 50	58 percent, $58	31 percent.
Schedule of 1933, p. 16	50 percent, $40
Amputation of foot:
Schedule of 1925	44 percent, $44	54 percent.
Schedule of 1933	25 percent, $20
SCARS AND MUSCLE INJURIES FROM GUNSHOT WOUNDS
Group V, arm, right, severe disability:
Schedule of 1925, extension 5	30 percent, $30	33 percent.
Schedule of 1933	25 percent, $20
Group VII, forearm, left, severe disability:
Schedule of 1925, extension 5	20 percent, $20	60 percent.
Schedule of 1933	10 percent, $8
Group XI, leg, severe disability of calf muscle:
Schedule of 1925, extension 5	20 percent, $20	60 percent.
Schedule of 1933	10 percent, $8
Group XIII, disability of thigh muscles, moderate:
Schedule of 1925, extension 5	15 percent, $15	46 percent.
Schedule of 1933	10 percent, $8
Group XIII, severe disability of thigh muscles:
Schedule of 1925, extension 5	30 percent, $30	33 percent.
Schedule of 1933	25 percent, $20

The following is typical of the manner in which the application of Public, No. 2, reduces the disability evalution in the case of other diseases:

	Monetary benefit	Percent reduction in monetary benefits
Neurasthenia moderate:
1925 schedule	25 percent, $25	68 percent.
1933 schedule	10 percent, $8
Bronchitis chronic moderate:
1925 schedule	10 percent to 20 percent, $10 to $20.	20 percent to 60 percent
1933 schedule	10 percent, $8
Loss of hearing complete in 1 ear:
1925 schedule	30 percent, $30	73 percent.
1933 schedule	10 percent, $8
Loss of 1 kidney:
Schedule of 1925	40 percent, $40	50 percent.
Schedule of 1933	25 percent, $20

The method prescribed in the schedule of 1933, on page 7, for combining two disability ratings operates less favorably for the veteran than the method provided in the schedule of 1925, on page 124.

Two ratings of 10 percent each combine to 19 percent under the 1925 schedule, but only to 10 percent under the 1933 schedule.

Thirty percent and 10 percent combine to 37 percent under the 1925 schedule, and to 25 percent under the 1933 schedule.

The provision in section 17 of Public, No. 2, requiring the completion of the review of all cases where benefits have been awarded under prior laws by July 1, 1933, should be amended by substituting a later date, at least January 1, 1934, for July 1, 1933. This action will permit the Veterans' Administration to give to each case reviewed the careful consideration it deserves. The present limit of July 1, 1933, is the cause of too hasty review and rerating in thousands of cases.

The Veterans' Administration, in the review under Public, No. 2, has broken service connection in thousands of cases where the direct service connection of the veteran's disability has been affirmed by several prior decisions. This action is due in part to a too hasty review. It is also largely due to a narrow interpretation of the last paragraph of section 17 of Public, No. 2, which was inserted to protect direct service connection. It is suggested that this paragraph be supplemented by a clause providing that direct service connection for a veteran's disability previously granted shall be presumed correct unless the contrary is clearly and affirmatively shown.

It is most important that regulations be submitted which will permit a more liberal presumption of service connection for chronic diseases. The list of diseases which can be presumptively connected when shown to exist within 1 year from discharge is entirely inadequate. There is no reason why such chronic diseases as bronchitis, bronchial asthma, otitis media, and so forth, should not be allowed this presumption, as well as the functional nervous conditions.

Needless to say, the present provisions for the service connection of the unfortunate neuropsychiatric and tubercular cases are positively inhuman, and unless greatly modified they are certainly going to work an undue hardship and cause unwarranted suffering on the part of men who in time of war were promised that they would be adequately provided for to repay their suffering in their country's behalf.

One more item: Under Public, No. 2, after 10 years of arrest, the tubercular veteran is no longer entitled to any monetary benefits whatever. This is decidedly unfair. This type of veteran is one who must take the greatest care of himself, in order to prevent reactivation of his condition. He needs what little pension he has received to provide for that extra care, and a statutory award for such cases should certainly be provided.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have been in this House 10 years, and today is the first time I ever heard an attack here made on any racial group. I very much regret that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, with whom I have stood on several important votes, has seen fit today to inject a little Hitlerism in this House. We do not want it here.

He stated that the international Jewish bankers were anxious for the bill, with the consequence that the holders of Liberty bonds would not be paid in proper currency and that bonus certificates would not be properly paid,

I may say to the gentleman that I saw the boys from New York go to the war, boys from the East Side of New York, boys from Brownsville, Brooklyn, all from Jewish mothers and fathers. They went bravely forth to war just as the other boys from New York. Some of these boys also are the holders of bonus certificates.

In my own immediate neighborhood there is a large Jewish club, the Unity Club. When subscriptions were being taken for Liberty bonds there was not an organization in New York City that excelled the Unity Club in the amount of its contributions toward the war through the purchase of Liberty bonds.

So I think the gentleman's remarks reflecting upon this great race were entirely uncalled for in this debate. There are no finer specimens of American manhood, nor of better American intelligence, than those distinguished members of the supreme bench—Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Cardozo of my State.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman probably failed to recall Judah Benjamin, who helped finance one of our wars.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; Judah Benjamin financed the Revolution. I regret the gentleman from Pennsylvania has gone as far as he has. Frankly, I am worried about him. In view of the situation I suggest that when he has a little time he have a conference with a Jewish psychologist. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I am sure the gentleman from New York did not mean the Revolutionary War.

Mr. BLACK. I meant the Civil War.

Mr. FISH. I know the gentleman from New York always likes to be accurate in his facts.

Mr. BLACK. I always did care more for revolutions than for civil wars anyway.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PARSONS].

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, this Congress seeks to take a step by the adoption of this resolution which, in my judgment, is the most significant and far-reaching in its beneficial results to the vast majority of our citizenry that has been advocated on this floor in the last 60 years.

I shall not have time in the few minutes allotted to me to say much about the money question—perhaps enough time to say all I know about it, and from the debate I have listened to today, enough time for those I have heard, for them to tell all they know about it. The money question is a simple one when the facts are known. Yet there has been such mysterious speculation and manipulation of the thing we call money, that the public generally thinks it is something beyond their comprehension, and in the past have given the subject little study and attention. While my time is limited, I shall ask to extend my remarks, in which I shall try to develop a few facts with reference to our monetary system. I sought to interrupt the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] to ask a few questions and elicit from him some thoughts pertinent to this resolution, but time did not permit his yielding. The gentleman is an eloquent speaker, and I admire his style of expression. It is an easy matter to cover up a question at issue with fine, eloquent verbiage and never hit the spot.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY] seemed deeply concerned with reference to gentlemen engaging in debate raising the class issue. There is no disposition on my part to array one class against another or create any class or racial prejudice whatsoever. If there is any one thing that will quickly and permanently destroy America, it is class, racial, and religious intolerance. Prior to the twentieth century there was scarcely any class consciouness in America. During and since the World War there has developed a class consciousness, and it grew out of the special benefits and privileges conferred by legislation and Government upon certain classes of our citizens, the class which seemingly the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from Massachusetts seek to protect and defend. It is partly to undo the wrong which special legislation and privilege conferred upon one class that this legislation seeks to accomplish, by placing every man, woman, and child, rich and poor, high and low, upon a common level, so far as our monetary system is concerned.

The gentleman from Maine just made the statement that "we are off of the gold standard." I do not know what the gold standard means, and I doubt if very many of our people know. The only thing I have been able to find which might establish a standard is in the act of March 14, 1900, which declares that the dollar, consisting of 25.8 grains of gold 0.9 fine, "shall be the standard unit of value", and makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain at a parity of value with this standard all forms of money issued or coined by the United States. The Federal Reserve Act of December 23, 1913, reaffirmed such parity and authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow or buy gold in order to maintain such parity. If this is the gold standard (I find nothing else in the statutes other than this to define it), I desire to state that when this resolution is passed, we shall not have disturbed that parity so far as the standard unit of value is concerned.

All of the coin and currency outstanding today, and all of the currency that may hereafter be issued under existing law, even after the passage of this resolution, will be measured by the standard unit of value which is in effect at the present moment. Unless and until the President shall, by the right of law given him in the act of May 13, 1933, reduce the number of grains in a gold dollar, there is absolutely no destruction of the unit of value and no debasement of our currency or specie money. All our money is to be legal tender under the provisions of this resolution, for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties, and dues, so that by the sacredness of law under the provisions of the Constitution, giving Congress the right to coin and issue money and regulate the value thereof, equivalent value is given to every medium of exchange issued by this Government. It does not take this country off the gold standard, any more than we are off today.

I wish I had time to develop briefly the history of our monetary system. It is utterly impossible to do so at this time. Permit me to say that the first monetary unit of value was adopted in 1786 by the Congress of the Confederation which was the silver dollar 375.64 grains of pure silver. It was never coined because there was no mint in the United States at that time. The act of April 2, 1792, established the first monetary system of the United States. The bases of the system were: The gold dollar containing 24.75 grains of pure gold and the silver dollar containing 371.25 grains of pure silver. A mint was established. The coinage was unlimited and the ratio of silver to gold in coinage was 15 to 1. It was a double standard consisting of both gold and silver. The act of 1792 undervalued gold which was therefore exported. It is a universal law that the undervalued metal will invariably be exported and so the act of June 28, 1834, was passed to maintain the parity ratio between the two metals of 16.002 to 1. This act fixed the weight of the gold dollar at 25.8 grains. The fine weight of the gold dollar was thus reduced to 25.2 grains. The act of 1834 undervalued silver the same as that of 1792 had undervalued gold, and silver was exported. Congress, by act of January 18, 1837, fixed the weight of the gold dollar at 25.8 grains and its fine weight at 23.22 grains where it remains today.

The first paper money ever issued by the Government of the United States was authorized by acts of July 17 and August 5, 1861, which was for the purpose of defraying the cost of the Civil War. The paper notes issued were called "demand notes" and were receivable for all public dues. Fifty million dollars' worth was issued. The demand notes were redeemed in gold when presented, and this, together with being receivable for all public dues, was the quality that prevented their depreciation. The Government had difficulty in raising funds to finance the Civil War and therefore relied upon larger issues of United States notes. However, the Congress was persuaded into writing an "exception clause" in the redemption of notes. They were made legal tender for all debts, both public and private, "except duties on imports and interest on the public debt." The very fact this exception was made in the redemption contract was responsible for their depreciation. This resolution, when adopted, will equalize the value of every piece of currency issued by the Federal Government. There will no longer be discrimination of one piece of currency against another, and no longer any opportunity given to the banking group or a few financial investors to corner a large part of our money and reap huge profits by depreciated currencies at the expense of the producer, both in products and services, of this Nation. We had a sample of this under Grant's administration when Gould and Fiske exacted their pound of flesh on Black Friday. The gentlemen who have spoken so vociferously in favor of the group represented by such men as Gould and Fiske are too well acquainted with the facts in this case to require further explanation.

Heretofore we have two terms denoting the quality of money. "Lawful money" is a term used to denote the legal-tender quality of money and first originated in the act of February 25, 1862, authorizing the issue of United States notes. This act was the first shameful deed of Congress in the Civil War period. There never should have been a reference to or the term of "lawful money" used in statutory acts. Every piece of money issued by authority of Congress under the Constitution should have been "legal tender." In many respects "lawful money" and "legal tender" are synonymous terms and were and would have been always accepted so if it had not been for the exception clause written into the redemption of greenbacks in 1862.

"Legal tender" is a quality given a circulating medium by Congress and the Secretary of the Treasury is required to maintain the parity of all kinds of money with the standard unit of value. Heretofore all forms of our money do not possess full legal-tender qualities, and in times of emergency may depreciate and appreciate according to manipulation of the financial group who creates the lack of confidence in one kind of money as against the overabundant confidence in another kind of money. It is the sacred duty of Congress under the Constitution to coin and issue money and regulate the value thereof so as to prevent any discrimination, depreciation, or appreciation in different kinds of money. The adoption of this resolution will henceforth, now and forever establish that parity. No doubt there will be a change in the plate on which currency hereafter is printed, and on the face of every bill, whether it be Federal Reserve bank, Federal Reserve notes, national-bank notes, greenbacks, gold certificates, or whatnot, will be printed a redemption clause as follows:

> Legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties, and dues.

So much for the question of currency.

After the issue of United States notes during the Civil War to the extent of more than $450,000,000 and due to the exception clause mentioned heretofore, "greenbacks" depreciated in value to as low in some places as 65 cents on the dollar. Congress sought to correct that evil by bringing "greenbacks" to par. It was a perfectly natural thing for Congress to write this clause into the act of March 18, 1869:

> That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, etc., * * * it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all of the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes.

Had Congress not made the exception of refusing greenbacks in payment of imports and interest on the public debt in the first place, that currency would have always remained at par and the act of March 18, 1869, would never have been necessary. But the financial group who got its hand on the throat of the Government during the dark days of the Republic from 1862 to 1865 again persuaded Congress to do its second shameful act in legislating on the money question. In addition to redeeming non-interest-bearing obligations of the Government in coin or its equivalent, the following was also included in that act with reference to interest-bearing obligations:

> It is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all of the interest-bearing obligations of the United States.

For the first time in the history of this Republic, bonds and interest-bearing obligations of the Federal Government were made payable in gold coin together with the interest. Every bond issued since that time has carried the same clause, which was augmented later with the standard of weight and fineness of the gold dollar 23.22 fine gold. At the time this clause was written into bond contracts of this Government, there were less than $179,000,000 in gold in the Treasury of the United States and we had outstanding indebtedness against the Federal Government of $2,500,000,000.

Let us see what has been the practical operation of gold contracts, in not only United States Government interest-bearing obligations, but bonds issued by political subdivisions of Government and private bonds and contracts such as corporations and private banking institutions. Whenever "A" purchased a $1,000 Government bond, he either transferred bank credit or deposit of $1,000 through banking institutions to the credit of the United States Government and received in exchange the bond. This bank credit, or deposit, was represented either in coin or generally currency, or it may have been by check against such deposit. The same thing is true when individuals or corporations purchase bonds of any political subdivision of Government. Gold is never surrendered to the Government in return for bonds. Neither is gold paid by Government to redeem bonds as a matter of custom. The purchaser of bonds pays for them in currency or bank deposit of credit. The Government redeems them by the same operation. The same thing is true when an individual purchases gold bonds of a railway, utility, or other corporations.

The transaction is never made in gold. It is as impossible to pay for all bonds with gold as it is for the Government to retire all its interest-bearing obligations with gold. Why should any individual or unit of Government be obligated to redeem an obligation with gold when it received only credit or currency or perhaps a bank draft or check when the obligation was first issued? In other words, the holder of a bond is exacting of the mortgagor a different kind of money or thing or element than that which he paid for the bond. It would be just as reasonable in principle to require the Government to redeem an obligation in platinum or radium as it is to redeem it in gold. The only difference is that gold is more plentiful than either of the other materials. Gold is considered as one kind of our money, but so far as the principle of redemption is concerned, the transaction is the same.

The only times that the United States ever received gold in return for its bonds was under the act of March 3, 1865, and continuing until May 1, 1869. The total amount purchased was $323,253,800. The net cost in currency for the gold was $362,981,483. The gold acquired under this act was used for the purpose of redeeming short-term obligations and "greenbacks." Again under the resumption act approved January 14, 1875, Congress directed the Secretary of the Treasury to provide for the redemption of United States notes on and after January 1, 1879, and authorized him to use surplus revenues and to sell and dispose of from time to time, for not less than par, in coin, bonds for the purpose of acquiring gold to establish a redemption fund, which, under the act of July 12, 1882, was set by Congress at $100,000,000. The act of March 14, 1900, increased the reserve fund to $150,000,000, which, with some additions to date, constitutes the gold bullion behind outstanding United States notes or "greenbacks."

The only other instance of where the Federal Government received gold coin for bonds was during Cleveland's administration, when the gold requirement against greenbacks fell below the minimum reserve during the panic of 1893–95. All told, $262,315,400 bonds were sold for which gold was received, making a total of $1,753,661,350 of bonds issued in 150 years for which the Government received gold. You will readily see that this amount is so small in comparison with the total bond issues floated by the Federal Government before and since the Civil War that it can scarcely be counted as a major transaction in gold.

So far as I have been able to find, gold has never been furnished to corporations, utilities, or political subdivisions of Government for bonds. Again I ask why should any individual or unit of government be called upon to redeem its interest-bearing obligations in gold, or even pay the interest in gold, when the original transaction was made with currency or bank credit? If the gentlemen who are so solicitous in behalf of the money changers call this resolution a betrayal of trust and repudiation of pledge, what kind of a name can they assign to the act that obligated their Government and the taxpayers of our country to pay gold on obligations for which nothing but currency was ever received. Their argument falls to the floor when you consider the actual physical transactions involved.

In the first place, what does wealth or capital consist of? It represents labor, performed by the individual who owns the wealth or labor that was performed by someone else, but which through our complex system of industry, commerce, and Government, accrues to someone other than the laborer. Capital should earn a reasonable rate on its investment, but it is not entitled to earn a rate equal to or in excess of the same amount earned by human labor with the same expenditure of energy. Certainly the moneychangers have no right to exact from the toil of the masses a rate of interest and a principle of bond in a kind of money different from that which is paid to labor. I admit this fundamental principle has been disobeyed since the dawn of the Christian era. Disobedience to this principle, which is as eternal as the law of nature itself, is responsible for conditions throughout our history, such as we find ourselves in today. It has resulted in the concentration of wealth. It has destroyed the moral responsibility and integrity of money lenders since even before Christ drove them out of the temple. It has wrought misery to untold millions. It is indirectly responsible for the wars of conquest, calling for the sacrifice of millions of lives and the destruction of billions of dollars in property. I lay down this fundamental principle today: That unless and until we prohibit by law and enforce this principle with moral support, we cannot hope to alleviate future calamities such as this through which we are now passing. This resolution, my colleagues, levels the classes of money. It is the leaven that will give honest and instant revival of business. It assures henceforth, now and in the future, that a dollar is a dollar—legal tender, if you please, for all debts, public and private, of every kind and nature. We are getting back to the Constitution which Washington and Jefferson and Madison and Hamilton subscribed to. We are coming back to the fundamental financial foundation of the Republic. Far be it from this act to array class against class. It is the first step in the leveling of all the classes.

From my earliest recollection I listened to and later read of the fight that champion of Democracy made for the rights of the people on the money question. There were some things in his philosophy with which in later days I have been unable to agree. But if he could rise this afternoon out here on the sunny slopes of Arlington, and come to this Chamber and survey the scene that is being enacted here today, his heart would be filled with joy at the triumph of some of his principles. It is fitting in closing, to quote the last sentence of an eloquent speech of the Great Commoner, William Jennings Bryan, on this occasion. When this resolution is passed by both Houses and approved by that undefeatable leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt, we will have said, not to one class, but to every class, "Thou shalt not press down upon labor this crown of thorns; thou shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold."

> This is the day I long have sought,
> And mourned because I found it not.

[Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I have been hoping for 40 years to have a resolution of this character adopted by the Congress of the United States.

The gold-repeal resolution is a second declaration of independence for the American people. When Thomas Jefferson wrote in his immortal document that all men are created free and equal, he did not mean that all men are equal in wealth or power, in wisdom or knowledge, in stature or strength, but that every man under the American flag, rich or poor, white or black, should stand equal before the law.

And so under this gold resolution the Congress does not proclaim that all money is constituted alike, but when our great Government puts its stamp upon its medium of exchange and declares it money, whether gold, silver, or currency, whether yellow money, white money, or green money, it shall all stand equal before the law. Equal at the door of the Federal Treasury, equal over every bank counter, equal in value and power to debtor and creditor alike.

Every American dollar henceforth shall have the power to discharge the debtor from his bond, and that is the power in this resolution that sets us free, governments and private citizens alike. Today every debtor is under a great and unfair disadvantage because the creditor may contract to demand payment in the money of his choice. Mortgages and bonds are outstanding today to the amount of more than 100 billions which are payable in gold. There is less than five billions of gold in the Republic that can possibly be used to discharge this bonded debt.

The privilege of the creditor to demand gold alone in payment of his bond at once reduces enormously the volume of money available for the settlement of both public and private debts. Gold is always a coward in times of financial stress and storm. Gold is the yellow metal, and for that reason yellow is the recognized livery and color of the coward.

When financial danger threatens, when national and private credit is at stake, gold hides itself away. It burrows in the ground. It hides in vaults and safes. It gets behind bolts and bars. The honest silver dollar and the credit currency of the country have been compelled to fight an unfair battle because not given equal standing with gold under our laws.

For the first time in 50 years or more every American dollar will serve both creditor and debtor alike. Money will become the servant of all the American people, and not make masters of some and slaves of those who are bound to pay in money of a certain kind.

The enactment of this resolution will restore once more equality of opportunity to all who are so fortunate as to live under our flag and enjoy the liberty for which it stands.

H.R. 3516, introduced by me on March 15, 1933, in the House of Representatives reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proportionate value of silver to gold in all coins which are current as money within the United States shall be as 16 to 1; that is to say, every 16 pounds weight of pure silver when coined into dollars shall be of equal value in all payments with 1 pound of pure gold, and so in proportion as to any greater or lesser quantities of the respective metals.

SEC. 2. There shall be free coinage of both gold and silver, at the ratio fixed in this act, subject to the conditions and limitations now provided by law with respect to the coinage of gold; and all the laws of the United States relating to such coinage or to recoinage, exchange, or conversion of coin, bars, or bullion of gold, shall apply equally, so far as practicable, to silver.

SEC. 3. The dollar shall consist of 25⅘ grains of gold nine-tenths fine, or 412½ grains of silver nine-tenths fine, and shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity.

SEC. 4. Gold and silver dollars of the standard weight and fineness provided in this act shall be legal tender for the payment of all debts, both public and private, and the United States Treasury may pay the obligations of the Federal Government in either standard gold or silver dollars at its option.

The provisions of the gold resolution, now before the House, provide that all coins and currencies of the United States shall be legal tender, as is provided in section 4 of my bill for gold and silver alike.

The essential provisions of the gold resolution follow below:

Resolved, etc., That (a) every provision contained in or made with respect to any obligation which purports to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency, or in amount in money of the United States measured thereby, is declared to be against public policy, and no such provision shall be contained in or made with respect to any obligation hereafter incurred. Every obligation heretofore or hereafter incurred, whether or not any such provision is contained therein or made with respect thereto, shall be discharged upon payment, dollar for dollar, in any coin or currency which at the time of payment is legal tender for public and private debts. Any such provision contained in any law authorizing obligations to be issued by or under authority of the United States is hereby repealed, but the repeal of any such provision shall not invalidate any other provision or authority contained in such law.

(b) As used in this resolution, the term "obligation" means an obligation (including every obligation of and to the United States excepting currency) payable in money of the United States; and the term "coin or currency" means coin or currency of the United States, including Federal Reserve notes and circulating notes of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations.

SEC. 2. The last sentence of paragraph (1) of subsection (b) of section 43 of the act entitled "An act to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, to raise revenue for extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of such emergency, to provide emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes", approved May 12, 1933, is amended to read as follows:

"All coins and currencies of the United States (including Federal Reserve notes and circulating notes of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations) heretofore or hereafter coined or issued, shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties, and dues, except that gold coins when below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece shall be legal tender only at valuation in proportion to their actual weight."

After fighting for 40 years to have all United States money declared legal tender and to give equal rights under the law to either gold, silver, or currency, it surely is a great privilege to have a part in making this great principle of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none" the cornerstone of our monetary system. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time at my command to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK].

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, there is little, if anything, that can be added to the eloquent and moving argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] in opposition to this proposed law. Certainly I could add nothing to it, and if I attempt in less adequate phrases to emphasize one or two of the arguments to which he gave expression, it will simply gild refined gold.

Let us consider the policy of this bill concretely. On April 23 last the Secretary of the Treasury invited subscriptions for $500,000,000 of bonds, and in the invitation to people to subscribe he made the following solemn promise:

That the principal and interest of the notes will be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value.

About a week ago the President of the United States signed the so-called "Federal securities bill", designed to promote a greater standard of honesty in the business life of our country. In the little ceremonial that surrounded the signing the President said in substance that all he was trying to do was to translate the ordinary principles of morality into the language of law.

That was an inspiring statement to make, and it suggests the goal of all civilized nations to make their laws fairly expressive of the eternal truths of morality.

But we are now confronted with the fact that 2 months ago we asked the people of this country to subscribe to $500,000,000 of bonds on a specific statement to pay them in gold; and now that promise is to be repudiated, and the bonds which we thus issued are to be payable in paper or some medium of less value than gold.

If the promise was so soon to be done for, why was it ever begun for? Should a great nation thus "falter" with its creditors in a "double sense"?

I shall not base my opposition to this policy of repudiation upon any suggested want of constitutional power. Until the Legal Tender cases, decided some 63 years ago, I would have confidently asserted that the Constitution, which wrote into the organic law an express prohibition of any repudiation of the debts of the Confederation, could not have intended to authorize the new Federal Government, which they were creating, to repudiate the debts. Such was the accepted view until the Supreme Court reversed itself in the second Legal Tender case. In the first of the Legal Tender cases the Court affirmed the view that had prevailed since the beginning of the Republic and held that Congress had no such power to compel creditors to take depreciated paper money in payment of an obligation to deliver gold. But in the second Legal Tender case the Court, as it seems to me, did rule that it was a part of the sovereign power of the Nation at any time to change the character and value of the currency, and that anyone who loaned money must necessarily do so with the understanding that he made the loan subject to the sovereign power of the United States to reduce the obligation by depreciating the value of currency. Therefore, I make no point—and I see my friend, the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, is smiling—that Congress is not competent to pass this legislation.

But does the discussion end there? Oh, no! Mr. Chairman, there is a constitution that is older than the Constitution of 1787. There is a constitution that has greater sanctity than the Constitution of 1787, and that constitution is the one handed down from Mount Sinai, even clearer and more brief than the Constitution of the United States; and one of its great limitations upon human action was the statement in four words: "Thou shalt not steal." To provide as to preexisting debts that a man can be obliged to take paper money when he contracted that his obligation should be paid in gold, is just as much a theft pro tanto as it would be for the United States to say that when diamonds were the subject of merchandise, the man who sold diamonds could deliver in common pebbles from the seashore instead of the scintillating gems simply because Congress by its fiat declared pebbles to be the equivalent of diamonds.

In this discussion I care little about the legalistic features of the legislation, but I want to dwell very briefly upon what I regard as one of the great ponderables, and then the great imponderable. A great ponderable of this question is this: If there be one question that the majority of this House would not subserviently follow the President, it would be, I believe, in the matter of the cancelation of debts owing us by European nations. I believe that if the President sent down a message tomorrow and asked us to sponge out the obligations that other countries gave to us and we loaned to them in the utmost good faith, it would meet with defeat and it would be the first revolt of the majority against the dictates of the White House. If you will allow me to say it in all good humor, you of the majority hitherto have followed the dulcet music of the White House flute as the little children of Hamelin followed the Pied Piper, only to find that the Pied Piper led them to a rocky wall, into which they disappeared forever, and, as I esteem you gentlemen of the majority highly, I hope such will not be your fate.

Mr. TERRELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. Not now.

Mr. TERRELL. Will the gentleman yield before he gets through?

Mr. BECK. Yes. You know Richard Brinsley Sheridan in the Critic said that when they agreed upon the stage then unanimity was wonderful, and the unanimity of the majority of this House to accept any mandate from the White House has never been surpassed in any Congress since the beginning of the Republic. But you would, I imagine, gag at cancelation of the foreign debts. Let me warn you that you are canceling the debts in fact, for the reason that the one nation that has not repudiated its obligation to us, the one nation that values its word of honor above every other consideration—I mean Great Britain, the nation that only last December at a time of acute distress nevertheless paid us $90,000,000 in gold in an interest payment—that nation will now say, I venture to predict, and again I may be a Cassandra—when the next June payment comes due, that as the United States has now said to all the world that obligations are only "scraps of paper", and that a sovereign nation may default at will without violation of morality, Great Britain will not pay the interest any more than France. The villainy we teach them they will execute, and it will go hard; but they will better our instructions, for we now propose to give to all these nations abundant excuse for refusing to pay their debts, because you now propose to say that a debt is not a solemn obligation, that a debt is a thing that can be whittled away by paying it in a depreciated currency.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. To call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the definition of "obligation" in this bill is a debt due to and from the United States.

Mr. BECK. Yes; quite so. Gentlemen, there is another consideration far more important. We can survive the failure of these European nations to pay us what they owe us. But there is one thing that we might not conceivably survive, and that is the destruction of our good name. You remember that I said that the last solicitation of a bond offering was on April 23, last, and that happened to be the natal anniversary of the greatest poet the world has ever known. That poet said something as applicable to nations as to individuals, and peculiarly applicable to the United States as it meditates this gigantic act of repudiation. He said:

> Good name, in man and woman, dear my lord,
> Is the immediate jewel of their souls:
> Who steals my purse steals trash; 'tis something, nothing;
> 'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
> But he that filches from me my good name
> Robs me of that which not enriches him
> And makes me poor indeed.

And this Nation, when it enters upon this gigantic policy of repudiation, conceding its sovereign power to repudiate its obligations, will never again occupy in history the proud position that it has hitherto occupied—of being the one nation that held its honor too high to repudiate its solemn promises, and whose word was as good as its bond.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BECK. No; not now.

Only one last reference, gentlemen of the majority: One of my predecessors a moment ago made reference to the Declaration of Independence, and—God save the mark—he called this measure of repudiation a new declaration of independence. Well, it is a new declaration of independence, of independence from obligations to keep your word, in the spirit of Wilkins Micawber, who would give a promissory note in payment of his debt and then say, "Thank God that debt is paid." But I would say to my greatly valued colleague from Nebraska, who made the reference to the Declaration of Independence, that the noblest clause in the Declaration of Independence, and one of the noblest things that that great idealist, Thomas Jefferson, ever said, in effect declared that there is a law of right and wrong that rises above nations and above sovereign powers. I do not mean those were his precise words. He said, in substance, that the supreme law of conscience in the councils of the nations was inspired—now I quote his exact words in the immortal Declaration, by a "decent respect to the opinions of mankind"; that decent respect was more to be coveted than riches; that it rose above all law, constitutional or otherwise; that it rose above all international law. It was a law of nature. It was the law of God. That law is violated in this law of permanent abject repudiation if, with three billion gold dollars in our vaults, we say to our creditors at home and abroad, "We will pay you in any kind of currency we want to, irrespective of what we promised." Will our Nation sink so low? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask frankly what do we mean by "repudiation"? The dictionary says it is "to forego or to refuse to pay." I ask what the gentleman means by "moral"? It means "not to do wrong."

Is lawful money less valuable than gold? Let us see what the history of it is. In August 1861 this Congress passed a law creating the first original greenbacks. Those greenbacks had no exception clause. There were 60,000,000 of them. A short time after that, unfortunately, listening to the bankers of this country, who demanded their pound of flesh, the Congress passed another law putting an exception clause into the greenbacks. Now, what was the result? Those greenbacks that had no exception in them at all, that were lawful for all purposes, in payment of all debts, both public and private, ran along during the entire Civil War and to the end of it on an absolute equality or parity with gold. When gold brought $2.85, greenbacks which had no exceptions also brought $2.85. That is exactly what we are doing here today. We are taking the exception clause out. We are making one money. You have heard at different times, Mr. Chairman, discussions of the Gresham law. What is the Gresham law? When countries of the world have had different kinds or classes of currency, Gresham discovered through historic data that the better-class currency always left the country that had a currency of more than one value. So that is what the Gresham law announced; that where there is more than one kind of currency, the better or more valuable currency leaves the country invariably and brings about all the disaster that comes with contraction.

Now, what is the way out of that? Just one. To say that there is but one class of currency, and we do away forever with the overhanging danger that Gresham pointed out, and that has been called the Gresham law.

In this present case what are we doing? We are not repudiating any debts. We are simply saying to the world, "We are now establishing what we ought to have done long ago; we are establishing just one kind of currency." We ought to know enough to know that as long as the American Government receives that currency back in the payment of our dues to the Government that is perfectly good currency; as good as gold itself. We are not only wronging nobody but we are preventing those who hold the gold at the present time from wronging anybody. Members talk about repudiation. Let us see where it comes from. Here it is: I say that what we are doing today is restoring our money. We are restoring the value. Back in 1926, 1928, and 1929 the gold dollar and the silver dollar and every other dollar had one and the same value, and that was based on the commodity price level of 1926. Now that commodity price index value of 1926 is also the average for the 15-year period, and during that period all debts of the United States were either contracted or refinanced. What we are doing today is simply this: Following the panic of 1929 the gold dollar has increased from 100 percent up to 175 percent of the commodity price index, and on a much higher price than that along the price index of stocks and bonds and the like.

What we are doing today is not taking anything from anybody, but we are reducing the value of the dollar that had no right to go up, reducing the value of the dollar for which extra value the men who now hold it gave absolutely no service and to which increase in value they have no right. We are simply restoring the right of the American people to their own money. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the holding of or dealing in gold affect the public interest, and are therefore subject to proper regulation and restriction; and

Whereas the existing emergency has disclosed that provisions of obligations which purport to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency of the United States, or in an amount in money of the United States measured thereby, obstruct the power of the Congress to regulate the value of the money of the United States, and are inconsistent with the demand policy of the Congress to maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar, coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That (a) every provision contained in or made with respect to any obligation which purports to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency, or in an amount in money of the United States measured thereby, is declared to be against public policy; and no such provision shall be contained in or made with respect to any obligation hereafter incurred. Every obligation, heretofore or hereafter incurred, whether or not any such provision is contained therein or made with respect thereto, shall be discharged upon payment, dollar for dollar, in any coin or currency which at the time of payment is legal tender for public and private debts. Any such provision contained in any law authorizing obligations to be issued by or under authority of the United States, is hereby repealed, but the repeal of any such provision shall not invalidate any other provision or authority contained in such law.

(b) As used in this resolution, the term "obligation" means an obligation (including every obligation of and to the United States, excepting currency) payable in money of the United States; and the term "coin or currency" means coin or currency of the United States, including Federal Reserve notes and circulating notes of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. LUCE: On page 3, line 3, insert: "For 2 years after the passage of this act and thereafter until the President shall by proclamation declare the depression to be at an end", and in line 9, after the word "incurred", strike out the word "every" and insert "for a like period every."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I propose giving the committee an opportunity to express its judgment upon two phases of this bill.

That which I first bring forward by way of amendment is one to place this bill on the same footing with the emergency measures that have already been passed, by limiting the life of the bill to 2 years or thereafter until the President may by proclamation declare the emergency at an end.

This measure might be in part at least, if not wholly, taken from under the cloud of odium which hangs above it by declaring that in view of the existing conditions we are going to suspend temporarily our obligations.

We have been acting hitherto, it is well understood, on the basis of an act passed in the period of the great war whereby in view of war-time necessities statutes and even the Constitution itself were for the time being displaced. We did things that we did not expect to continue in peace times, and they were never brought before the courts to test their technical justification. Now, it is possible that no question will be raised if this is put upon the same footing. I mean no question will be raised by those to whom the Government has given its "solemn pledge," again quoting the words from the existing law.

The second proposal, Mr. Chairman, will be in an amendment to be presented later which will declare that this measure shall not be constructed as impairing the obligation of contracts heretofore made; in other words, will not be retroactive. It would be unnecessary to adopt the second provision if the first one should be adopted, for it would doubtless meet the needs of the case. But if the first one should not commend itself to the judgment of the committee, the committee will have the opportunity to decide upon the second question.

A great deal of disturbance has been aroused throughout the country by this repudiation proposal. The newspapers convey to us the information that wise commentators upon these matters are greatly disturbed at what is contemplated. Surely it will be well to weigh our action and think carefully before we make permanent change in the law in these particulars.

There may be gentlemen present who did not hear the explanation of the situation. The committee did not have the advantage of any knowledge of what it was intended to accomplish by building a wall around $3,500,000,000 of gold without any opening that would allow anything to come out, and only allowing gold to come in.

The committee did not have before it any man from the Treasury Department to explain the purpose of this bill. The committee does not now know, unless I am greatly deceived, the meaning of some of the clauses of this bill. Personally, I have been unable to find any explanation of some of the clauses in this bill. We simply know there is a general purpose here to repudiate the obligations of the United States. Now, to try to allay the fears at home this amendment gives you the chance, if you wish, to justify this repudiation by telling your constituents that it is to be only temporary.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I was not in the Chamber when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] rose to address this body. I have taken the trouble, however, to read his remarks as they appeared. He apparently prepared them in advance and read them verbatim. His attack is therefore all the more vicious because it was carefully prepared and deliberately read. It is unforgiveable, I assure you, my good friends. I say to those who heard the remarks and those who read them that you will rarely see anything as false or as utterly cruel, particularly since read at a time when in Germany insane religious prejudice is causing so much havoc, so much ruin, so much misery and suffering. I would that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] saw fit to withdraw his remarks voluntarily, or that if he does not change them that at least the spirit of fair play in this House will prevail upon him to withdraw them entirely.

I appeal again to the sense of fair play and justice of this House, which I know is diametrically opposed to the aberrations of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to prevail upon him to say he was mistaken. Only then will he exculpate himself from the charge of stooping so low as to attempt to fan the flame of religious prejudice in order to influence the House.

I would be craven if I remained silent in the face of his defamation of my people. I would be a coward not to hurl the lie to his teeth.

In the brief time allotted to me to reply, I would remind him, when he falsely brings his silly indictment against our people, and charges that the Jews will have the gold and the non-Jews the bits of paper money, of the long record of patriotic service of the people against whom he delivers his tirade. He speaks of Concord Bridge in the Revolution. What about the fame of Hyam Solomon, who sacrificed much, if not all, of his fortune to aid in the financing of the Revolution. In the diary of Robert Morris are to be found scores of favorable references to the patriotism and sacrifice of this Jew. It has been said that were it not for the benefactions of Solomon to the patriotic Madison, Monroe, Morris, and others, these men could not have carried on. I would remind the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this banker Jew died a martyr's death as a result of his trials and tribulations brought on by the Revolutionary War. He was captured by the British and died of prison fever. He indeed sacrificed his fortune on the altar of American freedom.

I would remind him also of the Lost Battalion in the Argonne Forest. That battalion was composed primarily of East Side Jews, many of whom went through the Valley of the Shadow. The mere mention of these heroes should belie the utterances of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

He should indeed hang his head in shame. He will when he realizes finally the sin that he has really committed. Let him reflect on the words of Lincoln in the second inaugural: "With charity for all and with malice toward none." If Mr. McFADDEN does not withdraw his remarks from the RECORD he is devoid of charity and is animated by malice.

Washington received generous praise and congratulations from the members of the Portuguese congregation at Newport upon his elevation to the Presidency. The great President replied in the kindest spirit, and said he now rejoiced that at last in this fair land of ours the people of the stock of Abraham could sit under their own vines and fig trees, and there were none to make them afraid. Surely, if the gospel of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is repeated and is allowed to spread, and the wild dogs of religious hatred and enmity are let loose, the time may come when not only the people of the stock of Abraham, but others as well, will be unable to remain under their own vines and fig trees. There will then indeed be those to make them afraid. [Applause.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of this bill today, it has been measured to a certain extent by the yardstick of partisan politics. I want to try to approach it in the light of politics and in the light of the facts.

Whenever a debtor, be he an individual or the Government of the United States, owes a debt which he cannot pay, then one of two things must happen: Either the debt must be scaled in the number of dollars or the value of the dollar with which he pays the debt must be reduced. Of course, in the case of individuals who cannot pay their debts it is, under ordinary circumstances, bankruptcy, which is a scaling of the debt.

For 3 long years the individuals of this country have been unable to meet their debts payable in dollars. During this time they have seen the dollar go up in value to the point where, measured in products, it has had a value of about $1.65. Now, the Government is in the identical position that the individual debtors were in a few years ago. The Government cannot meet its obligations payable in gold. It must do for itself what it should have done for the debtors of this country 3 years ago, begin scaling the value of the money; and yet as late as June of last year both political parties convened in their conventions in Chicago, committed themselves to so-called "sound money", wholly unmindful of the welfare of the great mass of debtors in this country.

Today the Government of the United States is in a position where it cannot pay its obligations payable in gold dollars of 23 grains, and the procedure which we are taking today is inevitable irrespective of which party might now be in power and irrespective of what we may have said in our political party platforms. Had my party succeeded and on the 4th of March had been going into power, the banks would have been closing just the same, and we would be in this same position that we now find ourselves today.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I cannot yield because my time is too limited.

Today the Republican Membership on this side of the aisle who are in charge have insisted on making this a party matter. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] refused to give time to anyone who was not opposed to this measure. This makes it a partisan matter so far as he and those in control of this bill on the Republican side are concerned.

As a Republican, I deny that Mr. LUCE or the Republican membership of the House Banking and Currency Committee reflects the principles of the Republican Party in the United States. [Applause.] I want to here and now say that in my humble opinion that as bad as this country may need the sound leadership of the Republican Party in the future, this country will not place the Republican Party in control if the Republican Party is going to be dominated by the banking and currency and financial leadership of the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Luce, the majority leader, Mr. Snell, Senator Reed, of Pennsylvania, Senator Walcott, of Connecticut, and Ogden Mills, the five gentlemen who signed the statement given to the public some months ago pertaining to monetary legislation and who, at this time, would now stand in opposition to this legislation. If they could have their way and could succeed, it would only mean this Government would have to boldly repudiate its debts and refuse to pay in any kind of dollar because it cannot pay in a 23-grain gold dollar. [Applause.]

I am sorry to see this bill measured today by politics. It is an inevitable situation with which the country is confronted, Republicans and Democrats alike, and the same situation would exist at this very minute had we won the election and were in power today. I voice the hope that when the roll is called we will find enough Republicans voting for this measure to make it impossible to place the Republicans before the country as being committed to the financial policies of the Republican membership of the Banking and Currency Committee in the House.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] involves a surrender of every contention that has been made on the part of those who attack this bill upon the score of its immorality. I cannot find any reasoning by which to justify immorality temporarily any more than immorality may be justified as a permanent practice. If my friend is willing to advocate repudiation for a period of 2 years, I deny that I am any worse than he is if I advocate it for a period of 20 years.

So, all the harsh language that has been used in describing this measure and its authorship might be applied to the gentlemen of the opposition. I think it is fair to say that gentlemen are on an equality with those of us who sponsor the bill from this side when they propose to endorse the same thing for a period of 2 years. I want to remind the gentleman from Massachusetts that nothing would be more confusing than undertaking to change the existing law temporarily. If we were to embark upon a program in which we issue obligations payable in a different way from the way in which obligations are now paid, contemplating, in the meantime, that 2 years later we would revert to the old system, we should find ourselves in the midst of confusion even worse than that with which we shall be confronted if we defeat the legislation.

We do not stand for repudiation; we plead for plans that will make possible the fulfillment of contracts. The present system has brought us unprecedented distress and can only land us in repudiation or bankruptcy. We plead for an honest dollar that will enable honest citizens to pay their honest debts. We advocate a new deal—a new deal that will bring a new day of hope and confidence and equality of opportunity.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will vote down this amendment and all amendments and that we will lend our aid to the President of the United States in his efforts to lead the Nation and the world toward economic recovery and the restoration of prosperity. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto now close.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman withhold that motion for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 20, after the word "term", strike out down to and including the word "term", in line 23, so that the subsection shall read:

"(b) As used in this resolution the term 'coin or currency' means coin or currency of the United States, including Federal Reserve notes and circulation notes of the Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The last sentence of paragraph (1) of subsection (b) of section 43 of the Act entitled "An Act to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, to raise revenue for extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of such emergency, to provide emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes", approved May 12, 1933, is amended to read as follows:

"All coins and currencies of the United States (including Federal Reserve notes and circulating notes of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations) heretofore or hereafter coined or issued, shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties, and dues, except that gold coins, when below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece, shall be legal tender only at valuation in proportion to their actual weight."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, after line 21, add a new section to read as follows:

"Section 3. Nothing in this act shall be construed to impair the obligation of contracts heretofore made."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the chairman of the committee did not understand that I intended to offer this amendment to the section preceding this, or he would not have made his motion.

Mr. STEAGALL. I certainly did not; and if the gentleman wishes, I am willing to return to the first section.

Mr. LUCE. It is not necessary. I think it is just as well to offer it to follow this section. I trust this interchange between the chairman of the committee and myself will reassure the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN], and will show to him that in the Committee on Banking and Currency there is today, as there always has been, attempt to serve the country without regard to partisan considerations. Several gentlemen of the majority agreed with me in my attitude toward this bill and so voted. In previous matters I have helped along the proposals of the chairman, as sent to him by the administration, and have tried to make good the boast of the committee that it is not a partisan committee. I gave no time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] because this contest is one as to whether the bill should prevail or not, not a question of politics, and I wished all the time at my command to be used in opposition to the bill.

Dismissing that as probably unimportant, I would repeat in some measure what I said more at length earlier in the day, because there are now in attendance two or three times as many Members as were here during most of the debate. So for the information of those who have not heard the debate, I would say that the one issue in this bill is whether the good faith of the Government shall or shall not be maintained. To that end this amendment is offered, and if necessary will be again submitted in the shape of a motion to recommit, so that the House may put itself squarely on record in favor of right or of wrong. I believe this is far more important than any question of finance. I contend this to be a question of the honor of the country. We are for the first time to say whether we will or will not repudiate what the law said was a solemn pledge. I read that from the statute to those who happened to be here at the time. At issue are the words "The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged." The question you are to decide is not anything about the future. There is no question of inflation involved here, and, in its present form, there is no question of whether this gold clause shall or shall not be in future issues of bonds. The only question now to be determined is whether you will renounce, reject, and cover with obloquy the solemn pledge of the Government that those who accepted its offer and lent the Government their money, relying upon this solemn pledge, and those who in private life dealt with each other, lent and borrowed money upon the basis of what was in fact a solemn pledge, shall be maintained in their rights, whether the Government of the United States shall continue in the eyes of the world as an exemplar of good faith.

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, followers and worshipers of the god of gold are falling down upon their faces and crying out for vengeance. From all parts of our Nation there comes the cry from the worshipers of this heartless and soulless god who, during the past few years, has robbed millions of home owners of their homes; robbed farmers of their farms; has taken food from crying and hungry children; has robbed the widows and orphans of their mites and has smiled upon infants whose tender and emaciated bodies have grown steadily weaker while ravaged with hunger and pain; has brought about premature death to fondling infants whose mothers' breasts were robbed of the nourishments of life; has forced property owners to become beggars and mendicants. This god of gold, like an octopus, has placed his tentacles in the homes of this Nation and with an imperialistic and death grip practically impoverished and bled white the great middle class of citizens of this country.

This monster, the god of gold, without a heart, minus sympathy, or a sense of feeling, has forced debtors to try to pay debts made 3 or 4 years ago with the present value of the gold dollar. A debt made 3 years ago, when money was plentiful and at the value of property then, cannot be paid with the present value of money. It takes $3 to pay a $1 debt. Resulting from this ratio of values is the disastrous and preponderous economic panic which jeopardized this Nation on March 4. The Democratic Party, with that greatest living Democrat at the head of it, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, has brought about material changes that are placing the country on a safe and sound economic and financial basis. Great progress has been made. Greater progress will be made when this measure becomes law. I regard this bill which makes all currency of the United States worth as much as gold itself the most important bill that I will ever have the privilege to vote for.

There are many hardships and difficulties connected with representing a district here in this Congress, but it is worth all the effort and cost just to vote for this bill. This is my first term, and it may be my last term, but if it is, then I feel that I shall have made a distinct contribution to our Nation by having the privilege to vote for the bill.

Turn to the thirty-second chapter of the Book of Exodus in Holy Writ and observe that when Moses, that great leader and lawgiver, found that the followers of Israel had acquiesced in their vision and were worshiping a god of gold prepared for them by his brother Aaron, he took the golden calf which they had prepared with the earrings from all the men, women, and children, and which was their god, burnt it in the fire, ground it into powder, strewed it upon the water, and made the children of Israel drink of it.

The passage of this bill will mark the dawn of a new day for the American people. O god of gold, thou hast failed us. Today we turn our faces toward another source—to the God of justice and right for the poverty-stricken and broken-hearted people of our Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the 5 minutes that I have I may not speak strictly to the amendment. I rise to record myself here today because I feel I would not want to go home when our vacation comes without having done so on this most important measure. I respect the President of the United States, both for the office that he holds and for the man himself. When I came here this year from my home in Michigan, it was my purpose to go along just as far as I, a Republican, possibly could with a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress.

I have failed to do so because I have found crashing about my ears, every day, all those things in which I have been taught to believe from a governmental standpoint since I was a boy. It seems to me today that this is sorrow's crown of sorrows. It seems to me that this is the last word in the revolution which has been taking place in the United States during the last 2 months. We have seen this Congress of which I am very fond—and I am just as fond of my Democratic friends as I am of my Republican friends—the representative body of the American people, with 150 years of tradition back of it, day after day abjectly surrendering not only its power, but the power of the American people, bartering away privileges and legislative rights that have grown up during the course of a thousand years; and here today after all these surrenders of power, we find ourselves confronted with something that is infinitely worse, the surrender of our national honor. Across every line of this bill, which is before us today, is written the ugly word repudiation. I claim to be no prophet, but I am going to vote against this bill in the belief that at some time, it may be 6 months, it may be a year from now or 2 years, but at some time every man who subscribes to this piece of legislation will hang his head in shame at the thought that he had a part in bartering away the honor of this Nation.

Mr. Chairman, I said a moment ago that I wanted to go along as far as I could with the Democratic President and the Democratic administration generally, but I am going back home today prouder than ever of the fact that I am a Republican, of the fact that I stand for and believe in sound money, and I know that here today many a sound-money Democrat who is going to cast his vote for this bill will do so with a heavy heart. I know this bill will pass, but I say that never before in the history of our Nation has our honor as a Nation been as basely bartered away as it will be this afternoon. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I have not had an opportunity to say anything about this bill, not that anything I would say would amount to so much, but I am not going to charge it either to the Democrats or to the Republicans, but I know that time has been scarce. I do want to say that this bill is the most sensible bill that has been presented to this Congress since the Congress has met. I am going to support the bill and vote for the bill. It is one bill that will bring wheat back as the basis of our American dollar, and the things that the producers produce in the United States.

We can talk about repudiation, we can talk about canceling sacred contracts; and many of those who were today on the floor arguing on this bill from the standpoint of canceling sacred contracts were not on their feet when we voted on the economy bill, arguing in behalf of the sacred contracts we had with the veterans of the United States of America. [Applause.]

I want to say that the sacred contracts that might be canceled in this bill are sacred contracts with the money changers who for years have had their grip upon the throat of this Nation through gold; and this gold is absolutely worthless. It has no intrinsic value. About the only thing you can use it for is to fill a tooth, and there are many things you can use that are better than that. You cannot eat it, but it gives the robbers of widows and orphans, if you please, a chance to corner the gold of the world and use the gold to oppress and depress people until they have brought us into the situation we are in today.

I rise to favor this bill and to oppose the amendment, and to put this bill through and give back to Congress that one right which is guaranteed to it in the very Constitution of the United States, wherein it says, "Congress shall have the right to coin money and regulate the value thereof." [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask this gentleman a question in view of the fact that he made untruthful statements, and I want to know whether to believe him or not.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am not yielding to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is out of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered which has not been read, forbids the shipment of gold out of this country.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have only 5 minutes, and I am not going to yield.

We are in this position today, under the laws that have been passed by the Congress, that all American citizens are forbidden, under penalty of imprisonment and a fine of $10,000, to have more than $100 worth of gold in their possession. The Secretary of the Treasury, however, is authorized to permit the shipment of gold out of this country by issuing licenses, so that the shipment of gold can be made under contracts, previously entered into, to the Bank for International Settlements, to any central bank, including the Bank of England.

Now, may I call your attention to the fact that there is in contemplation the opening of an open market for the purchase and sale of gold in New York City? My understanding is that that is being done with the approval of the Treasury Department, under the auspices of some of the trading organizations or exchanges in New York City. May I point out to you the unfairness of permitting the foreigner to draw gold out of the United States when American citizens are prohibited under the law from having that gold?

The amendment which I have offered proposes to do that thing. There is a plan on foot to consolidate the world's gold in the Bank for International Settlements, which includes our gold. The gold now in the custody of the Federal Reserve System should not be permitted to leave this country on any deal of the international bankers.

May I, during the balance of my time, refer to the other amendment which I offered, which was voted down, to call your attention to the fact that that is an amendment to the section which permits the cancelation of the war debts owed to the United States? You gentlemen who voted against it voted to reduce and cancel the foreign debts to the United States. It defines obligation as meaning debts due to and from the United States, which, of course, means war debts due to the United States.

May my amendment be read, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, may my amendment be read?

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McFADDEN: On page 3, after line 21 insert a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That after the passage of this act no further licenses shall be granted for the export of gold from the United States to any foreign country, and no one in the United States shall have power to grant such licenses or to export gold to any foreign country."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOEPPEL: On page 3, following line 21, insert a new section, as follows:

"3. That the United States Government immediately pay the veterans' compensation certificates in lawful money of the United States as provided in this measure."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOEPPEL: On page 3, following line 21, add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 3. Every Government obligation heretofore or hereinafter incurred issued as tax-exempt, shall hereafter be subject to tax."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. Under the rule the Committee automatically rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RANKIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration House Joint Resolution 192, to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States, pursuant to House Resolution No. 161 he reported the same back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered on the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency with an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. LUCE. I am opposed to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. LUCE moves to recommit the joint resolution to the Committee on Banking and Currency with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment:

Add a new section on page 3, after line 21, as follows:

"SEC. 3. Nothing in this act shall be construed to impair the obligation of contracts heretofore made."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, may we have the motion to recommit again read by the Clerk?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 78, nays 263, not voting 90, as follows:

Mr. Douglass with Mr. Beck.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I am requested to announce that the following Members are unavoidably absent, and if present would vote "no" on the motion to recommit and "aye" on the passage of the bill: Mrs. NORTON, Mr. SULLIVAN, Mr. BOYLAN, Mr. SISSON, Mr. MCREYNOLDS, Mr. HAINES, Mr. RICHARDSON, Mr. KERR, Mr. SIROVICH, Mr. BRUNNER, Mr. HORNER, and Mr. GAVAGAN.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. STEAGALL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

VALUE OF COINS AND CURRENCIES OF THE UNITED STATES—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, the declaration that the gold clauses in public and private obligations are contrary to public policy arises out of the experiences of the present emergency. If the gold clause applied to a very limited number of contracts and security issues, it would be a matter of no particular consequence, but in this country virtually all obligations, almost as a matter of routine, contain the gold clause. No currency system, whether based upon gold or upon any other foundation, can meet the requirements of a situation in which many billions of dollars of securities are expressed in a particular form of the circulating medium.

THE UNITED STATES IS OFF THE GOLD STANDARD

When the important announcement was made "The United States is off the gold standard" by the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Woodin, the natural impulse was to find out what it is all about. I once read somewhere "when in doubt, see your banker", so I sought an audience with this learned man. I felt that I knew as much about it, after the interview was over, as I did when on a previous occasion I sought his reasoning on why Canadian money was at such a discount. I might state that I reside in a border city. At that time he informed me that the discount on foreign exchange was arrived at through the balance of trade between the countries. This may have been very illuminating to some few people, but I confess it left me still in ignorance.

Former President Hoover, in a precampaign speech, stated that we were only a few hours, or was it a few days, from going off the gold standard—which gave Wall Street publications occasion to print denials and quotations from our leading financiers that the President had misspoken himself, and that we were not anywhere near such a national catastrophe as going off the gold standard. But the President also let it be known that through quick action, and strategic moves by his administration, the American dollar still rang true on the counters of the world. Still keeping to this thought—that it was all-important for our national well-being to maintain the gold standard—what must we now think? And what are the reactions to date? Talk of inflation to the tune of $3,000,000,000! Republican Members of the House and Senate shaking their heads and asking the Democrats, "What do you know about banking and finance, let alone inflation?" And the Democrats answering, "You should ask, after the success you have made of the Nation's finances!" And the people are still wondering and still clinging to their one remaining asset—hope. And what is their hope, and can going off the gold standard and inflating our currency fulfill their fondest hopes, which, after all, are higher prices and the relief of unemployment?

It is truly an experiment, but the most logical one we have yet attempted. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, about which we have all heard so much and know so little, one of the depression experiments, may have saved our financial structure temporarily, but that is a debatable question. What we all do know about this Corporation is that some folks were able to borrow money from it. But it seems to me that most of our present trouble is due to the fact that most of us have already borrowed too much money and now we cannot pay it back, and Shylock demands his pound of flesh. To learn that some other banker will lend us more money surely is only pointing the way to inevitable bankruptcy if our assets continue to depreciate.

What has our maintenance of the gold standard, with practically the whole world ignoring it, done for industry and labor? We hear and read a lot about our foreign trade; Government statistics continually point out the sad fact that exports continue to drop, but imports, in many instances, show increases. And why not? Foreign buyers with depleted currencies buy from countries where their dollar buys a dollar's worth of goods, whereas in America a dollar's worth of goods actually costs from a dollar and a quarter to a dollar and a half on account of the exchange. And better still, American buyers, with their gold-standard currencies, can buy a dollar and a quarter to a dollar and a half worth of merchandise for a dollar in foreign countries. So, in the parlance of the street, they have us coming and going—mostly going, for hundreds of America's well-established industries have moved their plants, bag and baggage, to foreign lands, for they have been unable to market American-made products, for which, among other things, they must receive American gold dollars, not to mention the so-called "protective tariff", and one wonders if at last that famous "cross of gold" speech was not slightly premature.

The most astounding fact since going off the gold standard is the absence of dire prophesies. With few exceptions, if these prophets were ever without honor, they are now, for are not they the same gentlemen who such a short time ago hinted something about prosperity being just around the corner? And to go back a little further, it is not hard to recall who loaded our small banks with those "good foreign bonds", payable in gold, which never could and never will be payable in gold, if payable at all.

It will be argued that with no gold backing, our American dollar will drop in value. That is granted, but to what value? To determine this value we must first arrive at its present gold value. The purchasing power of a dollar is at present conceded to be about $1.50 compared with its purchasing value of, say, 7 years ago, which is not considered an abnormal period in American business. The abnormal period came later. The owner of the present dollar gets the benefit of the additional 50 cents when he makes a purchase. If his purchase happens to be food products, and most of his purchases are, the farmer producing same actually loses the 50 cents. The proof of this is an established fact. No need for argument—that the farmer is forced to sell his products much below actual cost. Some of his products sell for less than the cost of his seed, to say nothing of his labor, his investment, his taxes, and interest, but does the loss stop with the farmer? It does not. No business ever fails alone; somebody else must hold the bag, so the farmer fails to pay his interest, his other obligations, and so forth. He loses his farm through foreclosure; the mortgagee is deprived of his interest; the merchant writes down his accounts receivable; and the tax bureau respreads the unpaid taxes, and the fellow with the dollar, which he thought was worth a dollar and a half, pays—although he does not always know it. He pays just the same, and the circle is completed. This is just as true in the case of the manufacturer, the banker, or any business man.

Will inflation prove a remedy at this time? Water will run up hill only under pressure and can be dammed by pressure but for a short time only. We have witnessed the prices of all commodities climb under pressure, we have seen them dammed for almost 4 years under pressure, the pressure being gold in both instances. The argument of overproduction and surpluses cannot be conceded, for how can a surplus exist of foodstuffs or clothing when people are hungry and most of the people are threadbare? If it were possible for all of us to have what we need—mind you, not what we want—there would be no surplus, so the facts are the reverse of this. Most of us have assets whether they be real estate, stocks and bonds, or services, but today we are unable to realize on them. Why? Because they are depressed below their actual value, and actual value is not so hard to arrive at when applying the rule of common reasoning as compared to the gold standard. The basis of future values must not be computed in gold—a commodity, which, owing to the very nature of it, can be controlled for the benefit of the few to the detriment of the many. Expansion of the currency simply means more money, not necessarily the medium of exchange, as we term money, but more available credit. To best illustrate this credit, let us say a parcel of property is today considered worth $10,000 in actual value, based on a fair assessment for taxpaying purposes. Or the same might be true of a cargo of merchandise. But to obtain a credit or loan for the purpose of marketing the merchandise, or improving the property, its value, based on gold, might be only $5,000, and it would have a collateral value of 50 percent less, bringing its commercial value to $2,500, whereas, if the actual value could be made the credit basis it would have a commercial value of $5,000. And inflation proposes to do just this!

Of course it would be beyond all reason to believe that such a change could be consummated without opposition, both from politicians and economists, so let us review briefly the opposition. They have brought their biggest guns forward for one grand blast, and they have addressed their appeals mostly to Mr. Average Citizen, who yet possesses small savings. But has this class of citizen forgotten so soon that only a month or two ago, after being worked up to a frantic state of alarm over the safety of his savings, the Governors of practically every State in the Union, and lastly the President of the United States, found it necessary to close all our banks in order to save him from ruin? The lesson we all learned from the bank holiday is that America cannot be cashed, for our national wealth is not measured in dollars, gold, or otherwise.

If it be true that our savings will shrink under inflation, it is also just as true that they have shrunk in the period of deflation, for does anyone believe that our banks, savings and loan associations, and other institutions for savings can pay 100 cents on the dollar with their assets depressed to such a point that few, if any, of our thousands of closed banks now in liquidation have been able to pay 50 percent of the deposits, even after throwing in the capital investment and in many instances the stockholders' assessment for good measure. And we are to believe that our savings will remain safe while deflation, forced liquidation, foreclosures, and bankruptcy are allowed to continue unabated.

Another form of savings must not be overlooked, and that is the thousands of bondholders who still hold bonds that have not already defaulted, principally Government and municipal bond owners. We have such an authority as the President of the United States for the fact that our national debt approximates our national wealth. All our cities, counties, and towns are burdened with bonded debt. Few municipalities can collect more than 50 percent of the taxes they levy. This is not surprising. Few taxpayers, if any, have not suffered a 50-percent loss of income, whether it be rents or the profits in business, not to mention depreciation in values. To date most of our municipalities have been able to borrow to meet fixed interest charges, but to pyramid the indebtedness is not the way out, and inevitable bankruptcy is just around the corner.

Inflation may be an experiment, but it brings hope. We are off the gold standard, and, to quote Senator PITTMAN, "If we fail, God help America."

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, when we were debating the so-called "Economy Act", the charge was made that those who voted against the bill were shooting the President of the United States with the assassin's bullet. If that charge were true then, what about any Democrat who might vote against this bill? Why he would be cutting the President's throat with one of democracy's sharpest swords, the sword that sought to cut the stranglehold of Mark Hanna and his bags of gold, was wielded by the mighty hand of a distinguished Democrat, William Jennings Bryan.

Those who oppose this bill talk about repudiation of debts. I say to them defeat this bill and you repudiate your own President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. One of his first acts was to call in the gold from the vaults of the Morgans, the Mellons, the Rockefellers, and thereupon hope began to return, confidence to be restored, and prosperity to come. It required a Washington and a Jefferson to free the country from English tyranny and oppression. It needed a Lincoln to unfetter the shackles of the colored man, but it waited for a Roosevelt to free the industrial slaves of this country from the bondage and serfdom of the gold standard of the money kings.

We hear much of "the science of money" as though it were a sacred old white ox before which the average American must prostate himself and gaze open-mouthed at those superior intellects who have studied the so-called "science of money." It is supposed to be something very esoteric, quite beyond the comprehension of the hoi polloi, and as to the farmer and workingman it is supposed to be as far beyond his mental grasp as the star Arcturus, whose beam of light set in motion the Chicago Exposition. Being a hog farmer myself and not a metallist I cannot compete with them when it comes to talking about "redemption money", "money of final payment", "gold as standard of value," until lost in a fog of their own making they must content themselves by prattling about a "debased currency", "repudiation" of the bond holdings of the bloated millionaires, and, finally, that the President's action is unconstitutional as measured by the mildewed legal minds of 40 years ago. Preserve the Constitution, they say, but let the people suffer and die. Maintain the gold standard for the silk-stockinged aristocrats, but the masses wear rags and tags. Kneel down and worship at the golden throne of J. P. Morgan & Co. while 15,000,000 men walk the streets begging for a job.

With their captious though fallacious themes these modern sophists prate of debasing the currency, unmindful of the fact that American manhood has been debased, American womanhood debauched, and American ideals destroyed to uphold the golden calf of Mammon. In their ecstasy to wander about into the labyrinth of the "science of money" they become foolishly bewildered in an economic maze of their own making. The farmer and the wage earner may never be privileged to enter this superabode of the money-minded giants of intellect, yet the farmer knows that a dollar that buys 2 bushels of wheat or 30 pounds of pork is unsound. He knows when he sells an acre of corn harvesting 50 bushels for a $5 bill that there is something rotten in Denmark. When he feels the money lender's noose tighten about his neck because money is so high and farm commodities so low that the two are as far apart as the Poles, he understands that the whole currency system functions for the rich at the expense of the poor. The wage earner, though not a high-browed metalist nor yet a high-domed professor of the science of money, but who tramps the streets for days, weeks, and months looking for work, with his family starving while the 12-cylinder Lincoln of the plutocrat brushes him aside, knows that these two extremes, the one of damnable poverty, the other of ultra-rich luxury must be equalized, and that soon, or bloody revolution will follow in its wake. The difference between the condition of Dives and Lazarus was never as sharply defined as now. It is not so much the pitiful poverty of the many as the enormous wealth of the few that is fostering discontent. While the masses battle desperately for bread to eat, rags to wear, and leaky roofs to shelter those whom their hearts hold dearest, the multimillionaire crowd pile up more millions and brazenly boast of their refusal to pay income taxes.

I have neither the time nor the disposition to burden this Congress with a dissertation of my own on the technic of money—the gold standard. A $20 bill, whether it be redeemable in gold, silver, or lawful currency of the Nation, is merely a check given by all the people of this country and drawn by their hired hand, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his official capacity, given against all of the property and wealth of the country. So long as our currency is genuine and signed by Uncle Sam in his lawful, legal capacity, I care not a tinker's damn whether it is backed by gold, silver, or lead. That currency can only benefit me when I exchange it for its equivalent value in commodities. I can carry it about my person, hide it in the mattress, or in tin cans; but it represents nothing unless I exchange it for the necessities, comforts, and luxuries of life. There is a law of gravitation that anything which goes up must come down, and vice versa. If the millennium were to be attained, the Utopia reached, then there would always be an even balance between the value of the dollar and the value of the commodities it purchases. Assuming that both once started on an even keel, it is perfectly logical and natural to assume further that when one goes up the other comes down. As the value of the dollar appreciates the value of the commodity depreciates; hence we get what every farmer and every wage earner knows—a dishonest dollar that means more wealth for the wealthy and more poverty for the poor.

There never has been nor never will be "a money of final payment nor of redemption." When you trade a paper dollar for a gold dollar or a silver dollar, you have merely traded one Government check for another. The gold dollar must await final redemption in terms of commodities, in pounds of wheat, bread, sugar, flour, shoes, stockings, cigarettes, or whatnot. One dollar is merely a figure of speech by which we convey to the intelligentsia of one human being to another how many dollars are required to pay taxes, to pay rent, gas bills, light bills, telephone bills, and monthly installments to the financing companies, or 36-percent loan sharks. As the dollar mounts in value, the living costs of wage earners and salaried workers become increasingly difficult obligations to meet. A lot of these so-called "money experts" do acrobatic tricks with statistics—the per capita circulation of money, the increase in circulating media as compared to the increase in population and such similar gymnastics until their logical sequences are sprained and can walk only with the aid of crutches.

The gold standard has always been the ruthless despoiler of the larders of the poor. If it be true that going off the gold standard or the adoption of a silver standard would scale down the mighty fortunes of the millionaires, then in the name of God give us this latter remedy. A depreciating currency may be called by some an evil, but on the other hand an appreciating currency is a scavenger of hell itself.

The pages of history may be searched, the annals of time sounded, yet never an instance will be found where a depreciated currency has ruined the common people; yet the melancholy note that arises from the harp of time is proof positive that, out of the wreck and ruin and economic chaos following all panics and depressions, there rears the ugly head of an appreciating currency that concentrates and centralizes the wealth of nations in the slimy hands of the privileged few and makes of the masses suffering serfs, throwing them upon the public purse and Government doles—compels them to select without alternative the bread of charity or the blood of revolution.

Out of the suffering, misery, and woe caused by this costliest, deadliest of all economic collapses, the one of 1929–33, one great good will be found surviving, namely, the inability of the money kings to now point to any real, tangible benefit accruing from the maintenance of the gold standard; no longer can the plutocrats, through their subsidized newspapers, and bipedal broadcasters in official life, proclaim that the gold standard has maintained the American wage scale, American standards of living, and the full dinner pail. The proof of the pudding is in the chewing of the string, and the 15,000,000 unemployed workmen who are tasting the gall and wormwood of the crumbs from Dives' table, now represented by Morgan & Co., cannot by the wildest stretch of the imagination be longer led to the golden altar to be slaughtered.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, the bill now before us for consideration, House Joint Resolution 192, is possibly the most important legislation that will be considered by this Congress.

The joint resolution which has the same binding effect of an act, is "To assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States." I have contended for this legislation ever since I have been a Member of this Congress. Three years ago I introduced a bill to put in circulation $2,000,000,000 of silver money and making it a legal tender for all debts owed by the United States and taking us off the gold standard. If this bill had passed when it was introduced, it would have averted the panic that came upon us.

Two things brought on the panic, one was the gold standard and the other the tariff. The Constitution of the United States gives to Congress the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. It is reliably stated that $100,000,000,000 of the bonds and obligations of debts now owed are to be paid according to the way they have been issued in gold. We only have a little over $4,000,000,000 in gold to a hundred billion in debts. No contract or bond ever should have been written so as to make it payable in gold but should have been made payable in legal-tender money of the United States.

No obligation or contract from and after the passage of this act will ever be made payable in gold, but will be made payable in legal tender of either gold, silver, or paper money. The thing that makes coin valuable is the Government that is back of it, and it is certainly unwise for a nation to build a foundation of $100,000,000,000 worth of debt on $4,000,000,000 worth of coin. Those who bought Government bonds and every other character of bond they have purchased that have been made payable in gold did not pay gold for them but simply gave their check or any regular tender of money that they had for the purchase of these bonds. Congress having the right to regulate the value of money might change the standard at any time to suit the needs of the people. Then if it is made payable in legal tender, whatever the money of the United States Government is, at the time of payment, is good in payment. This makes our money basis absolutely safe in the United States. It will prevent the cornering of money which was done in the last 2 or 3 years under the gold standard, and deliberately brought on a panic that has about ruined our Nation.

The gold standard has paralyzed our agricultural interests and left our farmers prostrate. I said in a circular that I delivered to my people 2 years ago, that agriculture was crucified on the cross of gold and at the altar of shame. We now know that is true from the effects of recent legislation.

Suppose that gold on which $100,000,000,000 of debt is predicated was demonetized and could not be paid in gold, then what would happen with the structure of our Government, and this could be done by a simple act of Congress. Of course this shall not be done.

This act will be held constitutional by the courts of our country because there is not a syllable in our Constitution that prevents it; besides that, decisions of the United States Government on questions of like kind have clearly demonstrated that Congress has the power to regulate the currency of our Nation.

The gold dollar had gotten so high that the person who contracted debts under a different condition of money could never have paid their debt at all. When measured by the commodity price of agricultural products the gold dollar was worth $2.32 when it should never have any value over 100 cents. The purchasing power and commodity price should be held in equal balance.

This is a part of the new deal and is a bright day for America. When the legislation that has been passed by this Congress, and will be passed before the close, 10 days from now—when that legislation is put into force, there is no reason why our Government should not be put back on a prosperous and sound basis economically, and we believe it will.

We have been faced with this kind of condition for the last few years, that at least four fifths of the nations of the world had gone off the gold standard and one fifth was on a gold standard. You must trade with nations with their medium of exchange. The silver that was in the silver dollar 3 months ago was worth 25 cents; and when the foreign nations using silver wanted to trade with us, they had to pay four times the value in their money for our products. To illustrate, when India or China came to the United States to buy cotton—and they were our best buyers—they paid in silver money of their country, which was only worth, when measured by the gold dollar, 25 cents, and it required them to pay for cotton when it was selling here for 5 cents, under the gold standard, 20 cents per pound in their silver standard. They had to discontinue their trade with us largely on this account.

Prior to the last war the foreign countries were growing around 6,000,000 bales of short-lint cotton per year and bought the remainder of their supply from the United States. They are now raising 12,500,000 bales of this short-lint cotton and buy only enough cotton from us to mix with their short-staple cotton so as to manufacture clothing out of it, which leaves us with a surplus of the balance of our cotton on hand.

If the foreign nations traded with us now as they did prior to the war, they would only raise 6,000,000 bales of cotton instead of 12,500,000, and in less than 2 years would use up the entire surplus that is now held in the United States. Then, too, we would have an open market with a demand for every commodity that we could raise at a fair price.

Since the passage of legislation to aid agriculture by this Congress, corn has advanced in price three times what it was, wheat three times what it was then, and cotton nearly twice what it was. Rice practically three times what it was at that time, and beef about twice the price it was. This shows that legislation has been effective even by the enactment of it before it has really had much time to affect the price, because those dealing with these commodities know that the legislation now enacted will be effective.

It is our belief and hope that it will have the desired effect by bringing commodity values up and bringing the standard of money back to the point where there will be an equal balance between our money values and the value of our agricultural products.

Let us hope that the new day that we have wished for is now approaching.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, on last Saturday morning, as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee of this House, I voted against the reporting-out of the pending resolution, not because I was opposed to the resolution but because I believed that the committee should have a hearing on the resolution; that representatives of the Treasury of the United States should be asked to appear before the committee and give the views of the Treasury as to the necessity of the passing of this resolution, so that the Members of this House might have, when this resolution came before them for consideration, such information, and not be obliged to rely upon the statements and views of the members of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House and other Members of this body.

As far as I was personally concerned, I was ready to favorably report the pending resolution on last Saturday, because I believed that inasmuch as our country is practically off the gold standard today and the gold-payment clause contained in the United States bonds is suspended, the Treasury of the United States would be in an embarrassing position in advertising for future bond sales containing a statement that the principal and interest would be paid in gold when at the present time the United States Government has announced that it will not pay existing bonds nor the interest thereon in gold.

I am pleased to learn that the opponents of this resolution have not seriously raised a constitutional question.

There can be no doubt at all but that, under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States giving to Congress the right to coin money and fix the value thereof, Congress has the right to pass a law at any time it sees fit to do so declaring that the requirement that United States obligations should be paid in gold coin, instead of lawful money of the United States, is against public policy, and that is all the pending resolution attempts to do.

In a short time the United States Treasury will be obliged to advertise for bids for a new huge bond issue. The present law requires that such bonds shall contain the so-called "gold clause." It is certainly inconsistent for the Treasury of the United States to be obliged to insert in bonds issued at this time a clause promising to pay the principal and interest in gold when the Government has repudiated that promise in prior issues of bonds.

The pending resolution simply means this, that the Congress of the United States declares what the Government has already announced, that the so-called "gold clause" contained in United States bonds and other obligations, public and private, which require the payment of said obligation in gold, is against public policy and unenforceable.

Shortly after the present administration assumed office, under authority of law, the President of the United States took this country off the gold standard, so to speak, by refusing to permit withdrawals of gold from the United States Treasury by our own citizens, and by citizens of foreign countries, except as the result of a special order of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and thereby announced that our governmental obligations stipulated to be paid in gold would not be paid in gold, but would be paid in the lawful money of the United States.

The one act of the present administration that did more than anything else to bring about a rise in commodity prices and to stimulate business was the act or acts of the President of the United States that took our country off the gold standard.

It is charged that the passage of this resolution means a repudiation by the United States of its own contracts, and that there is no justification for such action, when our Treasury is filled with gold.

The pending resolution declares that the enforcement of the gold-contract-clause provision in public and private obligations obstructs the proper exercise of the constitutional power of Congress to coin money and regulate the value thereof, and if such is the case, such provisions must yield to the general welfare of the whole country.

The fact that the outstanding obligations of the Government of the United States are declared to be payable in gold cannot be held to place any limitation upon the power of Congress to void such contract when the welfare of the whole country demands such action on the part of Congress.

The Government cannot divest itself by contract, or otherwise, of its sovereign power over money, so as to prevent such legislation as the financial and industrial exigencies of the times may require.

All contracts of the Government and of its citizens are made in the light of the inalienable right of Congress to legislate as the public interest may demand.

Of course, without the passage of this resolution, all contracts containing the clause to be paid in gold, executed by cities, municipalities, corporations, and private individuals, and even by the National Government itself, are unenforceable and void today, because under the present law no gold is obtainable with which to pay said contracts, and consequently they are impossible of performance and void.

I believe it to be a fair statement, that economists and financiers quite generally agree that the gold dollar has appreciated to such an extent as to render it impossible for debtors to discharge their contractual obligations payable in gold. The fact of the matter is a great many bankers, financiers, and industrial leaders believe that the soaring value of the gold dollar is largely responsible for our present industrial situation.

Again, it is submitted that it is inequitable for the Government of the United States to permit a situation to exist whereby a debtor who borrowed a dollar several years ago must pay today, in the liquidation of that debt, a dollar having a purchasing power of at least a dollar and a half.

It is not dishonorable for the debtors of our country to ask the right and privilege of paying their debts in dollars near the purchasing power of the dollars that they borrowed years ago.

One of the objects to be obtained in taking our country off the gold standard, I take it, was to depreciate the gold dollar and to make it more nearly an honest dollar, and the developments since that time have justified the belief that such action on the part of the Government was a move in the right direction.

A great many people at one time believed—and the writer belonged to that class—that if our country went off the gold standard industrial chaos would immediately follow; but we have learned in a few months that the taking of our country off the gold standard has resulted not in industrial chaos but rather in bringing about more favorable industrial conditions in our country.

While it is true that the United States has a large stock of gold at the present time—the largest gold stock of any country in the world—it is also true that such a favorable gold situation is due largely to the fact that as a result of a Presidential order several hundred million dollars of hoarded gold was recently returned to the United States Treasury and also to the further fact that about 2 months ago our country went off the gold standard by refusing to permit gold withdrawals from the United States Treasury.

If the President of the United States failed to take the action that he has taken regarding the hoarding of gold by our citizens and the payment of gold by the United States Treasury, it is altogether probable that the gold reserve of the Treasury might be greatly depreciated by this time and our country be eventually compelled to abandon the gold standard from necessity, the same as England was compelled in 1931 to abandon her gold standard, because her gold reserve was rapidly being depleted by withdrawals.

With our large gold reserve today, the United States is in a much better position to dictate an international money policy, if such a policy is advisable, than it would be in if our gold reserve had been depleted to such a point as to compel our country to abandon the gold standard.

Our country is in a great national economic crisis. It is to the interest of the creditor class just the same as the debtor class of our country that our industrial democracy be saved from wreck and ruin. It will do the creditor class no good to demand their pound of flesh if by so doing our country is brought to universal bankruptcy. If the passage of this resolution will bring about a further rise in commodity prices and a further depreciation of gold as a standard of value, such results will be for the benefit of our creditor class as well as the debtor class and, in fact, will be for the benefit of the whole country.

While the passage of this resolution will not greatly change existing conditions, it may help to depreciate further the value of the gold dollar, because it will constitute a congressional declaration approving the action of the President in taking our country off the gold standard, and at the same time it will aid the Secretary of the Treasury in handling Government finances at this time.

Mr. EICHER. Mr. Speaker, the restoration of equality of purchasing power to all the money of the United States that will be accomplished by the legislation for which we have the privilege of voting today is so pregnant with promise for the attainment of social and economic justice for all the people that it should receive the immediate and unanimous approval of the Congress. As soon as all the currency of the Nation becomes acceptable for all debts and dues, public and private, the mystery of money will dissipate, equal rights will return, and special privileges will rapidly disappear. The relatively constricted and contracted, and easily manipulated gold supply, will be unhorsed from its unholy pedestal as a medium of control of prices and values and will be relegated to its only justifiable function, namely, as a medium for the exchange of commodities and property.

Until recently it was my well-considered conviction that price levels could be sufficiently raised to accomplish substantial justice for the debtor and to revive business and industry by expanding our currency within the limits consistent with the maintenance of a reasonable gold parity. However, I am now abidingly satisfied that the mountain of debt, domestic and international, cannot be scaled to the point of essential liquidation with no other vehicle than a monometallic oxcart inherited from a primitive, unstable, and simpler society. During the history of nations when their resources and credit were more or less shadowy and ephemeral, it is conceivable that a metallic redemption base or bases were necessary to the reasonably acceptable operation of currency systems. And at the present national juncture it is well that we have within our own control such a large proportion of the gold of the world. Inasmuch and as long as gold remains somewhat of an international fetish, such a reserve constitutes a convenient backlog against which we can keep burning the fire of an independent world position in the event of hesitation or delay in the highly desirable program of international cooperation.

But we are a Nation with a proven and stable Government and with resources well-nigh limitless in their wealth-producing capacity. The credit of such a nation will maintain undepreciated sufficient currency to meet the expanding needs of business and commerce and to perform the service of liquidating mutual obligations fairly and honestly and equitably in terms of real wealth, which, after all, includes only those things that sustain life and provide comforts for human kind. We shall need, it is true, further legislation setting up machinery for price stabilization that will be as nearly as possible automatic in its operation. But it need not be feared that without it price levels will rise inequitably, for under existing law the President is limited to a maximum reduction of 50 percent in the event of action by him looking toward the revaluation of gold.

A managed currency, therefore, using in its management a stabilization goal comprising the composite exchange value of the many commodities that have been and will be mankind's necessities from Adam to Gabriel, certainly can be made to work out with more even-handed justice for society as a whole and to accomplish a more equitable distribution of the rewards of industry and of thrift than has the single-commodity gold base with which we have hobbled along and under whose benign operation less than 10 percent of our people have been permitted to acquire upwards of 90 percent of the Nation's buying power.

A Repudiation Congress, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] calls us! The Iowa farmer who 2 years ago borrowed some money to buy some corn will this year to pay the debt have to raise from 2 to 3 times as many bushels of corn as he got with the money he borrowed. As late as 2 months ago he would have had to deliver 5 or 6 times as many bushels. Meanwhile, the human demand for corn as a necessity of life did not diminish, but the buying-power demand fluctuated thus wildly. Observe the picture from that angle before appraising the moralities. If gold were demonetized, the creditor would obviously prefer currency to gold. The creditor having a gold-payment clause in his contract, notwithstanding its abrogation by this law, will on the average receive as much in actual wealth as his dollar bought when he loaned it. That is not repudiation; it is simple justice. A government that could not and did not correct such a palpable wrong would certainly forfeit all right to the favorable opinion of mankind. Are we canceling or reducing war debts? No; we are making possible the otherwise impossible payment of those debts by accepting dollars which our foreign debtors can buy with more nearly the same quantity of goods as they received for our dollars when they borrowed them. That result, also, is justice, but it is more than that—it is good business.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, the consideration and passage of this most important measure repealing the gold-standard statute of the United States, after but 3 hours of general debate, will furnish further evidence of the fact that this Congress will go down in history for its deeds rather than its speech making. The American people desire action and we are giving it to them instead of emitting a lot of chewed wind on the floor of the House. I confidently believe that when the record of this special session of Congress is written, it will be found that we have enacted in 3 months' time more constructive, beneficial legislation than all the preceding Congresses in the past 20 years. President Roosevelt has proven himself to be a leader of courage and wonderful ability, and we have been his loyal, industrious followers in this new era of liberty and freedom for all the people of America.

I favor this bill for many obvious reasons but principally because it will inevitably and eventually result in the remonetization of silver. In view of the fact that three quarters of the population of the earth employ silver as the medium of exchange, the restoration of the white metal to its rightful and ancient place in the money marts of the world will do much to revive trade and commerce everywhere. It will provide additional money with which to transact business and reopen the silver mines of the West.

Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, I deem it appropriate on this occasion to pay a brief tribute to the memory of one of the greatest statesmen our country has ever produced and a former illustrious Member of this House, William Jennings Bryan, who must look down from his heavenly abode upon our action today with a degree of joy and satisfaction.

A few days after my arrival in the Capital, I visited beautiful Arlington Cemetery, where rest the mortal remains of so many of our heroic dead, and one of the very first mounds I sought for was that of Mr. Bryan, whose greatness comes to be recognized to an increasing extent with the passing of the years. This noble prophet and seer was always in advance of his time and was the first to advocate a Federal income tax, direct election of United States Senators, woman suffrage, publicity of campaign expenses, and free and unlimited coinage of silver in the ratio of 16 to 1, and every one of these reforms has been written into law excepting the last named—the most important of them all—and it now becomes only a question of a brief period of time when it also will be the law of the land. We have witnessed in our day the terribly sad tragedy against which Bryan warned us 40 years ago, "the crucifixion of mankind on a cross of gold."

Mr. Speaker, the enactment of this law is another emancipation proclamation, declaring liberty for 120,000,000 Americans from the thralldom and cruel yoke of gold which has enslaved the human race.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 4494. An act authorizing a per capita payment of $100 to the members of the Menominee Tribe of Indians of Wisconsin from funds on deposit to their credit in the Treasury of the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, the bill (H.R. 5012) entitled "An act to amend existing law in order to obviate the payment of 1 year's sea pay to surplus graduates of the Naval Academy"; that the Senate insists upon its amendment to said bill, requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. TRAMMELL, Mr. MCGILL, and Mr. HALE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SEA PAY OF SURPLUS GRADUATES OF THE NAVAL ACADEMY

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 5012) to amend existing law in order to obviate the payment of 1 year's sea pay to surplus graduates of the Naval Academy, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, is this bill to nullify a similar provision of the independent offices appropriation bill?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Not at all. The independent offices bill may not pass in time to effect this purpose.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. What does this bill do—it gives away 1 year's sea pay, does it not?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No; it takes away 1 year's sea pay.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman in what respect the Senate amended this particular bill?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I have not the slightest idea. It came over here with Senate amendments, and I am asking for a conference to ascertain, and the House will have full information about the Senate amendments.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I withdraw my objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. VINSON of Georgia, DREWRY, and BRITTEN.

STATEMENT BY REPUBLICAN WAR VETERANS OF THE HOUSE AND SENATE ASKING FOR JUSTICE TO DISABLED VETERANS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including a statement by myself on veterans' legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, reports from every section of the country on the effects of the President's regulations under the authority of the act of March 20 show the utter horror of this "new deal" for disabled veterans. All of us Republicans who voted broad powers to the Chief Executive did so in the sincere belief that marked economies could be effected without doing grave injustices to the disabled veterans. However, the regulations under this authority were so drastic and indefensible that every Senator and every Representative in Congress now has scores of specific cases that unmistakably indicate the effect has been utterly brutal.

Thousands of disabled veterans, together with their wives and children, are to be made destitute after they receive their last check on July 1; indeed, the sufferers from these Executive orders include tens of thousands of widows and orphans whose whole economic structure has been built on the Government's pledge that they would be cared for. Most of these disabled veterans and their families will have to depend on local relief agencies already overburdened.

Our reports indicate that the men whose disabilities are traceable to their war service are to be cut on the average of 50 percent, which by no stretch of imagination was intended when we granted the President's request for power.

President Roosevelt stated when he asked for extraordinary power under the Economy Act that he would deal justly, fairly, and humanely with the veterans, which promise has not been lived up to.

We oppose the Congress' adjourning until the President has reversed his position so far as the service-connected cases are concerned, or, upon his refusal to do so, that Congress recall the broad powers given him and refuse to adjourn until liberalizing legislation has been enacted.

FARMER-LABOR GOVERNOR IN ACTION—FLOYD B. OLSON, LEADER IN MINNESOTA'S FIGHT FOR POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC INDEPENDENCE—UNITES FARMER-LABOR-VETERAN ELEMENTS IN THEIR BATTLE AGAINST A COMMON FOE

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including statements made by the Governor of Minnesota on certain public questions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, under leave to extend my remarks I include statements made by Hon. Floyd B. Olson, twice elected Farmer-Labor Governor of Minnesota, on public questions of the day:

FIRST INAUGURAL MESSAGE OF FLOYD B. OLSON, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 7, 1931

To the Members of this Legislature of Minnesota, and Fellow Citizens:

Pursuant to the constitution of Minnesota, we are here assembled to permit me, as Governor, to make certain suggestions and recommendations to you with reference to legislation.

I shall not endeavor to discuss all the matters in which we may be interested during your session, but shall confine myself to certain major matters, and shall hereafter from time to time, by special messages, properly call your attention to other matters affecting the welfare of the State.

A majority of the members of this legislative body belong to political parties other than the one with which I am affiliated. I am sure, however, that partisanship will never be permitted by any of us to interfere with what we believe to be the proper and just performance of our duties. You may be sure that I shall never, in any way, attempt to encroach upon your jurisdiction over the legislative branch of the government, and I am confident that you will cooperate with me at all times in the proper carrying on of the affairs of the State.

UNEMPLOYMENT AND PUBLIC WORK

We are confronted at this time with an acute unemployment situation. It is the duty of the State, as the guardian of all its citizens, to do everything possible to alleviate the situation. The most practical means of helping is in the carrying on of public work, which not only will provide employment for persons now idle, but will tend to encourage and stimulate private industry.

For a number of years last past by reason of a governmental policy carried on under the claim of economy, our State institutions are greatly in need of appropriations for the purpose of repair and enlargement. A new office building is also needed for State departments which are now occupying rented space.

The making of these appropriations will result in an increase in State expenditures over those of preceding years. The burden of the previous governmental policy carried on under the claim of economy has fallen upon us. Let us meet the situation frankly and courageously, and provide for these improvements, not only because they are of an immediate necessity but also because they will assist the people of Minnesota in our unemployment situation.

We can also aid in relieving unemployment by enlarging our road-paving program. Paved roads are not only more practical for traffic but their ultimate cost is less than that of the graveled roads.

An enlarged paving program can be financed in a number of ways, including that of issuing bonds under the provisions of the trunk-highway amendment. If a bond issue is passed by your body for road purposes you should provide for a sinking fund for the payment of the bonds, made up of annual payments from the moneys realized from the gasoline tax. The present heavy burden on the taxpayer prohibits, in my opinion, the issuance of road bonds which would be ultimately paid for out of the general tax fund.

Leading American economists of both conservative and liberal tendencies agree that wages must be kept up to a high standard. A law should be passed providing that the wages paid on public work carried on directly by the State, or by contract with the State, must be equal to the highest prevailing scale of wages paid for the particular kind of work performed.

The law should provide for working hours per day, and working days per month similar to the accepted standards prevailing at the time the work is performed in public work carried on by the Federal Government.

Preference should be given to residents of Minnesota in employment for public work. Whenever practical, and whenever the cost is substantially the same, work should be performed by hand rather than by machines, in order to provide for the employment of a greater number of persons.

Preference should also be given to Minnesota products in public work.

In order to help the unemployment situation, the matter of appropriation for public works should be taken up by you at once and determined with dispatch, so that the work may be started promptly.

I suggest that all appropriations be passed at least a week before your adjournment and not be carried over until the closing hours of your session.

TAXATION

As is well known, the present burden of taxation is almost entirely due to local expenditures, as distinguished from expenditures by the State. The matter of local expenditures is, and should be, largely one for local determination, subject to such limitations as the legislature under the Constitution may place upon them.

In that connection I recommend the repeal of all laws limiting the amount of taxes levied by school districts, cities, and villages to a specific amount per capita of the population of such school district, city, or village.

You will undoubtedly earnestly study and consider the problem of the reclassification of property so as to remove the present inequalities of our tax system. I especially urge you to consider the farming population in the matter of tax equalization and reallocation, not only because of the shrinking of farm income but particularly because the farming population is carrying a disproportionate share of the total tax burden.

CONSERVATION

Minnesota, one of the richest States in the Union from the standpoint of natural resources, has no conservation program comparable in any degree with the programs of other States having natural resources. It is imperative that we put into operation at once a program which will not only protect the remaining natural resources but will particularly provide for the restoration of our forests, with a consequent direct benefit to the people of Minnesota resulting from the eventual sale of timber, and also the indirect benefits to our water supply and wild life. In formulating a program we are fortunate in being able to profit by the experience of other States.

I recommend the creation of a State conservation board of seven members, nonpolitical in nature, appointed for definite terms by the Governor, with or without the consent of the senate. The members should be representative of the different parts of our State and of different groups of citizens, and should serve without salary, but be entitled to traveling expenses when traveling in behalf of the State. The conservation board should select a commissioner of conservation, vested with all the powers, rights, and duties of the present conservation department, the department of drainage and waters, as well as those of the State auditor as to lands, timbers, and minerals. The board should select the necessary assistants or deputies to have charge of the divisions of forestry, drainage and waters, game and fish, and such other divisions as the commissioner of conservation may from time to time establish.

An act providing for the payment by the State of a definite sum per acre to counties within which land is or will be set aside for timber purposes under the Auxiliary Forest Law of 1927, should be passed. The money so paid can eventually be restored to the State from the 10-percent yield tax collectible at the time of harvesting the timber.

In conformity with the laws of other States engaged in reforestation, a law should be passed providing for the payment by the State of 5 cents an acre annually to the counties in which State forests are located.

Appropriations should be made at once for the enlargement of the State nursery so that extensive reforestation can be commenced immediately.

A constitutional amendment to enable the State to exchange its scattered lands for those of the Federal Government should be again submitted to the people of Minnesota. If and when such exchanges can be made, I believe the State should reserve title to the minerals in such exchanged land.

Adequate financial support for carrying on the land economic survey is recommended in order to assist in the formulation of a permanent forest policy.

A plan for civil service should be worked out covering employees in the conservation department who perform expert services, or those performing services requiring special training, so as to remove the department entirely from politics.

I recommend that you earnestly study and consider proper means for remedying the present polluted condition of the Mississippi River.

WATER POWER

The conservation commission should be charged with the duty of causing proper persons within the department to appear before the Federal Power Commission in all proceedings wherein application is made for permission to build water-power dams upon waters within the State of Minnesota, and within the jurisdiction of the Federal Power Commission, and there to protect the interests of the people of this State.

The legislature should provide that no dams contrary to the public interest should be built on watercourses within the State without the consent of the legislature first being obtained.

A constitutional amendment should be submitted to the people which will enable the State to control and develop those water-power facilities, watercourses, and other natural resources which still remain a part of the public domain.

A memorial should be sent to the Congress of the United States, requesting that in the building of the 9-foot channel in the Mississippi River, provision be made for the use of the water power (which will be produced because of the reservoirs and dams necessarily constructed to regulate the flow of water in the river) in generating electric current to be sold by the Government to the municipalities adjacent to, and near, the Mississippi River.

PUBLIC UTILITIES

I recommend the appointment of an interim commission for the purpose of proposing a plan for the better regulation of the rates charged and service rendered by public-utility companies.

When the regulation of telephone companies remains under the jurisdiction of the railroad and warehouse commission. I recommend that its supervision over these companies be extended so as to cover investments and expenditures, and that proper appropriations be made for accomplishing that extended supervision.

In the interest of home rule I recommend the repeal of the so-called "Brooks-Coleman" law.

LAW ENFORCEMENT

One of the most serious problems confronting the American people is that of law enforcement. In endeavoring to promote better law enforcement the first consideration is the apprehension of persons committing crimes.

Minnesota has about 2,600 peace officers, 87 sheriffs and deputies, and 87 prosecuting attorneys with assistants. It has a State Bureau of Criminal Apprehension which collects fingerprints, photographs, and other data concerning violators of the law. Attached to the bureau are a number of men who can be sent in any county in the State for police work on the request of the sheriff in that county.

Law enforcement would be greatly improved if the work of these various existing forces could be coordinated. I ask that appropriation be made for the addition of 12 police officers to the department, with salaries equal to the salary now paid to investigators employed by the bureau. In cooperation with the sheriffs and peace officers of the various counties of Minnesota, these men could be detailed, at the request of such sheriffs, to districts within the State for continual service therein, in assisting local sheriffs and peace officers and in bringing about thorough coordination of the work of the law-enforcement officers of each district with the State bureau as a central unit.

Minnesota being the only State in the United States wherein counsel for the defense has the closing argument to the jury, I recommend that the prosecuting attorney be given the right by law to reply briefly to the argument of the counsel for the defense, in conformity with the practice in the Federal courts.

I recommend that county attorneys be given the power to file informations in all criminal cases after the opportunity for preliminary examination has been given the accused in such cases.

To promote the rehabilitation of persons incarcerated in penal institutions, and to provide for a more scientific system of parole, I recommend the establishment of a full-time parole board, appointed by the governor for a definite period of time, and whose membership shall not include the head of any penal institution.

THE INDEPENDENT MERCHANT AND MONOPOLY

The independent merchant is an important factor in the building up of the State as a whole and the localities in which such merchant carries on business. Monopoly, functioning through the so-called "chain-store system", has produced inequalities which injure the independent merchant. I therefore recommend the passage of appropriate legislation designed to remove these inequalities as much as possible.

OLD-AGE PENSION LAW

A number of counties have adopted the old-age pension plan by a popular referendum, indicating to a considerable degree that the people of the State favor the plan. To produce uniformity and to avoid further election expense, I recommend the passage of a compulsory old age pension law, which will apply to all the counties in the State.

ELECTION LAWS

I recommend the passage of a law providing for a uniform primary election ballot which shall contain the names of the candidates of all parties, so arranged as to afford the voter the right and opportunity to vote for candidates for office without disclosing the party affiliation of the voter.

INJUNCTIONS

I advocate the passage of a law which will insure to every person charged with contempt of court arising out of labor disputes, the full constitutional right of trial by jury, and which shall further provide that no injunction shall be issued in a labor controversy until and unless a full and adequate hearing shall first be granted those sought to be enjoined.

The antitrust law of Minnesota should be amended so as to exclude labor unions from the scope of its operation.

I recommend that chapter 285 of the session laws of 1925 providing for the suppression of newspapers be repealed. As the prosecuting attorney of Hennepin County I had occasion to enforce that law in two instances. Its constitutionality was sustained by the Minnesota supreme court. I am convinced that it is constitutional, and as a prosecuting attorney, could not be concerned with its wisdom or lack of wisdom. As the chief executive of the State, however, I occupy a different status. The cases in which the law was used were proper exercises of the operation of the law, but I believe that the possibilities for abuse make it an unwise law. The freedom of speech and the press should remain inviolate, and any law which constitutes an entering wedge into that inviolability is unsafe.

STATE PRINTING PLANT

The experience of other States indicates definitely that a State printing plant can be operated with profit to the State, and I therefore recommend the creation of a State-owned printing plant to supply the needs of the State government and its subdivisions.

I am sure that our relations will always be pleasant, and that we will at all times disregard political considerations, and be concerned only with the general welfare of the State and its people. I shall be glad at any time to receive any suggestions from any member of this legislature upon which I may act in my executive capacity, for the betterment of the State.

While I have been elected as the standard bearer of the Farmer-Labor Party, permit me to assure you and all the citizens of this great State that I shall at all times consider myself the Governor of all the people of Minnesota and shall endeavor to work for the best interests of all of them.

SECOND INAUGURAL MESSAGE OF GOV. FLOYD B. OLSON TO THE LEGISLATURE OF MINNESOTA, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 4, 1933

We are assembled during the most crucial period in the history of the Nation and of our State. An army of unemployed, some 200,000 homeless and wandering boys, thousands of abandoned farms, an ever-increasing number of mortgage foreclosures, and thousands of people in want and poverty are evidences not only of an economic depression but of the failure of government and our social system to function in the interests of the common happiness of the people. Just beyond the horizon of this scene is rampant lawlessness and possible revolution. Only remedial social legislation, National and State, can prevent its appearance.

The great bulk of our population in Minnesota is made up of farmers and workers. Our prosperity is primarily dependent upon the buying power of the farmer. When he receives an inadequate price for his produce he cannot purchase the products manufactured by capital through the agency of labor. Labor is consequently unemployed, and capital becomes insolvent. The State has no control over the price of farm commodities but can aid the farmer in his present plight by means hereinafter set forth.

The United States has created the greatest industrial system in the history of the world, but that system has concerned itself almost entirely with profit, and has been blind or selfish insofar as the welfare of the mass of the people is concerned. That blindness and selfishness have caused the impoverishment of the consuming public and the consequent downfall of industry.

The unemployment of millions of people through the lack of a constructive economic and governmental policy has not only decreased the use of manufactured products but has decreased the consumption of farm products. The increased surplus of farm products thus created has contributed to the lowering of the market price of farm commodities to a point below the cost of production.

These conditions make it imperative for us to courageously enact and approve whatever remedial legislation is within our constitutional powers.

The farm problem resolves itself into (1) commodity prices, (2) mortgage, (3) interest, and (4) taxes.

The remedy for the present situation, existing not only in Minnesota but all over the United States, lies either through inflation or through cancelation of a substantial part of debts.

The condition of the Minnesota farmer is ably and succinctly stated in Special Bulletin No. 157 of the Agricultural Extension Division of the Department of Agriculture, University of Minnesota:

"The burden of farm debts today as compared to former years might be illustrated in terms of the average mortgage debt per mortgaged farm in Minnesota, which, according to the United States census of 1930, was $4,734. Figuring interest at 5½ percent, the annual interest payment on this average debt per farm is $260. On the basis of the average farm price of wheat in Minnesota in 1919, it required only 116 bushels of wheat to pay this interest; in 1925 it required 173 bushels; and at the present farm price of 35 cents a bushel, 743 bushels are necessary. Similarly, in terms of hogs, to pay the $260 in 1919 the farmer had to sell only seven 250-pound hogs; in 1925 it required about 10 head, and at the present price of $3 per hundredweight the farmer must sell 33 hogs. The farmer selling butterfat could pay this interest with 433 pounds in 1919, with 591 pounds in 1925, but at the price of 22 cents that has prevailed recently it required 1,182 pounds, or the total production of about six average cows."

The division estimates that 60 percent of Minnesota farms are mortgaged.

You are without constitutional authority to enact laws altering the terms of any existing mortgages or extending the period of redemption after foreclosure, but you can assist agriculture in some respects with reference to its indebtedness.

The Rural Credit Bureau of Minnesota is the owner of about 12,000 mortgages, of which about 3,000 have been foreclosed. Because of the decline in farm-land values and because of excessive amounts loaned by the bureau upon farms during past administrations it will become necessary under the present laws governing the conduct of the rural credit bureau to foreclose a great many more mortgages.

The rural credit bureau is restricted as to the period of time which it may permit to elapse between delinquency and foreclosure. That period should be extended to 2 years.

Hundreds of loans made in the past are in amounts in excess of the present value of the farms upon which mortgages were given to secure the loans. Foreclosures in those cases is inevitable, with resultant loss to the State and probable tenant farming, with the State acting as landlord.

To avoid this situation the rural credit bureau should be given authority to adjust the principal owing by reason of these loans so as to enable the mortgagor not only to pay the State the reduced amount of principal but also to retain his farm.

With such authority given to the rural credit bureau, the State could take the lead in bringing about an adjustment of mortgage indebtedness, both as to State loans and private loans. It can also set an example to private mortgagees in the deferring of foreclosure proceedings during the period of this depression.

The rural credit bureau has been the means of keeping down the rate of interest charged on farm mortgages, is extremely necessary to the farmer in this time of need, and its operation should be continued without any impediment.

If and when foreclosure proceedings are brought upon real-estate mortgages in this State, both rural and urban, the mortgagor should be protected against eviction. Because of the great emergency existing you have the authority, and should enact a law permitting an occupant mortgagor to continue to occupy the mortgaged premises subsequent to the expiration of the period of redemption, upon condition that such occupant mortgagor agree to pay a fair and reasonable rental value upon the property.

The imposition of penalties for nonpayment of taxes on real estate by January 1933 should be abated until March 1, 1933.

I shall discuss taxation generally under a general subdivision.

Pending the revision of the tariff against the importation of foreign oils used in the manufacture of products entering into competition with domestic dairy products, I recommend the passage of a law imposing a tax upon the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine.

LABOR

Unemployment creates misery among those unemployed; adds to the burden of taxpayers because of the necessity of feeding, housing, and clothing the unemployed and their dependents; and injures business through the loss of buying power in those unemployed. To remedy this condition in the future you should enact a compulsory unemployment-insurance law. The law should provide for an assessment of at least 3 percent, and preferably 4 percent, upon the pay roll of all employers employing a minimum of a certain number of employees, with proper exemptions as to farm laborers, domestics, and others. The cost should be borne by the employer as a necessary expense of business operation. The act should take effect not later than July 1 next; a year should elapse for the building up of reserves, and benefits then be payable. No part of the reserve nor of the expense of administration should be borne by the taxpayers.

An excellent report on unemployment insurance, after considerable research work, has been made by Profs. A. H. Hanson and M. G. Murray under the direction of Dean R. A. Stevenson, of the School of Business Administration of the University of Minnesota, and a proposed bill prepared. Using their proposed bill as a basis I have prepared a bill expressing my views, which, with your permission, I will submit to you for such consideration as you believe it merits.

Unemployment should also be relieved through a law compelling shorter working hours per day.

I recommend the passage of an anti-injunction law modeled upon the so-called "Norris-LaGuardia Federal anti-injunction law."

TAXATION

It is essential that every citizen, and particularly the common citizen, be relieved of a part of the present tax burden. That may be accomplished by the reduction of public expenditure and by shifting the burden of taxation from those least able to pay to those having the means and ability to pay. Only a small proportion of the tax collected on real estate in Minnesota is contributed to the State. The State should, however, reduce its expenditures not only to relieve the tax burden, however slight that relief may be, but also to set an example to other tax-levying units of government.

A budget will be submitted to you by the commission of administration and finance setting out in detail expenditures of the various departments of the State government. Possible reductions in those expenditures will also appear.

It is a practice in this country in any retrenchment program to first cut wages. That apparently is industry's only solution of our vexing economic depression. Industry is going through frightful contortions—presenting a strange anomaly. On the one hand it is preaching the doctrine of spending, the same as it preached a few years ago the doctrine of thrift. On the other hand it is retrenching, reducing wages, lowering the standard of living, destroying buying power, and throwing more men and women on the streets to shift for themselves and become the object of charity. Just how that is going to solve our economic problem is beyond understanding. Its only result can be to reduce the purchasing power of the masses still further, increase the army of unemployed, and generally aggravate conditions.

The cutting of wages and the consequent decrease of buying power causes further cuts in commodity prices. When commodity prices drop, wages are again slashed, and the process continues interminably, each time bringing us to new depths of depression until we are apparently on a downward journey into a bottomless pit.

Our State government is in effect a business institution. It should not subscribe to the principle of wage reduction, because to do so would be to subscribe to a fallacy. We could not with honor do so.

Conditions have forced on the government, however, the need for retrenchment, which must be effected without the curtailment or crippling of important governmental functions. We cannot overlook the plight of the taxpayer, whose capacity to pay has been sorely affected in the last few years.

I am not opposed to the reduction of salaries of all State officers and employees in the high-salary brackets, but I am opposed to the reduction of the salary of those in the lesser salary brackets. Such cuts as you will necessarily make in departmental appropriations should be made in bulk. Provision can then be made within the several departments for pay-roll reduction through the furlough and payless vacation plans, rather than through actual reduction of wages and salaries. In that way the standard of pay can be maintained.

There is another objection to actual reduction of salary. When salaries once are cut it is a long, tedious, and sometimes bitter process before they are restored to their proper levels, even though economic conditions have righted themselves. Wage increase never keeps pace with business improvement. It invariably lags behind.

I am also opposed to any reduction in the amount of State school aid granted at the last session of the legislature.

We operate in Minnesota under what is known as "the general property tax." Most revenue for government is raised by a levy on real property.

Despite the fact that every advanced student of taxation recognizes this method as unsound economically and unjust morally, and for all practical purposes obsolete and antiquated, we cling to it as if it were reverence for old age.

With practically every civilized nation on the globe having discarded the system, predatory wealth in America, which sees in the income tax an obstacle to the continued concentration of wealth, has been able to maintain the general property tax as the basic principle and corner stone of our tax system.

The alarming increase in tax delinquencies is the stark warning that the system is unsound.

The cost of government is assessed against those who are least able to pay instead of on those who can best afford to pay. It penalizes the man who owns his homestead, his farm, and who invests in real property. Real estate today is a drug on the market, largely because of the heavy tax burden that is imposed upon it.

A government that blindly continues to make those who can least afford to pay bear the brunt of the burden is building a house of glass and laying a foundation in quicksand.

A tax on net income is fundamentally and scientifically sound. It cannot take from one something that he does not possess—ability to pay. The general property tax does that very thing. Inability to pay general taxes on nonproductive property often is confiscatory.

The income tax is the most just tax thus far devised because it is the most equable tax; it is based on ability to pay. No nation or State that has adopted it has repealed it. No political party today would dare advocate repeal of the Federal income tax.

Successful government underlies successful incomes. There can be no logical reason why successful incomes should not support the government that makes these incomes possible.

Under the present system there are many forms of intangible wealth that escape taxation entirely. Not only that, but this intangible wealth is in total our greatest wealth, or token of wealth.

The income tax reaches people who have no real property and who do not contribute toward the support of their government. These people enjoy incomes accruing from that property, while that property is carrying a tax burden all out of proportion to the load that it should carry.

Much of the tax burden today rests upon the primary producers, having been passed on as an overhead through the channels of trade.

We are gradually reaching a point where real property cannot give up the tax moneys that is demanded of it. It must receive relief.

Property values are depreciating. An ever-increasing number of home owners and farmers are, through tax delinquency and mortgage foreclosure, losing their homes and their farms.

We should enact and approve a statutory graduated income tax. I have no doubt that we have the constitutional power to do so. Such income tax must be a definite replacement tax and serve to shift part of the burden of the tax now imposed upon real property. I am opposed to an income tax law which permits income taxes to be offset against property taxes, or vice versa, because it discriminates in favor of the rich. I favor the use of the income tax to replace part of the real-estate tax upon homesteads. This could be accomplished by reducing the percentage of assessed valuation upon which the real-estate tax is levied on homesteads. I will, however, approve any income tax law which definitely and certainly replaces a part of the tax upon real property, except as an offset.

I advocate an increase in the percentage rate of gross-earnings taxes upon public utilities. They should pay the same amount of tax under the gross-earnings tax system as they would be obliged to pay if they were subjected to a property tax. They now pay considerably less. If they were subjected to a property tax and compelled to pay on the basis of valuation permitted them for rate-making purposes, they would pay a great deal more than they now pay in the form of gross-earnings taxes.

I recommend a graduated income tax upon chain stores, the proceeds of such tax to be remitted to the counties in which it is collected, after deducting the cost of collection; the amount so returned to become a part of the poor-relief fund of the various counties.

I favor a substantial increase in the license tax upon common carrier and contract trucks and busses using the public highways of the State.

I am willing to approve a reduction in motor-vehicle taxes upon privately owned motor vehicles, but I believe the real-estate taxpayer, a substantial proportion of whose taxes are used for the building of local roads, can secure greater relief through the taking-over of the secondary road system of the State by the State highway department and charging such department with the building and maintenance of such secondary road system. In that way the local expense of construction and maintenance of roads, payable by local property taxes, can be reduced and the cost of highways continue to be paid by those who use them.

I am opposed to the repeal of the 1-mill tax for State road and bridge fund until provision has been made for the taking-over by the State of the secondary road system of the State.

CONSERVATION

The conservation of natural resources in a State like ours, which still derives most of its wealth from its soil, forests, mineral deposits, and waters, is of the utmost importance to the people and deserves earnest and careful consideration in all its aspects. All phases of conservation work are important—reforestation, development of State parks, propagation of fish and game, and control of erosion and stream flow—all these must have a definite place in our conservation program.

Two years ago the administration of our natural resources was reorganized and unified under a conservation commission of five citizens, which acts as a policy-making body, and a conservation director, who is the executive head of the conservation department.

Minnesota is one of the few States in the Union which has brought together under one administration practically all its natural resources. In most of the States these activities are divided among several State agencies. Two years is a short period to test a new principle in administration of our natural resources. Yet within this short time some very definite progress has been made in shaping the conservation policies of the State.

I believe in the principle of such a unified administration of our natural resources under the guidance of a nonpolitical conservation commission made up of public-spirited citizens. This commission should be continued and given all possible encouragement and help in developing policies vital to the welfare of our State. I am sure that the conservation commission will in the course of time bring greater efficiency and economy to the unified control over our natural wealth.

The factors governing the use and development of our natural resources are so interwoven that they must be dealt with as a correlated unit if the greatest efficiency and economy are to be obtained. Forests, recreation, land use, fish and game, and waters are integral parts of the natural wealth of the State, and, therefore, need to be handled as a whole. The propagation of game is closely connected with the character of the forest cover. The propagation and maintenance of brook trout, for instance, is predicated on the presence of cool streams. The temperature of the water in the streams depends upon the underground feeding of the streams, the presence of springs, the shading of streams, and all that is affected by the presence of forests.

Similarly, recreation is closely interwoven with green forests, particularly bordering the shores of lakes and streams. The water level in the lakes and in the streams, although subject to fluctuations with dry and wet cycles, is greatly influenced by the presence or absence of forests.

Forest fires are not only an enemy of the forest but are also a direct enemy of our game. Fire destroys the nesting grounds of many of our game birds, kills deer, and generally upsets the balance of nature. The connection between commercial forests and wood-using industries is self-evident. If all the natural wealth of the State, embraced in its land, forests, lakes, and streams, is to be properly developed, it must be under a single unified control.

There are other advantages of unified control of natural resources. Under the present conservation commission the activities of the different field forces can be more economically utilized. It seems to me that game wardens, at times of fire emergency at least, might be used for fire protection and that forest rangers might be used not only for fire-protection work but also for the protection of game, supervision of timber sales, and for tourist camps and recreational development. Instead of maintaining separate and distinct field forces the same field force can perform various conservation duties, such as game protection, fire protection, timber growing, and so on.

One of the greatest drawbacks in developing a permanent field personnel is the difficulty encountered by the conservation department in providing enough work for its permanent staff of rangers and game wardens during the winter months. By combining some of the duties of the field force a larger permanent force could be kept all the year round, and this means a more efficient, better-trained, and loyal force.

Unified control of all the natural resources should also mean greater economy. Instead of setting up several overheads, the same organization with one overhead can cover a larger field of activity at less cost to the State. The danger of duplication, of developing friction, and even inimical attitudes between departments whose activities are closely related, is also hereby largely avoided.

There has been some criticism directed at the conservation commission for laying too much emphasis upon fish and game problems as compared with fire protection, reforestation, and similar forest problems. The remedy against overemphasis of fish and game, or other less essential phases of conservation, lies in closer tying together these activities and assigning to each its proper place in the general plan of development. The overemphasis on fish and game is also brought about by the fact that the fish and game activities are financed by the revenue from fish and game licenses, with the result that there is a natural feeling among sportsmen that these funds should be used exclusively for fish and game purposes. They forget that without protection of our forest against fire, without maintaining and improving our forests, there would be very little game.

In my opinion, the fish and game funds derived from licenses should also be used in part for other conservation activities without which the fish and game resources would be jeopardized. It would be desirable, in my opinion, that all funds, whether from fish and game licenses or other revenue, should be turned in to a general conservation account, budgeted for the different conservation activities in accordance with the needs. In this way we would have a more uniform conservation program and avoid the possibility of developing one phase of conservation at the expense of another which is of equal or greater importance.

In order that all natural resources may be properly administered by the conservation department, lands and minerals and all appropriations therefor should be placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of the conservation commission.

Above all, however, we should be concerned with the conservation of human values—with restoration to our northern country, which was once the richest part of the State, of its natural wealth and its economic self-sufficiency. Conservation must aim at betterment of human life. If it fails to do that, conservation is mere sentiment—a beautiful sentiment—but of no great social significance.

A planwise use of our land, particularly in the northern part of our State, for purposes for which the land is best suited must lead to economic rehabilitation of our cut-over regions, bring permanent reduction in taxes, and effect permanent savings in governmental cost. The per-capita cost of government in the cut-over regions is about $81, compared to a per-capita cost of about $46 in the southern counties, where land has found its proper use and land settlement is compact. The reason for high governmental costs in the northern counties is largely haphazard settlement, which requires extensive roads, maintenance of separate small schools, and other governmental services. The terrific tax burden that results falls not only on local communities but on the State at large.

If by proper land utilization we can concentrate land settlement on the best agricultural land, and that unsuited to agriculture be kept in forests, selectively cut from year to year, where there will be no roads to build, no schools to maintain, and but a comparatively small cost for fire protection, I do not see why the cost of government in the northern counties cannot be brought eventually to about that of our southern counties.

That means an opportunity for tax reduction on a big scale. Here would be real and substantial reduction. With a population of over 420,000 in the northern counties, it would mean a saving of about $15,000,000 a year accomplished, not at the expense of any governmental function, and it will provide our citizens of the north with better schools, improved roads, and more of modern necessities.

I believe there is considerable justification for this State to assist the northern communities in getting a "new deal"—liquidating the mistakes of the past and rebuilding their natural resources. I am particularly anxious, however, that the assistance which the State shall give shall be entirely constructive and shall not help to perpetuate a condition which is economically unsound. I am not altogether convinced that the relief offered distressed drainage districts and, for that matter, some of the regular school and road aid helps to correct the fundamental difficulties in the cut-over region.

This year, under the terms of section 2139–2 of Mason's Minnesota Statutes of 1927, the State will acquire through process of tax forfeiture nearly 7,000,000 acres of land in the northern counties, the land to be held in trust for the taxing units. I want to emphasize to this body the undesirability of indiscriminate disposal of this public property, thus opening the door for a repetition of the unfortunate colonization schemes of the past. A large share of the present economic difficulties, particularly tax delinquency, is a result of haphazard settlement in earlier years. Much land unsuited to agricultural development was taken up and many communities have been able to exist only with the help of large public subsidies. A loose land-disposal policy will tend to perpetuate and aggravate these unsatisfactory conditions.

On the other hand, I do not recommend the immediate "locking-up" of this vast area in public forests or game refuges without considering the need for or adaptability of the land. Rather, there should be a broad classification made of the land to determine the use to which it is best suited. The disposal should be determined in the light of this classification, through the cooperation between the counties and the State. In order that this problem may be treated in a broad and impartial way, I have appointed a special land-utilization committee, which serves without pay, and which is authorized to look into the entire question of land use. This committee, which is headed by Dr. Coffman, president of the university, has held a number of open hearings throughout the northern part of the State, amassed a large amount of evidence, and is now preparing its report, which I shall make available to you at a later date.

Meanwhile, the land-utilization committee has prepared a preliminary progress report, dealing particularly with the application of the law relating to the reversion of forfeited land to the State. These recommendations have been prepared after careful study by specialists in the field of land economics and deserve your earnest consideration in any attempt to interpret or amend the law to meet the tax-delinquency situation. These recommendations are submitted to you for your information.

Notwithstanding the fact that commodity prices and wages have dropped and are continually dropping, utility rates remain up, and in many instances increase. This is due in part to the fact that such rates are protected by law, the utility company being permitted a rate which will earn or tend to earn a substantial net percentage of profit upon its capital investment. Through the manipulations of pyramided holding companies, this capital structure has been gradually increased, without any real financial investment, except on the part of credulous purchasers of stock, with a consequent increasing burden upon the consumers and users of the service furnished by public-utility companies.

The only protection and remedy for this condition is in stricter government regulation, and in some cases government ownership. I recommend that you submit to the people of this State a proposed amendment to our constitution that will permit the State of Minnesota to build and operate district power plants within the State and to sell electricity generated therein to municipalities and to the public.

In order to secure more industries and bring about the local manufacture of farm products and other raw materials produced in Minnesota, cheap power is necessary. To secure this the people must own a transmission system connected and interconnected with the available source of electrical energy. A network of transmission lines would make electrical energy available to every city and village at low cost. Power can be secured from the many dams now built or to be built on the Mississippi River.

Many municipalities within the State of Minnesota own and successfully operate power plants. I recommend the passage of a law permitting cities, towns, and villages now or hereafter owning power and light plants to sell electric current to purchasers thereof beyond the boundary lines of such cities, towns, and villages, so that farmers and others may have the benefit of cheaper electricity.

Authority and financial means should be given the railroad and warehouse commission to initiate investigations into rates charged by telephone companies in Minnesota.

The railroad and warehouse commission should be given authority to prohibit capital expenditures by public utilities operating within the State, except where regulated by local franchise; and to prohibit the sale of stock outside the boundaries of Minnesota by public utilities, unless permission is first applied for and granted by the railroad and warehouse commission.

I shall forward you a special message at a later date concerning improvement in the so-called "blue sky law" of the State of Minnesota.

The Brooks-Coleman law should be repealed.

GENERAL WELFARE

Because of the present inadequate protection of the aged and infirm I recommend the passage of an adequate State-wide old-age pension law.

The State of Minnesota from the beginning of statehood has accepted the principle of local responsibility for poor relief by directing the counties, or the cities, villages, and towns, to provide aid to those persons who because of unfortunate circumstances have been unable to secure food, clothing, shelter, and other necessities of life. This system, supplemented by the generosity and good will of private individuals, churches, and societies, has, until the year 1932, proved satisfactory and self-sufficient. Up to this time our local governments, self-reliant in their obligations and considerate in their service to their own people, have been able to meet adequately the local demands.

However, in the stress of economic conditions of the last 2 years many of these local communities, particularly in the larger urban centers of population and in the northern areas of the State where unemployment and distress have been most severe, have been overburdened in their valiant and sustained efforts to attend to local relief. In their efforts to administer to the needy under present laws, approximately 20 of our counties during the year 1932 have exhausted all relief funds and resources, even to the point of impairing credit.

To remedy this situation supplemental relief has been given by the State to various communities therein through moneys obtained from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the United States. That money has been distributed in the form of direct relief under the direction of a relief administrator appointed by me and the State board of control, and upon the terms and conditions prescribed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The money so borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under the terms of Federal law is to be deducted from future sums given by the Federal Government to the State of Minnesota for aid in highway construction.

Each county of Minnesota securing these advances from the State has promised to repay the sums advanced. If a future legislature desires, it may provide that such sums so advanced for relief purposes may be deducted by installments from the moneys allocated by the State from its road and bridge fund to the several counties.

The State executive council now has authority to appropriate and expend moneys to relieve persons suffering by reason of action of the elements. The power so conferred should be extended to include relief for persons suffering from economic causes, which are as much beyond their control as elemental causes.

In a great many cases local communities could aid themselves if certain State laws restricting their power to borrow money for public-relief purposes were repealed. This should be done by you.

For the foregoing and other reasons the per-capita tax limitation should also be removed.

All the nations of the world are seeking a common understanding, outlawing war, and bringing about disarmament. Despite the universal desire of the human race for peace, we still have the militarists, the war-mongers, and the professional Junkers among us who are constantly advocating increased armament, and who would favor a conscripted Army and Navy if they dared. Compulsory military service in time of peace is contrary to all American ideals and principles. Private institutions have a right to maintain a military cadet system, but a compelled drilling of students in public institutions of learning is not only contrary to the objects of peace, but is unfair to them from an American standpoint. You should pass a law abolishing compulsory military drill in all publicly supported institutions of learning in the State of Minnesota. There is no Federal law compelling military drill in land-grant or other colleges of the United States.

The State of Minnesota, for the purpose of electing Members of Congress, should be redistricted upon a fair and equitable basis.

The cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul have substantially agreed upon a bill providing for the creation of a metropolitan drainage area, and the disposal of sewage from those cities, now being dumped in the Mississippi River. I strongly urge the passage of a proper bill in order to hasten the cleaning-up of the river.

In the event that Congress legalizes the manufacture, sale, and transportation of beverages containing more than one half of 1 percent of alcohol by volume, such beverages could be manufactured, sold, and transported in Minnesota without restriction under the present laws of this State.

Anticipating such congressional action you should provide for the strict control by the State of the manufacture and sale of such beverages.

Responding to the Governor's plea for lower interest rates in the refinancing of farm mortgages the following joint resolution was passed by the Legislature of Minnesota:

Joint resolution to the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States concerning national legislation providing for refinancing of agriculture loans at lower rates of interest

(House File No. 1954, Resolution 19)

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

Whereas an emergency exists in this State whereby large numbers of farmers therein have lost or are losing their life's earnings for failure to meet interest payments through no fault of their own, with present conditions and high interest rates continuing, that such an emergency will continue for an indefinite time unless remedied by national legislation, providing for refinancing of farm loans at lower interest rates; and

Whereas, due to the emergency now existing, the interest of both borrowers and lenders on farm lands within this State are mutual, that interest rates are so high and price levels so low that borrowers are unable to pay existing rates and lenders are unable to collect, due to the situation thus created; and

Whereas it is the desire of the legislature of this State that occupying farm owners be permitted to refinance farm loans at lower interest rates, making possible for them to remain in their homes, and inasmuch as there is now pending a refinancing bill in the Congress of the United States which provides for administration methods of financing and reduction of interest rates to 4½ percent: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, That we regard such rates as provided for in this refinancing measure as too high to be of sufficient value to the farmers of Minnesota at this time, and therefore we urge the Congress of the United States to lower the interest rate provided for in this bill to 3 percent per annum.

To stop foreclosures and evictions in the State of Minnesota, the Governor issued an executive order.

EXECUTIVE ORDER

Whereas many persons are at present unable to pay interest or principal payments due upon mortgages given by them upon their homes, particularly persons engaged in agricultural pursuits, because of an economic depression, the causes of which and the remedies for which are beyond their control; and

Whereas as a consequence thereof mortgage-foreclosure proceedings are being had throughout the State of Minnesota upon the homes of such persons; and

Whereas many persons are unable for the same reason to pay interest or principal payments due upon notes secured by chattel mortgages upon furniture and upon livestock, agricultural produce, and farm machinery; and

Whereas many of such persons and many other persons sympathetic to the plight of such persons about to lose their homes and personal property through such foreclosure proceedings have undertaken by force to restrain such foreclosure proceedings; and

Whereas such attempted restraint is the act of persons otherwise obedient to law and order and otherwise desirous of upholding the Constitution and laws of the United States and of the State of Minnesota; and

Whereas under the constitution of Minnesota it is the duty of the Governor to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed"; and

Whereas it would be unwise and unjust in this present emergency to use the armed forces of the State of Minnesota to compel such foreclosure proceedings as may be instituted or are now instituted against such properties; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Minnesota is now assembled and has the power and authority, by adequate legislation, to prevent injustice in such foreclosures by altering the procedure now prescribed for foreclosures:

Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered that each and every sheriff and each and every constable and police officer of the State of Minnesota refrain and desist until May 1, 1933, or until further order, from foreclosing or attempting to foreclose any mortgage upon any of the following properties situate in the State of Minnesota, to wit:

Real estate upon which the mortgagor has his residence.

Furniture and household goods used by a householder mortgagor.

Farm machinery and livestock in use and possessed by a mortgagor actively engaged in farming.

Agricultural produce in the hands of the producer thereof.

FLOYD B. OLSON, Governor of Minnesota.

Dated February 24, 1933.

The following bill was passed by the Minnesota Legislature and approved by Governor Olson March 2, 1933:

House File No. 1279, a bill for an act providing for the postponement of certain real-estate mortgage-foreclosure sales and validating the acts of sheriffs in postponing certain real-estate mortgage-foreclosure sales

Be it enacted by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota:

SECTION 1. Any sale upon the foreclosure of a mortgage upon real estate, either by action or by advertisement, which has heretofore been advertised or which may hereafter be advertised to be held at any date subsequent to the passage and approval of this act and prior to May 1, 1933, may be postponed for a period of not to exceed 90 days to a date subsequent to April 30, 1933, by the sheriff of the county in which such sale is advertised to be held, without the publication of a notice of such postponement in any newspaper, provided, however, such sheriff shall post a notice of such postponement at one of the entrance doors of the courthouse of the county where the sale was originally advertised to be held, at least 3 weeks prior to the date to which said sale shall be postponed.

SEC. 2. In all cases where any sheriff has heretofore and subsequent to February 23, 1933, postponed any such mortgage foreclosure sale, the said sheriff may again postpone the sale, provided, however, that the date to which said sale is finally postponed shall be subsequent to April 30, 1933, and shall not be more than 90 days from the date upon which said sale was originally advertised to be held, and provided further, that the said sheriff shall post a notice of such final postponement at one of the entrance doors of the courthouse of the county where the sale was originally advertised to be held, at least 3 weeks prior to the date to which the said sale shall be finally postponed.

SEC. 3. Any postponement heretofore made by any sheriff of any such mortgage foreclosure sale, without the publication of a notice of postponement in a newspaper, is hereby validated and is hereby declared to be legal and binding in all respects.

SEC. 4. If any section or part of this act shall be declared unconstitutional or invalid for any reason, the remainder of this act shall not be affected thereby.

The Farmer-Labor Party and our Governor have repeatedly urged that the legislature act on the money question and public works, and the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota passed the following resolutions:

Resolution

Whereas the present system of distribution has proven itself inadequate to meet the needs of a civilized race and has collapsed; and

Whereas the present Federal Reserve Banking System has failed to function in this emergency, and the entire Government has practically abandoned the gold standard as a basis of money; and

Whereas the problem is entirely a national one, and not a problem of tax reduction, wage cutting, or tax revision; and

Whereas the State of Minnesota or any other State alone is powerless to meet the emergency; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States, through past actions, has allowed the Federal Reserve Banking System, in reality an organization of private institutions, to loan the credit of the Nation, and has delegated to one man, namely, the Secretary of the Treasury, the power to dominate the monetary system of the Nation; and

Whereas the credit of the people of this Nation and consequently their buying power has been practically destroyed by the Federal Reserve Banking System deflation policy; and

Whereas some emergency measure must be effected in order to avert internal strife and disorder until a new economic system can be worked out and accepted by the people; and

Whereas the Constitution of the United States has bestowed upon Congress the obligation to coin the money and establish the value thereof; be it further

Resolved, That we, the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota, do hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to immediately proceed to carry out the obligation placed upon them by the Constitution, namely, to issue the money and establish the value thereof; and be it further

Resolved, That Congress extend to the several States of the Union the same power formerly extended to the Federal Reserve Bank in the matter of loaning money, and issue directly to the said States on the security of the natural resources of such States money to be loaned or issued directly to the people through such agencies as the State of Minnesota has created and are suitable thereto or which may be created in the future and which are suitable for this purpose; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States, by proper legislation, as soon as possible, liquidate all the present national banks of issue and establish in their stead Government-owned and controlled banks; and be it also

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each of the two Senators from Minnesota, to each Congressman from Minnesota, to the Secretary of the Treasury, to the Governor of the State, to the commissioner of banks and banking of the State of Minnesota, and also to President Roosevelt.

CHAS. MUNN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Adopted by the house of representatives the 13th day of March 1933.

FRANK T. STARKEY,
Chief Clerk, House of Representatives.

Resolution

MARCH 4, 1933.

Whereas there is to be a conference of Governors in Washington called by President-elect Franklin D. Roosevelt and which is to be held upon the 5th and 6th of March 1933;

Whereas this conference of Governors is called to discuss questions of national import in regard to the present depression with the hope that this conference will work out some plan for Federal relief;

Whereas the economic condition of the Nation is in a perilous situation, necessitating federalization of unemployment relief;

Whereas Gov. Floyd B. Olson, of the State of Minnesota, has constructive ideas concerning unemployment insurance;

Whereas it is the belief of this legislature that the National Government should set up a national plan of unemployment insurance because unemployment insurance can better be worked out on a Federal plan than on a local one;

Whereas any plan of unemployment insurance could only take effect in the future; and

Whereas the interests of the workers and the farmers are in many States synonymous in that the increased purchasing power of the workers enables them to buy and consume the farmers' products, thereby relieving the farmer as well as the worker of economic distress: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota, That in addition to the Federal unemployment-insurance system proposed, the council of Governors is hereby urgently and respectfully requested to recommend to the new President-elect, Franklin D. Roosevelt, that a system of public works be commenced immediately by the new administration, to be prorated amongst the several States on a basis of population, and that no less sum than $3,500,000,000 be appropriated for such purpose; be it further

Resolved, That Floyd B. Olson, or his representative at said conference, be requested to object to any further appropriations to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the purposes of the past administration, and that Gov. Floyd B. Olson or his representative at said conference is hereby further requested to urge that further use of our Federal public money shall be for the assistance of labor and the farmer whose suffering is the greatest and upon whose prosperity the national well-being depends; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to President-elect Roosevelt; Floyd B. Olson, Governor of the State of Minnesota; newly elected Members of Congress from Minnesota; Senators Henrik Shipstead and Thomas D. Schall; and to the Governors of all the States.

The Minneapolis Tribune of April 11, 1933, reports that Governor Olson's unemployment-insurance measure passed the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota.

Following is a statement which appeared in the Minneapolis Journal in the month of April 1933:

OLSON ASSAILS FARM TAXES—LEVIES ARE "HANG-OVER FROM PIONEER ERA", HE TELLS UNIVERSITY FARM SENIORS

Gov. Floyd B. Olson struck at taxes on farm lands as "a ludicrous and tragic hang-over from the pioneer era" in an address before a graduating class of 64 students at the university school of agriculture last night.

Economists and forward thinking statesmen should see to establishment of income taxes hitting at the higher brackets, he said, easing the levy which now bears so heavily and increasingly on farm lands.

Another statement appeared in the Minneapolis Tribune March 25, 1933, on the State income tax bill advocated by Governor Olson:

STATE INCOME TAX BILL IS PASSED BY HOUSE 102 TO 11

The statutory income tax, with a replacement feature that its author estimates will save propertyowners of the State about $4,000,000 annually, was passed Saturday by the Minnesota house, 102 to 11.

The tax, estimated to net the State about $5,000,000 annually under present-day conditions, is one of the major planks in the Farmer-Labor Party platform, and carries exemptions of $1,200 and $2,000, respectively, for single and married persons, with $250 allowed for each dependent.

Under the replacement feature revenue derived from the tax would care for several tax levies which would be permanently removed from the assessments against general property in the State.

Here is a statement from the Washington Daily News of April 13, 1933:

MINNESOTA GOVERNOR THREATENS TO SEIZE WEALTH TO AID POOR—OLSON SAYS HE WILL INVOKE MARTIAL LAW AND WARNS HE IS MAKING HIS "LAST APPEAL"

ST. PAUL, MINN.—Martial law and confiscation of property in Minnesota are threatened by Gov. Floyd B. Olson unless the State legislature acts on relief legislation.

The Governor told several hundred "bonus marchers" that "if the legislature does not provide for the sufferers, and the Federal Government refuses aid because the State has refused to act and local communities become unable to care for their own, I shall invoke the powers that I hold."

The Governor said he would declare martial law. He said many people fighting relief measures because they possessed wealth "will be brought in by the provost guard" and "will be obliged to give up more than they are giving up now."

He said he was "making his last appeal", and if the legislature failed to act on relief measures, martial law would follow.

Governor Olson blamed the State senate for holding up a bill that would permit communities to expand their bond issues and provide relief.

The Washington Times also featured Governor Olson's speech to the relief marchers:

"ARMED RELIEF" THREATENS IN MINNESOTA—GOVERNOR PROMISES TO CONFISCATE WEALTH IF LEGISLATURE FAILS TO ACT

ST. PAUL, MINN., April 13.—Members of the State legislature today carefully weighed the ultimatum of Gov. Floyd B. Olson in which he threatened to declare martial law and confiscate wealth for relief purposes unless the legislature takes action.

In addressing several hundred relief marchers on the steps of the State capitol, Governor Olson said he was "making a last appeal" and that unless such legislation for relief is passed, he would declare martial law and bring in by provost guard "people now fighting the legislation because they happen to possess considerable wealth."

ATTACKS STATE SENATE

The Farmer-Labor Governor expressed the hope that "the present system of government go right down to hell" if it fails to prevent repetition of existing conditions."

Governor Olson directed his attack against the "conservative" State senate as well as other legislators, charging that measures to provide immediate relief were being held up. The legislature will adjourn here April 19.

He told his audience:

"A bill which would permit local communities to take care of their own situation by lifting the tax restrictions and permitting them to issue bonds for relief work is being held up so far as I know in the Senate."

The Governor threatened possible martial law after stating that there is immediate need for funds to provide food and shelter for the needy. He said:

"I am making a last appeal to the legislature. If the legislature, and the senate in particular, does not make ample provision for the sufferers in the State, who through no fault of their own are in that condition, and the Federal Government refuses to aid, as it properly may because of the refusal of the State legislature to handle the situation, and the communities become unable to take care of the people, I shall invoke the powers I hold and I shall declare martial law.

"TO STAMP OUT MISERY

"People who are now fighting the measures because they happen to possess considerable wealth will be brought in by provost guard and be obliged to give up more than they would now. As long as I sit in the Governor's chair there is not going to be misery in the State if I can humanly prevent it."

Another article appeared in the Washington Herald of April 14, 1933:

GOVERNOR DEMANDS FUNDS TO AID NEEDY

ST. PAUL, April 13.—In a fiery message to the legislature Gov. Floyd B. Olson today asked for authority to use the State's cash and credit in the unemployment-relief emergency, as an alternative to his threat to declare martial law and confiscate wealth "if necessary for the State to take care of its own."

Governor Olson warned that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has indicated it will cease to advance funds "unless the State takes some steps to assist in caring for its own people."

The platform of the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota was advocated and presented to the voters of that State by the Governor in the 1932 campaign:

FARMER-LABOR PLATFORM OF MINNESOTA

PREAMBLE

The Farmer-Labor Party in convention assembled reiterates its faith in the producing classes of our people and we believe that the common people will eventually be able to work out their own salvation.

The capitalistic system is on trial for its life, and the common people must work out a new order of things, set up a new social system under which every man and woman will be guaranteed the right to work and produce that he may enjoy the fruits thereof. We believe that this Nation cannot endure half fed and half starved, half employed and half idle, and that every worker shall be guaranteed the right to enjoy the fruits of his or her own labor.

That the Farmer-Labor Party of Minnesota might do its share toward the working out of a new and just social order, we adopt as our platform for 1932 the following proposals:

1. We demand the passage of the Frazier bill, now pending in Congress, which provides for the liquidation and the refinancing of the farmers' debt at the rate of 1½ percent interest and 1½ percent amortization payment.

We believe that agriculture is entitled to at least as much consideration at the hands of the Federal Government as has already been extended by the Republican administration to banking groups and foreign nations.

2. We endorse the Agricultural Marketing Act and demand its retention. We also demand that Congress make available as a part of the Marketing Act the debenture and the equalization fee in dealing with the exportable surplus of farm products.

3. We renew our loyalty to the principle of home rule and declare, among other things, for the immediate repeal of the iniquitous Brooks-Coleman law.

4. Notwithstanding a clear mandate from the people that the remaining natural resources of this State be conserved under the jurisdiction of a conservation commission, certain Republican State officers are retaining the control of those affairs and sacrificing the public interest in order to perpetuate political and selfish appointments. One of the results of this is that our undeveloped resources are rapidly being taken from the people and exploited by a gigantic lumber industry and millions of idle acres of delinquent lands are being left from useful, tax-producing uses.

If given control of the government of Minnesota, we pledge the people of this State to submit to them an amendment to our constitution that will permit the introduction of the Ontario system of development and administration of electric power and light, thus making electricity—the source of power of the future—man's servant and helper, and not his oppressor and master, as is now the case.

We also pledge our farming population and electrical consumers to enact legislation permitting cities, towns, and villages now owning power and light plants to sell current freely to farms, smaller towns, and villages.

5. The communities of the North, dependent upon the iron-mining industry, are under the heel of an oppressive steel corporation that has foisted iniquitous per-capita limitation laws upon those laboring classes who are dependent upon the mines and communities for their subsistence.

We declare unalterably for the repeal of all such per-capita limitation laws and to safeguard against future legislation that destroys that sacred prerogative of home rule.

6. We deplore the unnecessary delays in the construction of the St. Lawrence waterway and the proper development of the inland rivers touching this State.

We demand immediate constructive action on the part of our Government to develop these inland waterways and to bring the ocean to our land-locked harbors.

7. We favor the establishment and operation of a State-owned printing plant.

8. Big business today seeks to control the nomination of candidates of various political parties through a campaign of fear and coercion, resulting from the voter having to call for his primary ballot.

We declare again for the consolidated primary ballot law that will prevent these abuses, so that the names of all primary candidates of all parties may appear on one uniform ballot.

9. Millions of industrial employees are out of employment, due to no fault of their own.

We demand laws that will provide adequate Federal and State unemployment insurance. Rapidly merging industrial corporations that have benefited tremendously through labor-saving machinery must bear the burden of this protection.

10. Because of the present inadequate protection of the aged and infirm, we hereby demand that legislation be enacted providing for an adequate State-wide old-age pension.

11. We advocate a graduated progressive income tax and demand that the proceeds of such tax be used to reduce the present tax burden of the farmer and the small-home owner.

12. The farmers of this State must have legislation that will provide an adequate tax upon the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, and we declare as a part of our agricultural policy for the speedy enactment of such legislation.

13. We will renew our effort to enact legislation that will impose a graduated tax and special license upon those chain institutions that are destroying the business of thousands of our Minnesota merchants and independent bankers.

14. The service men who defended this country in the trying days of war are not being given fair consideration at the hands of a reactionary national administration.

We demand the immediate cash payment of all soldier bonus claims, to be financed by the issuance of Treasury notes and not to be dependent upon a bond issue.

15. We submit to Minnesotans that the declaration of the last Republican State convention to reduce State expenditures in the amount of $5,000,000 is utterly unwarranted and demagogic in the light of the Republican Party's control of all of the agencies of the State government for a period of nearly 75 years, which control, for political reasons, imposed necessary expenditures upon the present administration in order to care for feeble-minded and other unfortunate wards of the State.

We declare that the present taxes for State purposes are based on appropriations made by a Republican legislature and that under the law as now constituted the Governor is without authority to reduce any such appropriations. We further advocate as a remedy for this condition that a law be enacted granting the Governor the power to reduce appropriations, subject to a review by the legislature in seasonable time.

16. Special interests are fast influencing the activities of some of our legislators. We advocate a law that will compel the registration and regulation of all lobbyists having occasion to attend legislative sessions.

17. Until the time comes when farm loans will be taken over by the Federal Government, under a law like the one proposed in the Frazier bill, we believe that the State funds which have heretofore been invested in State highway bonds and big banking investments should be preferably used for the purpose of financing loans to farmers through the rural credit bureau, the retention of which we demand. We favor restoring State-owned farms to the tax rolls of the communities wherein they are situated.

18. We favor the principle of the initiative and referendum, believing that this Government should again be returned to the people.

19. The Government must meet its responsibility in caring for the millions of unemployed laborers in industry who walk the streets of our cities and smaller towns vainly seeking for a chance to eke out an honest livelihood. A protracted and deplorable unemployment crisis which is the creature of a regime of governmental blundering and reactionary distortion, reflects itself in the earning power of every farmer and laborer in the State of Minnesota. The emergency must be met, and no superficial construction of governmental post offices alone will return these millions into paths of permanent prosperity. We believe that in meeting this emergency a unified and adequate plan of reduced working hours should be undertaken to help alleviate this present deplorable condition.

To the accomplishment of which we urge the support of the entire State ticket and the election of progressive representatives in Congress and the lower house of our legislature.

This letter, written by Governor Olson, was delivered to the President at the Conference of Governors called by President Roosevelt in March 1933:

MY DEAR PRESIDENT: Permit me to congratulate you on your most excellent inaugural address and your keen grasp of the seriousness of our economic crisis. I am sorry that banking conditions in Minnesota made it necessary for me to return home after having started out to attend the Conference of Governors.

I am strongly inclined to the belief that what we are suffering from today is not a depression at all, in the generally accepted use of the term, not one of the customary ups-and-downs of business, but a condition brought about, and naturally so, by an essentially faulty social and economic order.

Our method of distributing wealth is wrong, as witness our inability to utilize the products of the machine for the benefit of the great masses of our people. To say that the industrial and business paralysis is caused by overproduction, by the creation of too much wealth, is in itself an admission that our entire economic structure rests on an error, a house built on a foundation laid in quicksand.

In this crisis, the absence of constructive thought from our leaders in industry would present an element of humor, in view of their previous attacks upon Congress, were it not for the tragedy of having heretofore intrusted our material destinies to them. While it is obvious that the standard of living of the average man and woman must be raised if we are to consume the products of the machine, these leaders have further aggravated conditions by slashing wages and beating down our living standard. And now, with failure so plainly writ for them, they are praying to that same Congress to show them the way out.

It is time that we scrap our industrial and financial leaders. No salvation to the country can come from them. It is time that our economists, who should know what is wrong with the patient, speak out frankly. Let them forget that they have jobs. Let them say some of the things out loud that they are now saying in subdued whispers or merely thinking.

If the so-called "depression" deepens, I strongly recommend to you, Mr. President, that the Government take over and operate the key industries of this country. Put the people back to work. If necessary to relieve public suffering, the Government should not hesitate to go as far as to conscript wealth. The welfare of the public is paramount to all considerations.

Banks have not been operated for the benefit of depositors. The interests of speculative borrowers have been of greater importance. The financial structure of the private money changers became paralyzed on March 4. In fact, if not in law, we are now off the gold standard, which constituted their financial religion. The country is under no obligation to the money changers. Let us rescue the depositors. Stricter regulation, confinement to a regular banking business, and full or partial guaranty of deposits by the Government will accomplish this.

You will pardon me for departing from the outline of your letter. I was inspired to do so by the fearless, plain speaking in your inaugural address.

I submit to you the following recommendations concerning matters within the scope of the agenda outline in your letter of invitation to the conference.

Federal unemployment insurance for concerns doing interstate business, or a Federal tax upon the merchandise of manufacturers in States that have no unemployment insurance law which is shipped into States that have such laws. I do not believe that the present Supreme Court, under present conditions, would follow the child-labor decision.

Employers who come under the provisions of an unemployment insurance law should have the right to deduct a substantial part of the insurance paid out from their income tax, as proposed by Senator WAGNER.

The terms of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act should be enlarged so as to provide, in the use of funds advanced to the States, employment of those out of work who are potentially but not actually "breadliners." As the present law has been interpreted, employment can be given only to those entitled to a dole and only in an amount equal to such dole during a given period.

The Government should not attempt to balance the Budget by reducing the wages of Federal employees, as this would have a tendency to induce private business to do likewise.

Allocation of Federal funds for reforestation, afforestation, and similar purposes in the various States should not be made on the basis of the extent of Federal public domain in the State, as proposed, but rather on the basis of population, unemployment, and conservation needs.

The Federal gasoline tax is an overlapping tax and in reality takes away from the States a source of revenue. From July 1, 1932, to January 1, 1933, the amount of such tax collected was $62,831,826, while the agricultural appropriation bill for the next fiscal year carries only $35,000,000 for the Bureau of Public Roads. The tax should be abolished or, if continued, paid out as direct Federal aid to the States or set up as a balance against the Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans.

The Government should refinance farm mortgages and agricultural drainage bonds at a low rate of interest and over a long period of time by the issuance of currency backed by land security instead of gold.

Legislation should be enacted restricting farm-commodity production, extending a subsidy through a processing tax based on a differential between the buying power of agricultural products and industrial products instead of upon tariff rates.

The Government should undertake the regulation of interstate sale of stocks and securities. This would prevent the perpetuation of the frauds of the past and the pyramiding of stocks and securities of holding companies. This would also operate as a means of holding down utility rates by dealing a blow at watered capital.

I hope, Mr. President, that your administration will find the solution to the pressing problems of today and wish it success and godspeed.

Sincerely,

FLOYD B. OLSON,
Governor of Minnesota.

The Farmer-Labor voters of Minnesota are building the foundation for a new national party. We are glad to present to the people of America the inaugural messages and statements of our Governor and the principles and platform upon which we stand.

EDUCATION AND OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GILLESPIE] to the high school graduating class at White Sulphur Springs, W.Va., on Education and Our Public Schools, on May 25, 1933.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. FRANK GILLESPIE, of Illinois, to the high-school graduating class, White Sulphur Springs, W.Va., May 25, 1933:

Ladies and gentlemen, this is my native heath. Forty years ago, a young man, I went out from my parental home in this place to abide in another imperial State of the Union. I now have pleasure in being afforded an opportunity to speak to this graduating class in the presence of such a splendid audience upon the subject assigned to me.

I am much obliged to my kinsman, Kenneth Gillespie, president of the Rotary Club; Hon. William B. Hines, Hon. A. E. Huddleston, and other friends for the kind reception given me today and for transmuting this rotary and commencement day into a genuine old-time homecoming and reunion.

"O'er scenes like these my memory wakes
And fondly broods with miser care;
Time but the impression deeper makes
As streams their channels deeper wear."

A little while before I came to the platform I was told that there is here one vacant chair. A fortnight ago one of the best-loved members of this class fell asleep. Her name was "Fey"—Fey White. She was a beautiful girl, industrious and ambitious, who merited and received the highest grades of any in her class. None were jealous or envious of her, for she was loved by all; but before she could reach the goal—the stone that marks this commencement day—to which she looked forward with so much of joy, she fell asleep and left a lonely spot against the sky of this class and the many who admired and loved her all of her brief life.

I saw somewhere this thought expressed—maybe that death gives all there is of worth to life, and that death treads from out the paths that lie between our hearts, the weeds of selfishness and hate, and if those we press and strain within our arms could never die, maybe that love would perish from the earth, and I had rather live in a world where death is king and where love is than to have eternal life where love is not.

I have a solemn pride tonight in celebrating with you the memory of this beautiful girl. Her classmates and companions and this community will ever hold her in affectionate memory.

INTRODUCTION

On this commencement day of the old White Sulphur High School, we are come to salute the class of '33, to pay our tribute of respect to the principal, Miss Florence Smith, and her corps of fine teachers; to express our loyalty to the school and our high appraisal of the value of education and our public schools.

Class of 1933, we salute you; this community honors you.

Interesting it would be, but time will not permit even a brief history of your wonderful school.

Through the years I have seen from a distance, with pride and deepest interest, the tremendous progress the White Sulphur High School has made. From a humble beginning it has steadily risen to credit and high rank among the schools of the State and Nation; and, therefore, the diploma conferred upon you tonight is of real value.

Within these 40 years many changes have come over the world; great progress has been made. These 40 years have brought more changes to the world than any other equal period of time. All uncalled there come across the mind the matchless lines of Tennyson:

"Let the great world spin forever
Down the ringing grooves of change."

Moral, political, commercial, and social life have all been affected by these changes.

Into the commercial world came the automobile with its gasoline-driven engine, came the electric street car and the telephone, and crowding on came wireless telegraphy, swiftly followed by the radio, the greatest discovery of all, the most marvelous invention that ever leapt full-fledged Minerva-like from the brain of inventive genius, making artistic and scientific application of the forces of nature—a touch of nature that makes the whole world kin.

I have only cataloged a few of the inventions and discoveries. I have made no mention of ships of the air that carry our commerce and mails as on eagle wings above the clouds, nor of that demon down under the sea—the submarine—that swiftly bears our commerce on its way far below old ocean's surface wave.

God made man in his own image and gave him dominion over the earth, and slowly but surely man is taking unto himself that grant of power and dominion for the good of man.

He has chained the lightning, that writes the will of God upon the heavens, and has enslaved it to do his bidding.

For critical, creative, or educational purpose—that is, to criticize, tear down, to create, entertain, instruct, or educate the artist, the musician, the scientist may exploit that wondrous instrument—stand before the radio and on the instant his words or tones and the harmony he produces are heard around the world. The radio has come to make near neighbors of all the children of men, the children of God, and one may speak to the Antipodes as conveniently and instantly as to a next-door neighbor.

There is today a more urgent call for men and women of character, honesty, and ability than ever before. The political and economic world today is crying aloud for leaders of culture, worth, probity, and honor.

NUMBER ENROLLED

Twenty-eight millions of children are enrolled in our American schools. It has been said if they were placed in a line four abreast and 3 feet apart this line would extend from New York to San Francisco and there would be enough children left over to form a similar line from Chicago to New Orleans. These children make up a fourth of the population of the United States, and the children in number are equal to the population of New York, California, Louisiana, and Illinois. Within a quarter of a century these children and their families will make up the numbers that control the State and the Nation.

The present generation as a controlling force will then be off the political and governing stage.

A century and a half ago our fathers built here a new Nation—the first Republic—and rested the superstructure thereof upon a broad foundation, the heart power, and brain power of a great people.

Nineteen hundred and fourteen came the World War, and most of the Christian nations of the world found themselves again at each other's throats—in the bloody and tragic, primitive, heathen court of trial by physical combat—trial by battle.

A vainglorious European emperor would at last circumscribe and abridge our rights, and it was then that our country crystallized into an army 4,000,000 of American boys and sent them forth, in the uniform of the Republic, to teach the world all o'er again how commonplace it is to die for liberty.

Then within 1 short year victory, as it always has, perched upon our banner. Crowns crumbled, and kings and queens laid down their scepter's wand, and many autocratic governments were transformed into republics.

EDUCATION IN DEMAND

This hour demands educated men and women, cultured in our high schools and colleges.

Every person receives at least two educations, one from the academic schools and the other in the school of experience.

EDUCATION

We first should agree on a definition.

Education is something that fits a man to take his place in the world. An educated man has been instructed in morals, as well as in the arts and sciences.

Wisdom I define as the art of properly applying knowledge. Solomon said, "Happy is the man that findeth wisdom and understanding."

Education has been defined as a process that fits a man to perform justly and skillfully public duties or private offices.

It has been defined as a high word and the preparation for knowledge.

AN EDUCATED MAN MUST POSSESS

The educated man is wise, courteous, tolerant, loyal, ambitious, courageous, cultured, and humorous.

GET WISDOM THEN

The wise man is courteous, tolerant, loyal, ambitious, courageous, humorous, and his whole life is broadened and his culture, it is said, embodies seven things.

TOLERANCE

The educated man, the cultured man, the man of wisdom, is always tolerant. He is cultured enough and has intelligence to see the other man's point of view and to recognize the right of that man to his own honest views.

Burke said that he would make toleration a part of religion.

A great philosopher hearing a man make an assertion said to him, "I do not believe one word you say, but I would fight to the death to maintain your right to say it."

Mark Twain once humorously said, "Nothing so much needs reforming as other people's habits", and what Mark Twain humorously said describes precisely an intolerant man—a selfish man.

John Billings said that he had studied for 20 years to find the best place for a carbuncle. When asked if he had found it he replied, "On the other fellow's neck."

The intolerant man never respects the rights or opinions of another and never is or can become an educated man.

The intolerant or bigoted man is a man without wisdom.

All our wars are the result of intolerance—an attempt to put the carbuncle on the other fellow's neck.

The Pharisees were intolerant.

The rich are intolerant of the poor, and the poor intolerant of the rich. Intolerance has been one of the greatest curses of the earth.

LOYALTY

If there were universal loyalty, the troubles of the world would be solved.

Loyalty to God and man, loyalty to truth and right; then would follow the millennium.

AMBITION

One's ambition must be a worthy ambition, or it will become a curse.

You may be startled, disappointed, and surprised, for the major thing that I here want to impress on this fine class is to avoid selfish ambition—ambition as the word is ordinarily used and as its meaning is commonly understood.

I bid this class in the language of Shakespeare's Cromwell:

"Fling away ambition:
By that sin fell the angels; how can man then,
The image of his Maker, hope to win by it?
Love thyself last; cherish those hearts that hate thee;
Corruption wins not more than honesty.
Still in thy right hand carry gentle peace,
To silence envious tongues. Be just, and fear not:
Let all the ends thou aim'st at be thy country's,
Thy God's, and truth's * * *."

COURAGE

Courage, true courage, is the foundation of all the progress the human race has made.

The coward is neither educated nor wise and is always athwart the path of progress. The coward dies a thousand deaths before his time; the valiant never taste of death but once.

The coward has not the courage of his own opinions. The coward could not understand Emerson's meaning when he said one is a majority on the right side.

We all understand what Shakespeare meant when he said courage mounteth with occasion.

A coward always appears to be brave when he is in the limelight, when he thinks he is in the majority and his courage mounteth with occasion.

Columbus had courage. He was about the only man in his time who believed the earth is round, and because of this belief, all alone he pioneered a pathway over which the human family shall travel for all time to abide in a new and better world.

Humor is the torch that lends light to the mind. If you can see the humorous side, if you can legitimately laugh at or about a thing, you understand that thing. If one possesses a sense of humor, he may meet the vicissitudes of life with greater fortitude. A sense of humor gives one the ease and good nature necessary to form correct judgment on occasions.

Imagination is the greatest gift to man.

The imagination marks the difference between man and the brute kingdom.

Imagination gives one the power to put himself in the place of another. Of this gift justice was born.

Shakespeare's greatest eulogist said of him:

"Shakespeare was the greatest man who ever lived and wrought of words the statues, pictures, robes, and gems of thought, who ever touched this grain of sand and tear we call the world.

"He was an intellectual ocean whose waves touched all the shores of thought, and from which now the isles and continents of thought receive their dew and rain.

"The imagination had a stage within his brain whereon were set all scenes which lie between the morn of laughter and the night of tears, and where the players bodied forth the false and true, the deeps and shallows, and all the mysteries of universal life."

Shakespeare had the gift of imagination beyond all other men and did hold the mirror up to nature.

SMALL THINGS

To this class I say despise not the day of small things. Be wholesomely ambitious, but avoid that vaulting ambition that o'erleaps itself and certainly falls down.

COMMON THINGS

"When thou art invited to a feast sit not down in the highest seat."

Be content to make the best of the position where you find yourself stationed and environed withal.

Remember always that nothing that God hath created is common. I marvel more at just the common things, the majesty, the courage, the fidelity, the loyalty and culture of just the common men than I do at kings.

I do not like the phrase "the common people."

Why call any common?

Call not that common which God hath made in His own image and given dominion over the earth.

None are lowly born. None are common. All are of miraculous birth.

COMMONPLACE

"A commonplace life," we say, as we sigh;
But why should we sigh as we say?
The commonplace sun in the commonplace sky
Makes up the commonplace day.
The moon and the stars are commonplace things;
And the flower that blooms and the bird that sings.
But dark were the world and sad were our lot,
If the flowers had failed and the sun shone not.
And God, who studies each commonplace soul,
Out of commonplace things makes His beautiful whole.

WASHINGTON

Washington's name was written upon no college scroll, and yet he was in the truest sense an educated man. He was courteous, tolerant, loyal, ambitious, more than courageous, and was a wise man of the broadest vision. Patrick Henry said of him for personal knowledge of things and for wisdom that Washington stood head and shoulders above any man on the floor of the First Continental Congress.

Washington was the greatest man who has lived in the last 2,000 years. Compare him with Alexander the Great, Hannibal, Julius Caesar, and Napoleon.

Alexander more than 300 years before this era conquered the world for ambition and died in a drunken debauch proclaiming himself a god, with the world laughing at his absurd claim.

Hannibal, 200 years afterward, a mere boy, led to the altar to swear eternal vengeance against Rome. When he grew to manhood's estate he began a great war with the Roman people and maintained himself for over 20 years with a hostile army on Roman territory. He was finally overcome by the Romans and had to flee for his life and became an outcast and died by poison administered by his own hands, a fugitive from his own country.

Then came Julius Cæsar, 50 years before the Christian era, who conquered a licentious and debauched government and after establishing law, order, and justice died by assassination in the house of his supposed friends.

Next came the great Napoleon, the greatest soldier of the modern world. He, too, conquered all of Europe, but at the zenith of his power he met defeat, was seized by the enemy, sent to a lonely island of the sea where he died of a broken heart beating his broken wings against the barren rocks of St. Helena.

The American Revolution rested upon the courage and the military genius of Washington.

He stepped from his baronial home in Virginia, and on horseback passed through the long wilderness from Mount Vernon to Cambridge, took charge of a ragged colonial Army and never saw his home again for 6 long years.

They fought at Lexington, at Concord, and Bunker Hill. They fought and fought until they drove the British from the city of Boston. They fought at Long Island, they fought on the Delaware, they fought at Brandywine and at Monmouth. They fought along the valleys of great rivers and in the swamps, and upon the mountain sides. They fought in the North and they fought in the South. They fought until Yorktown was achieved and until 12,000 colonial men laid down their lives and until two hundred millions in money was sunk in the cause of liberty.

Our liberty has been purchased at the sacrifice of life and at the expense of a treasure so great that the finite mind cannot comprehend.

We have been engaged in 6 principal wars, 110 conflicts, and nearly 9,000 battles. More than a million and a quarter of men have laid down their lives to build and defend the mighty walls of this Republic.

Washington put his hand to the plow and did not look back until Cornwallis surrendered and a new Nation—a new Government upon a new principle was erected.

CLOSING

In closing I give to you familiar but classic advice. You may be familiar with the words but I give them emphasis:

"* * * Look thou character. Give thy thoughts no tongue,
Nor any unproportion'd thought his act.
Be thou familiar, but by no means vulgar.
Those friends thou hast, and their adoption tried,
Grapple them to thy soul with hoops of steel,
But do not dull thy palm with entertainment
Of each new-hatch'd unfledged comrade. Beware
Of entrance to a quarrel; but being in,
Bear 't, that the opposed may beware of thee.
Give every man thy ear, but few thy voice;
Take each man's censure, but reserve thy judgment.
Costly thy habit as thy purse can buy,
But not express'd in fancy; rich, not gaudy:
For the apparel oft proclaims the man;
Neither a borrower nor a lender be:
For loan oft loses both itself and friend,
And borrowing dulls the edge of husbandry.
This above all: to thine own self be true,
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man."

Our American schools will rid the earth of discourtesy, intolerance, disloyalty, selfish ambition, lack of courage, ill humor, and injustice.

More than a century and a half ago friendly and hostile observers saw our forefathers launch our strange, new, tiny ship of state. Many said she could not ride the waves of such a stormy, tempestuous political sea; but aboard that little craft were seasoned mariners—Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Madison, and others; but of that crew none was a more dauntless navigator than that Columbus of political seas—George Washington, of Virginia.

Ours is now about the oldest Government in the world, and its permanence and persistence is indemnified and secured in perpetuity to our children because of the general education of the people through the medium of our American schools.

In this security we shall escape from the present dungeon of despair, and once again prosperity will be restored to all, and we will be and continue to be the happiest, the freest, and the most prosperous nation on the earth.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, Mr. GAVAGAN (at the request of Mr. KENNEDY of New York) was given leave of absence, on account of illness in his family.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, it was expected that we would have the report on the railroad bill at an early date. It is evident now that if we were to meet tomorrow we would probably have Wednesday or Thursday when there would be no business before the House. So I think it would be proper that the House take a day off tomorrow, as there are many Members who have engagements to speak on Decoration Day and others who want to attend services on that day. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us what will be the program on Wednesday?

Mr. BYRNS. The farm credit bill, for which consent has already been given.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Any other legislation?

Mr. BYRNS. No.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman think that it would be better to meet at 11 o'clock on Wednesday?

Mr. BYRNS. The farm credit bill is rather long, 36 pages in it. If it should become apparent that it ought to be finished Wednesday, it would perhaps be better to meet at 11 o'clock. I will add that to my request.

Mr. RAYBURN. Reserving the right to object, I want to make a statement. The Committee on Interstate Commerce tomorrow will begin consideration of the railroad bill in executive session. Our committee never sits during the sessions of the House. We are hopeful that if we can get tomorrow and Wednesday morning we can report the bill and have it for consideration Thursday and Friday.

If the House should meet at 12, we can get that extra hour and we can report the bill so that it can be considered on Friday and Saturday.

Mr. BYRNS. I think that can be obviated by giving the committee the right to sit on Wednesday during the session of the House.

Mr. RAYBURN. But the committee will not do it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I think the committee would want to sit and hurry up adjournment.

Mr. BYRNS. Between the hour of 11 and 12 there will be nothing but general debate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly, the House under its previous order (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p.m.) adjourned until Wednesday, May 31, 1933, at 11 o'clock a.m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

82. Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, dated May 23, 1933, submitting a report, together with accompanying papers and illustrations, on a preliminary examination and survey of Compton Creek, N.J., authorized by the River and Harbor Act approved July 3, 1930 (H.Doc. Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business: The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE AT ROME, ITALY (S.DOC. NO. 65)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 24, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I earnestly recommend the immediate passage of Senate Joint Resolution 32.

It is my understanding that this legislation has been favorably reported out by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations but that it has not as yet been considered by the Senate. A motion to strike out the enacting clause of a similar bill was carried last Saturday by a small majority in the House. It is obvious from the published debates as they appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the opponents of this legislation entirely misunderstood the purposes of the resolution. The International Institute of Agriculture is not an Italian organization but an international organization founded in pursuance of a convention to which this Government is a party. The purpose of this legislation is not to provide a gratuity for any foreign government nor to provide for a junket for any American citizen. Its purpose is to authorize the appropriations necessary to enable this Government to contribute to the support of the Institute on the same basis as other member governments and to enable this Government to share effectively in the direction of the affairs of the Institute. There is no authorization in this bill for any appropriations for purposes other than those which I have specified.

Defeat of this legislation would place this Government in an exceedingly embarrassing position. We should be faced with the alternative of (1) continuing to pay our contribution to the institute in paper francs when the other governments' members of the institute were paying in gold francs and taking no part in the direction of the institute; or (2), denouncing the convention of 1905 and withdrawing from the institute.

Either of these courses of action would result in placing the institute in a precarious financial situation which would result in seriously crippling the organization. Thus this Government would be obliged to expend a far greater sum in order to obtain the services now rendered by the institute. Neither of these courses of action would be in accordance with the fair dealing and good faith which should characterize all of the foreign relations of this Government.

The International Institute of Agriculture is rendering an important service to American agriculture.

1. As a clearinghouse of statistical information, collecting and publishing statistics from all parts of the world, it is giving all the member governments the benefit of the information collected by the government services of all the members of the institute.

2. As an international organization, it is in a position to persuade the various governments to build up their statistical services in the common interest.

3. As an international forum, it serves as a meeting place for discussion of the broader phases of the agricultural situation of interest to farmers everywhere.

It is only just that we should pay our fair share of the expenses of this organization. With renewed American support and with American participation in the direction of its affairs, we look forward to deriving increased benefits from our membership in the institute.

I am sending similar letters to Senator PITTMAN and Senator ROBINSON of Arkansas.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Hon. JOHN NANCE GARNER,
President of the Senate, Washington, D.C.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Senate Joint Resolution 20 (by Mr. Powell)

Joint resolution memorializing the President and Congress of the United States to construct a ship canal across the State of New Jersey from Raritan Bay to the Delaware River at a point near the head of navigation, and providing for the appointment of a committee to further this project

Whereas an inland-waterways system has been provided along the entire Atlantic coast with the exception of the short distance through the State of New Jersey, for which project the State of New Jersey has heretofore appropriated considerable money for the acquisition of the right of way, and has from year to year reappropriated said moneys, and the State of New Jersey has been and still is ready and willing to furnish the right of way for such canal in accordance with the representations heretofore made to the Federal Government; and

Whereas in the interests of commerce and the national defense such ship canal is a necessary and worthy improvement and one such as is contemplated to be completed under the comprehensive program of the President of the United States; and

Whereas, pursuant to the direction of the last Congress, the United States Corps of Army Engineers is now ready to proceed with 74 percent of the work on such canal and will be ready to proceed with the balance of said work by July 1, which said Engineer Corps has unlimited experience in large-scale work of this nature and can start work immediately upon this project; and

Whereas the construction of such canal would provide employment for a very large number of men near the greatest center of unemployment in this country, a large portion of the work being of such nature that it can be done by hand labor; and

Whereas the immediate construction of such canal would in large measure contribute to the early return of prosperity: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey:

1. That the President and Congress of the United States are hereby memorialized and requested to provide a sufficient sum of money to construct a ship canal across the State of New Jersey from Raritan Bay to the Delaware River, at a point near the head of navigation, upon a right of way to be furnished by this State.

2. That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States from the State of New Jersey.

3. That a committee of 3, 1 to be appointed by the governor, 1 to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and 1 to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, be constituted to further this project and to personally present the same to the President of the United States, the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives for the United States from the State of New Jersey, and to take such other steps as to such committee shall seem proper.

4. This joint resolution shall take effect immediately.

Approved April 27, 1933.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by members and guests of the Pennsylvania Committee for Total Disarmament, assembled at the house of Mrs. Walter Cope, Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the institution by Congress of a searching inquiry into the munitions business of the country, making public the net profits, the expenses for advertising and propaganda, the contributions to political parties and indebtedness to banks, together with a full list of stockholders, and so forth, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PROTEST RELATIVE TO CURTAILMENT OF VETERANS' BENEFITS

Mr. WHEELER presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting at Polson, Mont., which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At a mass meeting held in the county courthouse at Polson, Mont., May 23, 1933, representatives of between three and four hundred ex-service men in Lake County, representing the American Legion, Spanish War Veterans, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Regular Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"That we protest the provisions of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, called the 'Economy Act', insofar as it affects veterans' pensions and compensation.

"The majority of veterans receiving these payments depend entirely on them for their living. To deprive them of these pensions at this time will place a terrible burden on the communities in which they live, and in this county alone will double the number of people who will have to receive county aid.

"We urge that Congress take immediate steps to repeal this inhuman and un-American act.

"To relieve the emergency that now exists we urge the payment of the soldiers' bonus."

Committee.

THE WORLD COURT

Mr. REED presented a letter embodying resolutions adopted by the Sixty-second Convention of the Bethlehem Diocese of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Pennsylvania, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILKES-BARRE, PA., May 11, 1933.

Hon. DAVID REED,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR REED: The Diocese of Bethlehem of the Protestant Episcopal Church, consisting of the Counties of Bradford, Susquehanna, Wayne, Wyoming, Lackawanna, Luzerne, Monroe, Pike, Carbon, Schuylkill, Lehigh, Northampton, Lebanon, and Berks, of the State of Pennsylvania, at its sixty-second convention, May 9 and 10, 1933, adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas the Senate, in 1926, by a vote of 76 to 17 approved the adherence of the United States to the World Court with five reservations; and

"Whereas these reservations are fully met, in the judgment of the Department of State, and of such authoritative bodies as the American Bar Association, by the three treaties now awaiting the Senate's consent to ratification; and

"Whereas both the Democratic and the Republican national platforms last year endorsed the completion of our entry into the Court under the pending treaties, thus making it clear that the Court is outside the realm of partisan political controversy; and

"Whereas the completion of our adherence to the World Court at this time would be calculated to encourage a feeling of stability both at home and abroad: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Bethlehem Diocese of the Protestant Episcopal Church commends the support of the Court already shown by Senator REED and urges both Senator REED and Senator DAVIS to use their best efforts toward ensuring ratification of the World Court treaties before the close of the special session; and be it further

"Resolved, That Senator REED is hereby requested to read this resolution into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD."

By order of the convention.

HAROLD D. DEEMER,
Secretary.

REPORT OF THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the joint resolution

(H.J.Res. 93) to prohibit the exportation of arms or munitions of war from the United States under certain conditions, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 101) thereon.

BILL INTRODUCED

Mr. TRAMMELL introduced a bill (S. 1800) to provide for an investigation and report of losses resulting from the campaign for the eradication of the Mediterranean fruit fly by the Department of Agriculture, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

AMENDMENTS TO INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BLACK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 5389, the independent offices appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

Amend the bill by substituting for the figures "$1,000,000", on page 49, line 7, the figures "$2,000,000", and by striking out the period on line 8 and substituting a colon, and by adding thereafter the following: "Provided, That one half of $2,000,000 so appropriated shall be used for supplying hospital treatment for veterans without regard to whether their disability was service-connected or not."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 5389, the independent offices appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 50, after line 25, to insert the following:

"INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE

"The sum of $48,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the expenses of participation by the United States in the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, Italy, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State in the following manner:

"(1) Not to exceed the equivalent in United States currency of 192,000 gold francs for the payment of the quota of the United States for the support of the institute, including the shares of the Territory of Hawaii, and of the dependencies of the Philippine Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

"(2) Not to exceed $5,000 for the salary of a United States member of the permanent committee of the International Institute of Agriculture.

"(3) Not to exceed $5,500 for rent of living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (46 Stat. 818); compensation of subordinate employees without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended; actual and necessary traveling expenses; and other contingent expenses incident to the maintenance of an office at Rome, Italy, for a United States member of the permanent committee of the International Institute of Agriculture."

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND THE RULES

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I send to the desk notice of a motion to suspend the rule. It is presented in order that I may offer an amendment to the Economy Act relating to Spanish War veterans. I want it read and filed.

The Chief Clerk read the notice of motion, as follows:

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI, for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H.R. 5389), the independent offices appropriation bill, the following amendment, viz: At the proper place insert the following:

"Subsection (b) of section 1 of the act approved March 20, 1933, entitled 'An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government' is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(b) Any person who served in the active military or naval service during the Spanish-American War, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, or the World War, and who is permanently disabled as a result of injury or disease: Provided, That nothing contained in this title shall deny a pension to any such veteran past the age of 62 years entitled to a pension under existing law, but the President may not reduce the amount of the pension of any such person more than 25 percent below the rate of pay provided by law previous to the passage of this act.'"

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 5690. An act to legalize the manufacture, sale, or possession of 3.2 percent beer in the State of Oklahoma when and if the same is legalized by a majority vote of the people of Oklahoma or by an act of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma; and

H.J.Res. 192. Joint resolution to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 48) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point, Posheng Yen, a citizen of China, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5012) to amend existing law in order to obviate the payment of 1 year's sea pay to surplus graduates of the Naval Academy; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. VINSON of Georgia, Mr. DREWRY, and Mr. BRITTEN were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

INSTRUCTION OF POSHENG YEN, A CITIZEN OF CHINA, AT WEST POINT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DICKINSON in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 48) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point, Posheng Yen, a citizen of China, which were, on page 1, line 5, after the word "Point", to insert "for the course beginning not later than July 1, 1934", and on page 2, line 8, after the word "suspended", to insert a colon and the following additional proviso: "Provided further, That Senate Joint Resolution 179, approved March 3, 1933, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

INCOME-TAX ASSESSMENTS, PAYMENTS, AND REFUNDS

Mr. REED. Mr. President, yesterday the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] offered a resolution calling for an investigation of tax returns of a number of companies in which former Secretary Mellon was interested. I think it would be interesting to the Congress and to the country to bear in mind that Mr. Mellon for many years has been urging such an amendment of the income tax law as would make impossible the deduction of capital losses from taxable income; and I send to the desk, and ask to have referred to the Committee on Finance and printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, an editorial from the New York Evening Sun of last Saturday, entitled "Mr. Mellon's Warning."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCGILL in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

[From the New York Evening Sun, May 27, 1933]

MR. MELLON'S WARNING

Ten years ago Andrew W. Mellon, then Secretary of the Treasury, sent to the Ways and Means Committee a number of recommendations for Federal tax reform. Some were adopted; one that was rejected was Mr. Mellon's proposal to limit capital losses to 12½ percent of the loss. That would have put capital losses on all fours with capital gains in income-tax returns. The Secretary's belief was that neither gain nor loss of this kind should be considered. This he advocated in his book "Taxation: The People's Business", published in 1924, in which he said:

"I believe that it would be sounder taxation policy generally not to recognize either capital gain or capital loss for purposes of income tax. This is the policy adopted in practically all other countries having income-tax laws, but it has not been the policy in the United States. In all probability more revenue has been lost to the Government by permitting the deduction of capital losses than has been realized by including capital gains as income."

If the Government had not been a loser on that score up to 1924, the time was not far ahead when it would be, as the evidence in the Morgan investigation has so clearly shown. It is no surprise to the demagogues that the Morgan partners paid taxes of $11,000,000 on their incomes of 1929, but Senator ROBINSON of Indiana calls it "a definite shock to the Nation" that the partners paid no income taxes for 1931. Yet the law was there, known to all who would look at it, and the warning of Secretary Mellon and other sound economists should not have been neglected. The fact that J. P. Morgan paid income taxes in England in a year when he had to pay none here simply carries us back to Mr. Mellon's reminder that this country was alone in its policy of recognizing capital gains and capital losses in the computation of income taxes.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION AND PROBLEMS OF RECONSTRUCTION

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on May 4 and 5 there was held in Washington a Citizens' Conference on Vocational Education and the Problems of Reconstruction. In view of the increased importance of vocational education in this time of depression, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the report of the committee on program and plan of that conference.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The extraordinary economic conditions existing throughout the country have created new demands upon every agency of social welfare. Millions of people are out of work. Millions more have only part-time employment. These conditions have resulted in wide-spread poverty. The public is called upon to feed nearly one fifth of the people of the country because they do not have access to the means of earning a livelihood. Low prices for agricultural products are forcing large numbers of farmers to an inadequate standard of living, and farm bankruptcies and evictions are widespread. The depleted resources of the home have reduced millions of families to an appallingly low level of existence. These conditions of destitution and want faced by large numbers of the people must be met with understanding and constructive planning. It is the duty of society to see that people are fed, clothed, and sheltered, but relief should be constructively planned. Every available agency that may help to that end should be used.

The most deplorable result upon the individual of enforced unemployment or of eviction from his property is his loss of self-confidence. Poverty resulting in destitution deprives a man of spirit and self-respect. Men and women who experience the feeling of being unwanted by society and useless to themselves and their families become a serious social problem.

The times demand emergency relief measures, but they also demand measures looking toward reconstruction that will minimize the effects of relief and lessen the future necessity for relief. Such measures are more likely to succeed if they are accompanied by other measures that will develop in people the desire and the ability to make themselves, as far as the intricacies of modern life permit, economically and socially self-sufficient citizens.

Opportunities to make these measures effective should be conveyed through an agency immediately and universally available to the lowliest unemployed of our cities and the most remote of our distressed rural people. Such an agency is our educational system, and particularly the Nation-wide system of vocational schools and extension work. Increasing emergency demands for service are being made upon this agency. Relief workers are finding the Nation-wide vocational-training organization most helpful in carrying out many of the constructive parts of their program.

From all over the country come reports of the coordination of vocational education and extension work with emergency activities such as:

1. The training of home makers to maintain decent standards of living and family morale on reduced family incomes and with increased family dependents.

2. Training skilled wage earners to meet new employment demands.

3. Training farmers to raise more of the products their families need for food; to repair farm and household equipment; and to adapt their business to changed production and marketing conditions.

4. Reviving the old home crafts to supplement the reduced income and to make the city and rural homes more attractive and self-sufficient.

5. Retraining of unemployed workers in related newly developing occupations.

6. Creating a program of home-making education, flexible enough to serve the present emergency as well as the future needs of all types of homes, as a social responsibility.

7. Training of the wandering and the idle and unadjusted youth to make profitable use of their enforced and otherwise wasted leisure.

8. Training the unemployed as well as the employed for helpful and constructive use of leisure and at the same time for the possible promotions and changes in occupation for which self-improvement always prepares. This is being accomplished through improvement in English; through the study of the literature by which the world has expressed itself; through musical training and activities such as chorus, orchestra, and band, and individual playing; and through training in the appreciation and creation of beauty in some of its many forms.

9. Training unemployed and partially employed workers in gardening and home improvement.

10. Temporarily, at least, adjusting to a more nearly balanced rural life the vast army returning from the cities to the farms and making provision for their better employability, whether or not they remain on the land.

11. Rehabilitating the vocationally as well as the physically handicapped to economic self-support.

12. Training to conserve the morale and health of the unemployed worker through avocational, vocational, cultural, and recreational opportunities, including wholesome sports, games, and physical exercise.

13. Dissemination of usable information regarding occupations and the requirements and opportunities for employment therein.

14. Cooperation with other existing agencies in the placement of the unemployed and dispossessed workers.

15. Emergency training of workers in new processes and devices.

Many of the measures listed above were already a part of the vocational education system before the present emergency arose. These should be continued, together with other measures which demonstrate their value, as adjuncts of education in the period of readjustment and also in the years further ahead. Whatever of sound practice is developed in the present emergency should become a part of a permanent plan. Time will indicate what measures are permanently useful.

A LONG-TIME PROGRAM FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

Consideration of what must constitute a long-time program of vocational education must give due weight to the following fundamental propositions, among others, which were always discernible, but are now being driven home by the bitter lessons since 1929, and which would seem to be more essential to the reconstruction immediately ahead and for the long-time program thereafter than they ever have been in the past:

1. By some means, doubtless voluntary, the initiative, perhaps varying from community to community, there must be brought about a general coordination of all forms of general and vocational education, extension, and correspondence services and training, libraries and agencies for the finding and dissemination of occupational knowledge, vocational information and advisement services, placement agencies, occupational and labor regulatory bureaus, juvenile protective agencies, correctional institutions, clinics, agencies for the relief of distress and all other similar services, on the one hand, with industrial, labor, business, agricultural, and home activities, on the other, to the end that our country may reap the maximum in self-sufficient, intelligently cooperative citizens of usefully diversified talents.

2. In view of the startling accelerating pace with which inventions, technological developments, mechanizations, business and human efficiencies, shifting styles and tastes, marketing demands and methods, revolutions in transportation and communication, international relationships, and other inexorable forces are wiping out old occupations and creating new ones; changing the processes, the implements, the points of view of all occupations; casting on the human economic scrap heap those who do not change with their changing vocations, as well as those disabled by accidents and occupational diseases; and supplanting the common laborers with technicians who build, control, and maintain machines and automatic processes, society through its educational system must increasingly make vocational and general training facilities available to the adolescent boys and girls, in school and out of school, and to the men and women, idle or working on the farm, in the home, the store, the office, or the factory, wherever, whenever, and in whatever form they may need it to rehabilitate and readjust themselves to these otherwise overwhelming changes.

The requirements upon the general and vocational educational systems to fulfill the propositions above may be summarized as follows:

1. The rapidly changing conditions and demands in the industrial, agricultural, and commercial fields, which are reflected in the home life of our people require coordinated adjustments of all agencies—public as well as personal and private—to assist in giving information and providing training which will adapt the individual to the continuing changes.

2. The public and social service of the vocational schools to be adequate and just should be based on a broad program of general education, especially in the social sciences, so that the individual may understand and enjoy life and build thereon broad and accurate vocational understanding and efficiency.

3. The full-time curriculum for general education should be broadened and enriched to appeal to the wide range of tastes and talents of young people in order to retain them under educational influences as long as possible.

4. The vocational system is incomplete which does not provide for continuation education which will enable the individual to enjoy opportunities for richer culture and greater satisfaction, for self-improvement and advancement in his calling, and for the acquisition of correct habits of living and right attitudes of citizenship.

5. The vocational programs should recognize that practical experience and training before employment will aid the individual to discover and develop his occupational interests and aptitudes.

6. Experiences and training of youth in general education should help to develop technic and skill in choosing an occupation, securing a job, winning promotion, and planning and realizing a career for which they are fitted.

7. Education should be developed to promote the prevention of disabling accidents and for the restoration, so far as possible vocationally, of the victims of accidents.

8. All of the services of vocational education should be available as a social service, through schools, and extension and library services in such measures as may be necessary, so as to enable the individual to prepare for work and for promotion and growth and to meet the changing problems of the farm, home, office, and shop.

SPECIAL PROBLEMS OF AGRICULTURE

We are in agreement with the great national farm, commercial, and industrial organizations of this country in recognizing that the return of a permanent national prosperity is largely dependent upon a return of a prosperous agriculture. We, therefore, recognize the special need for including in our vocational program for adolescent and adult farmers:

1. The utility of and necessity for agricultural organization, without which the agricultural industry of this country can never have a national viewpoint.

2. The teaching in practical fashion of our national problems in economics and government such as tariffs, taxation, marketing, transportation, international relationships, money problems, and the like, with which national farm organizations are constantly confronted. The fundamentals of these economic questions should be taught without promoting any particular plan.

3. The teaching of production problems from the standpoint of efficiency, dealing especially with production costs, quality products, and proper distribution in keeping with domestic and foreign demands.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, the conference places itself on record as believing that a system of education carries out the spirit of the "new deal" only when it provides adequate vocational training service for the rank and file of our people, rural and urban, juvenile and adult, and employed and unemployed.

Ultimately society must pay in dollars and cents for an inadequate and incomplete education program. Economic security, social adjustments, and even the maintenance of the civic order depend upon satisfactory employment and the contentment which goes with it. "Defective things can be thrown on the scrap pile, but with ruined people we must live. Human beings will either be on the work roll, the pauper roll, or with the mob. We may choose, if we choose early."

NOTE.—The foregoing report of the committee on program and plan of the Citizens Conference on Vocational Education and Problems of Reconstruction was submitted to the conference at its business session, Friday afternoon, May 5, 1933, at Washington, D.C., and adopted by unanimous vote.

LABOR CONDITIONS IN KENTUCKY

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the president of District 19, of the United Mine Workers of America, Tennessee, relating to labor conditions in Kentucky, together with the letter enclosed by him.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA,
DISTRICT 19,
Jellico, Tenn., May 6, 1933.

Hon. ALBEN BARKLEY,
Member United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: For your information I am enclosing a mimeographic copy of a communication I received from Harlan, Ky., under date of April 29, 1933, postmarked Harlan, Ky., 6 p.m.

It is my information that for some time past a system or condition of sending threatening and anonymous letters has existed in Harlan County, and I would most respectfully urge upon you the necessity of taking this matter up with the proper authorities, and see whether or not an investigation or an investigator be placed on the job in and around Harlan to stop such threatening and anonymous communications going through the mail.

It is my intention to give reply to this through our local labor papers, which will be distributed throughout southeastern Kentucky, of which I will furnish you a copy. I firmly believe the time has arrived when those responsible for such attacks made on a man's character in Harlan County should be stopped, and they should be advised, that Harlan County is still a part of the Commonwealth of Kentucky and the United States.

May I suggest, so as other sections of our country may have some knowledge of the situation as it really exists in Harlan County, that you have this communication read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Trusting you will give this matter the attention it merits, I am

Very truly yours,

WM. TURNBLAZER.

APRIL 29, 1933.

WILL TURNBLAZER,
Jellico, Tenn.

SIR: A good friend from Bell County tells us that you have been holding meetings with the miners in Pineville again. This can mean only one thing—that you want to get some more good men killed and cost the county several thousand dollars. If you think you can get away with this once more, you have another guess coming. It will be a great deal cheaper to put you and Milt Harbin about 6 feet under the ground in a pine box. The laboring men don't want you, because they have no faith in you, and certainly no one else does, and if you don't believe that business is business, just try your luck up this way.

Log Mountain or Emanuel Hill would not be a bad place to meet you, and it won't be difficult to arrange the meeting. It's a pity that you cannot be handcuffed to Hightower and Jones. You are as guilty as they, and you know it. Advertise your next Pineville meeting, and we won't be far away and will meet you for a little party afterward.

Yours for a one-way ride.

THREE OF US.

THE INTERPARLIAMENTARY UNION

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a sketch of the Interparliamentary Union by Arthur Deerin Call, permanent executive secretary of the United States group, entitled "Parliament of Man."

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Interparliamentary Union is a substantial answer to the frequent charge that the United States Congress in particular is parochially minded and impotent and that legislative bodies in general are uninformed when not unconcerned about international affairs.

I

Foreigners are gradually learning that the legislative branch of the United States Government can never, as often charged, be "isolationist" in theory or in fact when major international questions are before the country.

The foreign policies of the United States have been dependent from the start upon the will of the Senate and often of the House of Representatives. The Constitution of the United States, framed by men keenly anxious to avoid the evils of war, provided from the beginning that the President shall have power to make treaties, appoint the country's representatives abroad, including ambassadors, ministers, and consuls, only with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Federal Convention of 1787 considered treaties and the Government's representatives abroad of such vital relation to the life and liberty of the Federal Union they proposed to set up that they insisted each of the States of the Union should have an equal voice in their determination. Furthermore, by arranging that all bills for raising revenue must originate in the House of Representatives that body, too, was placed in position to alter or block treaties and to shape or modify the Nation's foreign policies, especially those affecting tariffs, immigration, foreign commerce and postal laws, military activities, and, indeed, war itself. The responsibilities of the Congress, which, of course, includes both the Senate and the House, in all matters affecting the country's foreign policies constitute, therefore, a major fact in the development of the United States.

As is well known, this division of responsibility for the establishment and control of foreign policies between the executive and legislative branches has in the main proved to be beneficent; the evil effects of secrecy, for example, have never been able to get very far under such a system.

Yet it is charged by more than one authority that our legislative body is "so large", "so slow in action", indeed, so "ill-informed on foreign relations", that achievement in those fields is often seriously hampered. In varying degrees similar criticisms are made against all parliaments, sometimes against the parliamentary system itself. An encouraging evidence that parliamentarians are neither ignorant nor unmindful of these charges, however, is the Interparliamentary Union, now 45 years of age and about to hold its twenty-ninth conference next October in the city of Madrid.

II

As formerly stated, the purpose of this instrument for the enlightenment and cooperation of parliamentarians from every quarter of the globe is to unite in common action the members of all parliaments constituted into national groups, in order to secure the cooperation of their respective states in the firm establishment and the democratic development of the work of international peace and cooperation between nations. At the beginning the avowed purpose was to promote arbitration as an effective method of settling international disputes and avoiding international wars. Increasingly since its foundation in 1888 its further object has been to study all questions of an international character suitable for settlement by parliamentary action.

III

The principle of arbitration, stood for by the Interparliamentary Union through all these years, was of course thoroughly understood and widely applied by the ancient world. Its introduction into the modern practice of states, however, is generally acknowledged to have begun in 1794, when Mr. Chief Justice John Jay as special envoy of the United States to Great Britain signed the first treaty under the Constitution of the United States. This "Jay Treaty" contained a plan of submitting to a mixed commission differences between Great Britain and the United States which diplomacy might fail to adjust. It is thus that the United States began its long course in the cause of arbitration.

It remained for a president of the American Peace Society—Judge William Jay, son of John Jay—to extend the principle of abritration by persuading governments to include in their treaties an agreement not to resort to hostilities but to submit controversies arising under a treaty to the arbitration of one or more friendly powers and to abide by the award. As a result, this "clause compromissoire", as it is called, found its way into treaty after treaty. Then, too, William Ladd, founder in 1828 of the American Peace Society, suggested a congress of nations "to settle and perfect the code of international law", and a high court of nations "to interpret and apply that law for the settlement of all international disputes." William Jay's proposal and William Ladd's plan were presented to many international peace conferences held in Europe during the mid-decades of the last century, where both were "adopted and passed." Indeed, through those decades they were generally known throughout Europe as "the American plan."

It was, however, the more restricted and immediately practical principle of arbitration out of which the idea of an interparliamentary cooperation grew and took shape. It is known that the Baron of Walterskirchen, a member of the Austrian Chamber of Deputies, suggested shortly after and because of the Franco-Prussian War that there should be a greater cooperation between members of the different parliaments. The successful arbitration in 1872 of the Alabama Claims aroused a new and natural interest throughout the parliaments of the world in the wider use of treaties of arbitration.

As far back as 1849, Richard Cobden, well-known statesman and economist, had introduced in the British House of Commons a resolution favoring international arbitration. On July 9, 1873, Henry Richard moved in the House of Commons a resolution urging that the Queen of England be asked "to enter into communication with foreign powers with a view to further improvement in international law and the establishment of a general and permanent system of arbitration." Notwithstanding the unusual bitterness throughout Europe at that time, the motion was carried. In the autumn of 1875, Dr. Albert Fischoff proposed at a meeting of Austrian and Hungarian delegations that steps be taken to hold annual conferences of parliamentarians with the view of reducing the "heavy burden of standing armies." On October 31, 1887, a delegation of British members of Parliament presented to President Cleveland at the White House in Washington a memorial, addressed to our President and Congress, signed by 232 members of the British Parliament, in favor of a treaty of arbitration between Great Britain and the United States.

It was William Randal Cremer, a Labor member of the British Parliament, who headed that delegation to Washington in 1887. The next year, with the aid of Frédéric Passy, widely known economist and member of the French Chamber of Deputies, Cremer brought about in Paris, 1 year to a day after the interview at the White House, a meeting of 24 French and 9 British parliamentarians. Cremer's object was to promote arbitration treaties between France and the United States, on the one hand, and between Great Britain and the United States, on the other. In those days no one would have dared to suggest an arbitration treaty between France and Great Britain. The net result of that Paris meeting in 1888 was a vote that "another meeting, to which shall be admitted not only members of the three parliaments named above (American, British, and French), but also members of other parliaments who have made themselves known by their devotion to the same ideas, shall take place next year in order to complete the work begun at this first Conference." Thus it was that on the last day of October 1888 was born, at the Grand Hotel in Paris, "The Interparliamentary Conference for International Arbitration", to be named later—in 1899, to be exact—the Interparliamentary Union.

The meeting called for in that Paris Resolution of 1888 was held during the World Exposition, in the Salle de Fêtes of the Hotel Continental, Paris. There came to that conference nearly 100 representatives from 9 different parliaments, as follows: 56 French, 28 British, 5 Italian, and 1 from each of the following parliaments: Belgium, Denmark, Hungary, Liberia, Spain, and the United States, which was represented by Mr. William Whiting of Massachusetts. M. Frédéric Passy presided over this, the first of the interparliamentary conferences, and M. Jules Simon, former Premier of France, opened the meeting with an address; but the propelling force throughout was William Randal Cremer.

The conference passed a number of resolutions, one of which sets forth the fundamental spirit of the Interparliamentary Union even as it is today. This resolution contained these words: "The Congress of Governments tending to become more and more only the expression of ideas and sentiments voiced by the body of citizens, it is for the electors to lead the policy of their country in the direction of justice, of right, and of the brotherhood of nations."

From the beginning, the Interparliamentary Union has had the earnest support of the ablest and most practical of statesmen.

William Randal Cremer, born in 1828, began his career as pitchboy in a shipyard at 2 shillings a week. He then served 6 years as an apprentice in the building trade. As a carpenter, he became interested in the International Working Men's Association, and in 1871 organized the Workmen's Peace Association. When 57 years of age, Cremer was elected to Parliament, where his first ambition was to bring about an arbitration treaty between Great Britain and the United States, with the view that such a precedent would surely be followed by other nations. He was backed in his ambition by some of the best-known men in the British Parliament, such as Mr. Asquith, Mr. Bright, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Morley, Mr. Haldane, Sir Edward Grey, Sir John Lubbock, and others, all of whom signed the memorial which Cremer brought to the President and Congress of the United States in 1887.

Cremer journeyed to the United States four times in the interest of arbitration and understanding between England and this country.

William Randal Cremer is acknowledged as the father of the Interparliamentary Union. For his services to that organization President Carnot, of France, decorated him in 1890 with the Legion of Honor and, upon the initiative of Prime Minister Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, King Edward VII, of England, later bestowed upon him the order of knighthood. In 1903 Cremer received the Nobel peace prize, amounting to about $45,000. Comparatively poor though he was, he forthwith gave all this money to his International Arbitration League, which still exists with headquarters in London.

Beginning in 1892, the Interparliamentary Union had for 17 years as its honorary general secretary Dr. Albert Gobat, member of the Swiss Parliament. In 1902 the Nobel peace prize was divided between Dr. Gobat and M. E. Ducommun. In 1901 Frédéric Passy, who had aided Cremer with his interparliamentary plans from the start, shared with M. Henri Dunant, founder of the Red Cross, the Nobel peace prize.

Other early supporters of the Union were such men as M. Léon Bourgeois and Jean Jaurés, of the French Parliament; Mr. Philip Stanhope, afterwards Lord Weardale, of the British Parliament, for many years president of the council of the union; Frederick Bajer, of the Danish Parliament, destined in 1908 to be honored also by the Nobel peace prize.

Cremer having died July 22, 1908, and Dr. Gobat having also passed on, the headquarters of the Union were moved from Berne to Brussels, and in 1909 Dr. Christian L. Lange, well-known linguist and educator of Norway, was elected secretary general of the Interparliamentary Union. The growth of the union since has been due mainly to the energy and personality of this man. In 1921 he and K. H. Branting, of the Swedish Parliament, shared together the Nobel peace prize. After 24 years of able and untiring service, Dr. Lange will retire from his position on June 30 of this year, 1933, when he will be succeeded by Dr. Leopold Boissier, of Switzerland.

M. Fernand Bouisson, President of the French Chamber of Deputies, is president of the Interparliamentary Union Council and chairman of the executive committee, nearest approach there is to a president of the Interparliamentary Union. His predecessors in this office have been Auguste Beernaert, former Prime Minister of Belgium; Lord Weardale, who assisted in the formation of the union; and Baron Theodor Adelswaerd, president of the Swedish group. The other members of the executive committee are at this writing Dr. L. Moltesen, of Denmark, due to retire in 1933; M. Cicio Pop, of Rumania, due to retire in 1934; the Duke of Sutherland, of the British House of Lords, due to retire in 1935; and Hon. Andrew J. Montague, of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, whose term will expire in 1936.

The organization of the Interparliamentary Union is comparatively simple. It starts with the national groups, of which there are some 40, ranging alphabetically from Allemagne to Venezuela. Each group, limited to members of the parliament, possesses its own organization, with its bylaws, officers, and committees.

Delegates from these groups make up the international conferences, where only they take part and where usually everyone seems anxious to speak; indeed, one attending these conferences is often forcefully reminded that the name "parliament" harks back to a French word meaning "to speak." Each group, however, is entitled only to a limited number of votes, a minimum of five, additional votes being allowed on the basis of the State's population. Furthermore, each group with a membership of 50 percent of the lower house is entitled to another extra vote; if 60 percent, 2; 75 percent, 3; 90 percent, 4 extra votes. The voting in the conferences is usually by a show of hands, although any delegate has the right to demand a vote by roll call. If 20 or more members demand it, the election of officers has to be by secret ballot.

Since the Christiania Conference of 1899, the governing body of the Union has been the council, composed of two members from each group. This is the body that fixes the agenda for the conference, determines the time and place of the meeting, drafts the budget, nominates officers, and functions generally as a governing body should.

In 1908 a permanent chairman was provided for the council, to be assisted by an executive committee of five, including the chairman; each of the remaining four being elected for a period of 4 years upon nomination by the council and vote of the conference. This is the inner circle that prepares the work for the council and controls the central office.

This central office is known as the interparliamentary bureau, with headquarters formerly at Berne, then at Brussels, from 1914 to 1920 at Christiana, and now at 6, rue Constantin, Geneva, Switzerland. It is this bureau that deals directly with the groups, prepares publications, and carries on the technical work of administration.

It has been found that this kind of organization usually operates successfully even under the most trying of circumstances. If, for example, some highly controversial question breaks forth in one of the conferences, it can be "referred to the council" for its advice. If it proves to be too provocative for the council, it can be further delayed by referring it to the executive committee. By the time, however, it reaches the executive committee it is usually cooled down below the point of explosion. Often by that time the whole thing is quite forgotten. Thus the organization enables the union to weather the storms.

There is, too, still another phase of the organization that makes for smoothness and efficiency. This is a series of six permanent study committees on which all groups are supposed to be represented. One of these committees deals with political and organization questions; another with juridical questions; another with economic and financial questions; another with ethnic and colonial questions; another with the reduction of armaments; and still another with social and humanitarian questions. Often there are also subcommittees consisting of a limited number of members for the purpose of preparing reports and draft resolutions for the main committees. Beside their regular functions of preparing reports as results of their researches, these committees, too, serve as cushions in times of stress, for it is frequently found to be an advantage to have such bodies to which debatable questions may be referred "for study and report."

V

Since that preliminary meeting in Paris in the autumn of 1888 there have been 28 conferences of the Interparliamentary Union, as follows: First, Paris, 1889; second, London, 1890; third, Rome, 1891; fourth, Berne, 1892; fifth, The Hague, 1894; sixth, Brussels, 1895; seventh, Budapest, 1896; eighth, Brussels, 1897; ninth, Christiania, 1899; tenth, Paris, 1900; eleventh, Vienna, 1903; twelfth, St. Louis, 1904; thirteenth, Brussels, 1905; fourteenth, London, 1906; fifteenth, Berlin, 1908; sixteenth, Brussels, 1910; seventeenth, Geneva, 1912; eighteenth, The Hague, 1913; nineteenth, Stockholm, 1921; twentieth, Vienna, 1922; twenty-first, Copenhagen, 1923; twenty-second, Berne and Geneva, 1924; twenty-third, Washington and Ottawa, 1925; twenty-fourth, Paris, 1927; twenty-fifth, Berlin, 1928; twenty-sixth, London, 1930; twenty-seventh, Bucharest, 1931; twenty-eighth, Geneva, 1932. In other years there have been meetings of the council. In 1929 not only the council but the six study committees held extended meetings at Geneva.

The conferences of 1889, 1890, and 1891 were held in private rooms; but the fourth, held in Berne, 1892, met in the Swiss House of Parliament. Since that time the conferences have been held regularly in Parliament buildings. Since the King of Norway greeted the conference of 1899 with official ceremony, heads of governments have invariably extended every possible courtesy to the delegations.

These conferences are unofficial gatherings of officials elected for the most part by the people. They concern themselves with phases of international affairs of direct interest to parliamentarians. They are the world's nearest approach to a "parliament of man."

The preparation for a conference begins with an invitation from some national group, supported by the head of the government. When this invitation has been accepted, the council agrees upon the program for the conference. It is planned that the conference shall deal as far as wise with the subject of practical and immediate interest. Draft resolutions, usually the result of painstaking work by the study committees, are compiled in the form of preliminary documents and sent to the delegates before the conference. The conference usually lasts 5 days. The first 1½ days are devoted to a discussion of the report of the secretary general, invariably a valuable summary of the major problems facing the nations.

Then the other items of the agenda are taken up in order. From these discussions, resolutions develop, which resolutions are submitted to the conference on the last day. While arbitration and the pacific settlement of international disputes have been the major purpose of the union from its start, it is apparent from the resolutions passed by the various conferences that the delegates have always shown a tendency to broaden the field. Before 1911, for example, there were resolutions relating to the organization of the society of nations, to problems of neutrality, to the limitation of armaments, to the laws of war, to an international prize court, to the treatment of foreigners, to private international law, to the methods of mediation, good offices, commissions of inquiry, obligatory arbitration, the organization of an international judiciary, and other phases of the growth and organization of international cooperation.

Prior to the war, however, it is apparent that the delegates preferred to limit themselves to those phases of international affairs that belong more particularly to the realm of international law, rather than to economic and political questions. Parliamentarians are politicians, and as such they have sensed the importance of avoiding as far as possible economic and political questions sure to be embarrassing if opened up in a conference. When at the conference in 1932 there was a lapse in this policy, and a French delegate raised the question of the murder in Rome of the Italian Mattiotti, it precipitated a near riot that ended in the withdrawal of the Italian group from the union. It is generally accepted also that the conferences of the Interparliamentary Union should exclude utopian aims from the discussions and limit themselves as far as possible to the peaceful and judicial processes of settling international disputes.

The discussions and resolutions of the conference are brought together into one volume known as the "Compte Rendu." This invaluable text contains the preliminary documents; the convocation circulars; the program; the report of the secretary general; the report of the council and of the bureau; the deliberations of the conference; the resolutions in French, English, and German; a list of the members—a sizeable and serviceable volume of several hundred pages.

The results of these years of parliamentary effort have not been wholly intangible. Stipulated arbitration treaties, the Permanent Court of Arbitration, the calling of the first Hague Conference in 1899 and the second in 1907, were all directly promoted by the Interparliamentary Union. Throughout its career the union has pioneered in behalf of the permanent, peaceful organization of international relations. During the war the bureau published a pamphlet entitled "The Conditions of a Lasting Peace—A Statement of the Work of the Union", in French, English, and German. Later, also in three languages, the bureau published a volume on Treaties for the Advancement of Peace.

Since the organization of the League of Nations, it is felt that there is a greater need for the Interparliamentary Union than ever. The League is composed of representatives of governments, mostly of diplomatic character, concerned primarily with their own governments' immediate interests; while the Union, largely because of its unofficial character, is both a forum and a training field for the direct representatives of the people.

The efforts to develop a satisfactory Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague have been a natural development out of the policies pleaded for by the Interparliamentary Union. The whole agitation for the reduction of armaments is but a continuation of its years of work. The principle of the Paris pact was forecast in the conference of the Union at Berne, 1924. The control of the manufacture of noxious drugs has advanced materially because of the Union.

The Union publishes a monthly bulletin in English, French, and German, and special pamphlets. It published in 1932 a volume of reports of 18 experts of different nationalities on the Character of a New War, which has had a wide circulation. The Annuaire Interparlementaire, published under the auspices of the Union, is a definitive text of parliamentary information about each of all the Governments of the world.

There is a service which the Interparliamentary Union is peculiarly fitted to render. Whether or not it renders that service with sufficient adequacy will depend in the last analysis not so much upon the vision of the parliamentarians as upon the amount of time they may find it possible to devote to it. Parliamentarians have the vision. They know that there are overlapping international interests which cannot be left to dictators nor to laissez faire. They know that there are political, economic, and humanitarian problems affecting labor, production, transportation, exchange, demanding international treatment. They agree that mutual conferences between parliamentarians are necessary and that the Interparliamentary Union offers the best opportunity for such conferences. The principal drag upon the progress of the Interparliamentary Union is the normal preoccupation of legislators with their swamping tasks immediately at hand.

Perhaps the meaning of the Interparliamentary Union has nowhere been more happily stated than in the words of Senator William McKinley, who, as President of the American group, expressed in 1925 the opinion that "It is not without significance that in this day of divergent interests, points of view, and policies, there exists in the world this organization of parliamentarians out to understand the other fellow's job."

VI

The American group of the Interparliamentary Union was organized in 1903, upon the initiative of Representative Richard Bartholdt, of Missouri, who had just returned from the Vienna conference, assisted by Representative Theodore E. Burton, of Ohio, Representative Samuel G. Barrows, of New York, and others. That year the United States invited the Interparliamentary Union to hold its twelfth conference in connection with the World's Fair in St. Louis in 1904. The invitation was accepted, and for the expenses of the conference the United States appropriated $50,000. It was because of that conference that President Theodore Roosevelt was led to initiate the second Hague Peace Conference.

Again in 1925 the United States was host to the Interparliamentary Union, this time in the city of Washington, for which an appropriation of $50,000 was made. Upon the request of the Congress, it was President Coolidge who extended the invitation to this conference. Forty-one parliaments, the largest number in the history of the Union, sent delegates.

During the early years delegates to the conferences paid their own expenses, the United States making no appropriation for the support of its own group. Later funds were collected from outside the Congress with which to pay in part the traveling expenses of the delegates. Beginning in 1911, Congress has appropriated each year for the expenses of the Interparliamentary Bureau. Following the war, the United States appropriated $1,500 and later $2,000 annually for the support of the Bureau at Geneva. At the nineteenth annual meeting of the American group, February 24, 1922, Mr. Theodore E. Burton, of Ohio, pointed out that for a good many years Congress had appropriated $2,000 annually toward maintaining the Bureau at Geneva and urged that the amount be increased to $4,000, which was recommended by the group and agreed to by the Congress of that year. In 1925 the Congress raised the amount of this contribution to the Bureau at Geneva to $6,000.

At the twenty-fifth annual meeting of the American group, February 24, 1928, attention was called to the financial condition of the group that there was no provision for dues or assessments, no aid from Congress, and that the group was the recipient of charity. Senator McKinley, president of the group, paid many of the bills out of his own pocket. The treasurer, Representative ADOLPH J. SABATH, was known to ease the situation from time to time from his own funds. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace had been contributing toward the support of the group for several years. The American Peace Society had been furnishing office space for the group, caring for its library, furnishing considerable printing, and donating the services of its secretary and editor. Generous as all these acts were, it was thought that they ought not to be necessary. The $6,000 annual appropriation for the Bureau continued from 1926 to 1930, inclusive. For the fiscal years 1931 and 1932 Congress increased the appropriation to $10,000 and added $10,000 for the expenses of the American group. For the fiscal year 1933, the Congress reduced the appropriation for the Bureau at Geneva to $7,500, and eliminated entirely the appropriation for the group.

As pointed out by President ANDREW J. MONTAGUE, speaking before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations, December 23, 1932: "No one can doubt the Interparliamentary Union is an organization of value, especially to members of parliaments. * * * Many of the groups are supported by national appropriations. A number of the governments furnish special headquarters in their parliament buildings for their interparliamentary groups. Fourteen South American governments appointed and sent delegates to the twenty-third conference, held in Washington, 1925, and paid all their expenses. Some of the groups are officially constituted by their parliaments and the expenses of their delegates automatically paid."

Leading men of the Congress of the United States have associated themselves with the work of the American group from its beginning. Names that come quickly to mind are Champ Clark, John Sharp Williams, Henry A. Cooper, John F. Shafroth, W. J. Harris, William A. Oldfield, Stephen Porter, John W. Weeks, Lawrence D. Tyson, Warren Kiefer, Elihu Root (still an honorary member of the group), J. Charles Linthicum, Thomas J. Walsh, and many others.

Presidents of the American group have been as follows: Richard Bartholdt, Missouri, 1903–15; James L. Slayden, elected February 24, 1915; Senator William McKinley, Illinois, elected February 24, 1919; Senator Theodore E. Burton, of Ohio, elected February 24, 1928; Andrew J. Montague, of Virginia, elected February 24, 1930.

Delegates from the United States of America group of the Interparliamentary Union have attended, with the exception of the 6 succeeding the first, every one of the 28 conferences. These delegates, including outstanding men of the Congress, have invariably returned to the United States convinced not only that here is one organization with which Members of the Congress of the United States can and should associate, but that it is in fact a major defense of the parliamentary system and of the modes of democracy which that system continues, fortunately, to represent.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The following bill and joint resolution were each read twice by their titles and referred or placed on the calendar, as indicated below:

H.R. 5690. An act to legalize the manufacture, sale, or possession of 3.2 percent beer in the State of Oklahoma when and if the same is legalized by a majority vote of the people of Oklahoma or by an act of the Legislature of the State of Oklahoma; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.J.Res. 192. Joint resolution to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States; ordered to be placed on the calendar.

SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I gave notice on yesterday that I would make a short answer to the speeches delivered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. However, before speaking on that matter, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a news report of this morning and of yesterday. It is currently reported in this morning's New York Times that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Woodin, is going to resign and that his place will be filled by the appointment of former Representative Douglas, of Arizona. I am not in the confidences of the administration to such an extent that I know whether this report is anything like true or not, but the persistent report is, and, as the New York Times says, the unanimous opinion of Washington is that Mr. Woodin's resignation will soon be forthcoming and that Mr. Douglas' appointment will soon be made to take his place.

I am afraid, Mr. President, that some of the others of us in the Senate are going to advise the President wrong about this matter, and I want to give the Senate some information so that my colleagues in the Senate who may be called in to suggest a successor, in case there is such an eventuality as the resignation of the Secretary of the Treasury, will not fail to have the facts. I hope we shall not jump out of the frying pan into the fire. I have nothing against Mr. Douglas, and entertain for him a feeling of personal regard; I know of him only by mere passing, and I have no feeling to the point that would be even remotely prejudicial to him; but I do not want Mr. Douglas to be embarrassed, and I do not want the party to be embarrassed, and I do not want the United States to be embarrassed by making a greater mistake even than that which we have already made.

I understand that Mr. Douglas is, from his various family affiliations and other interests, inextricably interwoven so far as family is concerned with the Phelps Dodge Corporation. I understand that this young man, brilliant as he is in many capacities, and probably in all, is affiliated, through many varied family circles and other interests, with the Phelps Dodge interests.

I have here before me the speech of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] on February 23, in which he gave a chart of Morgan's various and sundry interlocking concerns. It will be found at page 4778 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 23, and from that chart it appears that of the 120 so-called "affiliates" of the Morgan interests, the Phelps Dodge Corporation is one.

Also, Mr. President, I find from the Phelps Dodge report as contained in Moody's Manual that the Phelps Dodge Corporation has as one of its directors Mr. T. S. Lamont. Mr. T. S. Lamont is a son of Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, and Mr. Thomas W. Lamont is the chief partner of Mr. J. P. Morgan, of the famous House of J. P. Morgan & Co.

I find further, Mr. President, the name here of Mr. A. C. James as a director of the Phelps Dodge Corporation. Mr. James being a director of the Phelps Dodge Corporation also appears on the preferred list of J. P. Morgan & Co. in the Alleghany and Standard Brands stock issues as disclosed by the investigation some days ago.

I am further informed, Mr. President, that this concern carries its bank balances with J. P. Morgan & Co., and is to all intents and purposes one of what might be called the Morgan family.

Mr. President, I wish to say that I know there are Senators here who disagree with me in this matter, and they are as honest as I am, and they may be right and I may be wrong about it. I find as a director of the Phelps Dodge a gentleman, Mr. Walter S. Douglas, I believe is his name, who, I am informed, is an uncle of the present Director of the Budget, Mr. Lewis Douglas. I am informed that the brothers have been partners and that also the grandfather of our distinguished Director of the Budget was one of the Phelps Dodge people. Of course there are family inheritances of property that are just as honorable as any that we may have; but, Mr. President, while the Members of the Senate may disagree with me and be as honest, I am sure, as I am, and they may be right, I want to present this picture, that if we are going to go back to the muzzle of the House of Morgan to get another Secretary of the Treasury, then we might just as well let the man stay there who is there now; in fact, I prefer the man who is there now, kind hearted as he is, than to go back and take up someone else as though we had changed from left to right, when, as a matter of fact, we would be in the same situation as we were in the beginning. I hope that the Members of the Senate who will be called upon to advise and consent to whatever appointment may be made to fill this job will certainly not put us in the predicament of having to go back into the House of Morgan to get another man to fill this job. That is all I have to say relative to that.

Mr. REED and Mr. ASHURST addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LONG. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. I thought the Senator had finished. I will await my opportunity to obtain the floor in my own right.

Mr. LONG. Did the Senator want to ask me a question, or what did the Senator want?

Mr. REED. I want the floor.

Mr. LONG. The Senator cannot get it now.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say on this question. I wish to be understood as in no way reflecting upon the character or high ideals of Mr. Douglas in any manner, nor am I reflecting upon the ideals of Mr. Morgan. I know nothing about any of the gentlemen which would prevent me from giving them a certificate of good character. I know nothing about any of these interests that in any respect is different from what the Senate itself knows. I simply want it known here that, having been one of the complainants speaking on this floor, if I have given any impression to anybody that whatever sentiments I may have would be remotely cheered by swinging from Mr. Woodin to Mr. Douglas, I would rather leave Mr. Woodin there, because in the administration of the Economy Act Mr. Douglas has shown his adaptability to using the knife to the point of cleaning out the Government hospitals and not only putting the soldiers out in their underclothes, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] would have us believe, but in many instances without any clothes at all. I would rather have the situation as it now exists. I would be more pleased to see Mr. Woodin stay in office than to see Mr. Douglas put in there. So much for that.

THE ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY PROJECT

Mr. President, I want to consume a few moments of time now on the St. Lawrence waterway project. Again I am cognizant of the fact of the difference which exists between myself and other Senators in this Chamber on this question. I listened all day yesterday to the speeches by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. They spoke all day on the question. In the course of their addresses they read some very interesting data which they had collected. Excepting for the fact that they appeared to have studied everything except our own inland waterway system, the addresses were very instructive.

I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to the situation. We have been told that this project is of advantage to Canada. I wish to show just what an advantage it is. I shall send to the desk and ask to have published following my remarks today, as exhibit A, advertisements appearing throughout Canada. Here is what they say. Here is what Canada gives as a reason why they want to build this canal. Here is why Canada says they want to build this canal with the money of America in Canada, with the labor of Canada, to take the commerce of America now going through American ports as well as the commerce of Canada that is now going through American ports. The money of America is to hire the labor of Canada and buy Canadian materials to construct this Canadian canal. A part of this advertisement reads as follows:

KEEP YOUR TRANSPORTATION DOLLARS IN CANADA

Shipments of Canadian grain in 1930

	Bushels
Through United States ports	67,747,685
Through Canadian-Atlantic ports	5,153,553

An all-Canadian route for Canada's grain.

In other words, they say that out of a total of 72,000,000 bushels of grain shipped out of Canada, 67,000,000 bushels of it goes through American ports, and 5,000,000 bushels of it goes through the ports of Canada, and therefore they want the work done in order that they may have a complete right to carry all this traffic through Canadian ports.

Mr. President, I ask that this advertisement may be printed as exhibit A at the conclusion of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Is the Senator familiar with the fact that on May 26, last week, an amendment to the Canadian shipping act was passed prohibiting the carriage of Canadian grain over all or any part of the route between the head of the Great Lakes and eastern exporting centers in other than British ships? Under existing legislation United States ships carry more than half of the Canadian crop to Buffalo and then to Montreal. In the future it will all be carried in Canadian ships.

Mr. LONG. Then I am afraid I have not the entire purport of the situation in mind. I was not familiar with that fact. Does the Senator mean to say that they have now enacted a law in Canada providing that this grain must all be carried now in British ships?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct. That is the purport of the law which was enacted May 26, just last week.

Mr. LONG. That is nothing new. They are building the canal with American money, building it with Canadian labor, building it with Canadian materials, and building it in Canada. They boldly tell us they are building it to take trade away from American ports and put it through the ports of Canada, and now they have gone to the extent of saying that hereafter all of that traffic which has been hauled on the Great Lakes in American ships may only be hauled in ships flying the flag of Great Britain. That principle is not anything new.

In the editorial from which I read the other day, which was published in the Toronto Mail and Empire, of Toronto, Canada, it is said, just to show how well they know how they are handling the American people:

The United States abandons its ancient contention that Lake Michigan is an American lake.

We not only have abandoned our right to haul in American ships but we have abandoned our right to the claim that Lake Michigan is an American lake. I shall read further from the editorial as I proceed.

Mr. President, what is the first part of the treaty? The two distinguished Senators who spoke on yesterday are not here at the moment, but I hope the Senate will not think I am making statements which I would not make if they were here. We just had a quorum call, and if they are not in the Chamber I am not responsible for their absence.

These distinguished Senators stood here for a whole day and led themselves to believe—I do not believe they have led anybody else to believe anything of the kind—that Canada pays half of the cost of this canal going through to Montreal and from there to the sea, but they are wholly mistaken in that respect. That is not correct. They pretended that they were allocating the costs. They allowed the Canadian Government what had already been spent on the project and allowed the United States what we had spent on the project. Of course, the United States manifestly has not spent anything on the project, but Canada has done certain inland-waterway developments in and around that area, and these Senators therefore give Canada credit for some hundred or so millions of what they have spent as though it were expended for carrying out this project, when as a matter of fact what Canada has been doing has been to develop an inland waterway system up there, caring for its various and numerous local interests. The Senators have lumped in that way to the credit of Canada the entire amount of money Canada has spent in that way and given Canada credit for having spent it on this project under the terms of this treaty.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to invite the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to the fact that under the terms of the treaty Canada is not obligated to spend one single penny on this project. The preamble does recite that "whereas Canada contemplates" doing certain things, therefore the United States "obligates" itself. The only obligation in the treaty whatever is the obligation on the part of the United States to spend an unnamed sum of money, which will run into hundreds of millions of dollars, for the improvement of a Canadian waterway.

Mr. LONG. I so understand it. They claim that whereas the Canadian Government means to do something, and yet does not obligate itself to do it, that is a contract on their part. The United States does go into a contract, however, that obligates us to go ahead and spend money, but Canada, as is indicated by the Senator from Missouri, is not obligated to do a thing or to spend a cent.

I want to give some estimates of the cost of the matter that will come a great deal nearer being below what it will cost than above what it will cost. I think I have them compiled here and can present them in a way that will impress the Senate. The data are contained in some of the testimony given before the committee, or rather in the briefs that were filed before the committee.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. LONG. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. It was specified that the lowest cost would be $543,000,000 and would go as high as $1,350,000,000.

Mr. LONG. What testimony was that?

Mr. COPELAND. I have not the reference to the testimony, but this is a quotation from it.

Mr. LONG. In other words, while the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are giving their estimates, our estimates show that this cost will be not less than $543,000,000 and perhaps as high as $1,350,000,000. In other words, this project is no such thing as a $100,000,000 project, anyway. It is somewhere nearer the $1,000,000,000 mark than it is the $100,000,000 mark. The cost of this project is strictly an American obligation, without any question of possibility of liability on the part of Canada. They have some design in mind which may involve the spending of a little more money, but if they have ever been called upon to pay anything out, what they have been spending up there in their local development for their various and numerous communities will be deducted before they ever have to match any money we are going to spend. That is the truth.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield further to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LONG. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I observed yesterday that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] had much to say about Massena. In his speech before the Carthage Chamber of Commerce Mr. Martin, president of the Massena Chamber of Commerce, an organization taking the side of the waterway, said that "between one and one and one half billion dollars will be spent for materials and labor."

Mr. LONG. Who was this Mr. Martin?

Mr. COPELAND. He is the head of the Chamber of Commerce of Massena.

Mr. LONG. Where is Massena?

Mr. COPELAND. Massena is in New York.

Mr. LONG. Are Mr. Martin and the Massena Chamber of Commerce in favor of this project?

Mr. COPELAND. The Massena Chamber of Commerce, through its president and secretary, is in favor of it.

Mr. LONG. Is the Massena Chamber of Commerce in favor of this project?

Mr. COPELAND. Thoroughly.

Mr. LONG. Then I can cite to the Senator from Wisconsin some of his own authority. I hope to have the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin, who has now entered the Chamber, because the Senator from Wisconsin evidently has not kept up with what his own people think about this project. I have told my friend from Wisconsin that I am going to take some time off this summer and try to study this matter and see whether there is any basis for any belief that there is going to be a benefit to Wisconsin or any other State through this project. Mr. Martin, of the Massena Chamber of Commerce, in a statement which appeared in the Carthage Republican Tribune on April 13, is quoted as follows:

He said that between one and one and one-half billion dollars would be spent for materials and labor.

That is a quotation of what Mr. Martin thinks about the cost of this project.

That is not only our estimate, Mr. President, but that is the estimate of the Massena Chamber of Commerce, from which the Senator from Wisconsin has quoted at such length, that this St. Lawrence waterway is going to cost from a billion to a billion and a half dollars. Who is going to pay it? Let us see who is going to pay it. Do the people of Canada think they are going to pay any of that money? The treaty does not require them to do it; and let me show you whether they think they are going to pay any of it or not. They never have, and they are not going to do it now. Here is what they say:

COST TO CANADIAN TREASURY ONLY $38,000,000

No feature of the treaty is more surprising—

Why, certainly! When you surprise Canada now, any time the United States makes a treaty with Great Britain, and it is so favorable to the British Empire that it surprises Great Britain, it is bound to be going some. Any time Canada gets surprised over some favorable action, in view of what the British people always have come away with every time we have gone into a treaty with them, it is bound to be going some. However, Canada was surprised.

No feature of the treaty is more surprising or more satisfactory than the low cost to Canada at which the undertaking is to be carried out. Because of want of information, the press has carried all sorts of extravagant statements as to the heavy financial burden with which the taxpayers were to be saddled in a time of depression. As late as last Saturday a Montreal newspaper estimated that the Canadian people would be mulcted to the tune of $570,000,000.

That is when they thought they were going to pay half of it. "Oh, no; wait a minute", says this paper:

All such erratic predictions have been relegated to the realm of the absurd and sublimely ridiculous. The treaty provides that the cost of the deep waterways to the Dominion Treasury will be $38,071,000. This total is reached by adding the $22,320,000 to be spent in the International Rapids section for property damages, rehabilitation work, and the Chrysler Island canal to the $82,954,000 to be spent for locks and canals on the Canadian section, and by subtracting from the total $67,202,500 to be paid by Ontario to the Dominion on account of power works in the International section. This total cost of $38,071,000 may be cut to $33,638,500 if a proposed guard lock at Beauharnois is found unnecessary, which is altogether probable. These figures are based upon the 1926 estimates made by the international board of engineers on the project and since revised by that board. It is not to be forgotten that general construction costs are now down about 30 percent.

Then, skipping a little bit, they say:

The cost to the United States is placed at $243,661,000, made up of—

And then they give some items; but, on the comparison of this Canadian paper, they estimate that the American Government is going to pay $236,000,000 as against $33,000,000; and then they go on in this paper as follows:

CANADIAN LABOR AND MATERIALS

Most of the construction work will be done in Canada. All the construction work on the national section will, of course, be done here, but there is more than that. Though the United States is to provide the $54,718,000 for works situated on the Canadian side in the International Rapids section, Canadian engineers, Canadian labor, and Canadian materials are to be used.

That is in the treaty.

All the labor and materials employed in the Canadian power development at Chrysler Island and Barnhart Island power plants is to be paid for by the Ontario Government and will, of course, be Canadian. As indicated by the maps published in connection with the treaty, the International section, which reaches from a little below Prescott to a little below Cornwall, is 115 miles in length. Most of the development occurs in Canadian waters.

Mr. President, without reading further from this paper, there is not any question whatever that the Canadians have negotiated a treaty that they know means that Canada is going to pay a nominal, insignificant part of the cost, and that the money is going to be used to develop a Canadian port, for the purpose of taking some 67,000,000 bushels in one leap away from the American port, to hire the labor of Canada, the engineers of Canada, to use the materials of Canada, and to build a waterway, we are told by the distinguished Senators from Michigan and from Wisconsin, to give them a route to the sea.

Mr. President, we never have been able to get the Senator from Michigan or the Senator from Wisconsin to find out how to get to the sea. They have heard of only one way of getting to the sea. Somebody told them the only way to get to the sea is to go through Montreal, and we never have been able to get them to look at anything else. Now, here is the way they could have gotten to the sea. I do not for one moment undertake to restrict the people of Wisconsin. Just as the Senator from that State says, they were kind to my people here when we were trying to get money for flood control and navigation of the Mississippi, and we want to be just as kind to them. We want to see the Missouri River developed to a point where they will haul traffic right on up into Montana as they used to do over that route. We are for that. We are for the development of the Ohio waterway, and the canalizing of that river. We are for completing the valley projects and all of the tributaries through the valley; but if we are going to build a canal to go from the St. Lawrence to the sea, here is the way to do it:

You can build a canal going through the port of Albany, going down through New York State a distance of 338 miles from Lake Ontario to New York by way of the Hudson River and the New York State route. It will carry you to the sea in 338 miles, whereas by the route that they are trying to build to go through the port of Montreal, going away up toward Newfoundland, it is necessary to go 1,182 miles to get to the sea. They propose to build a canal in order that the man in Wisconsin can get to the sea. They propose to build a little canal through Canada with American money, using Canadian labor and Canadian materials, 1,182 miles in length, in order to build it from Canada, when they can build a canal and go into the port of New York, the greatest port in the Western Hemisphere, by constructing only 338 miles of waterway, and how much less money it will cost!

Mr. President, so far as use is concerned, this canal is not going to be more than a 6-month proposition at best. If it is built, they cannot operate it more than about 6 months out of the year. I doubt if it ever will be built; but I call your attention to the kind of canal they are going to have when they do get it built. It is an international canal, owned jointly by England and by America. Now, here is something that I hope my western friends will think about. This is supposed to be a neutral canal. If America gets into a war with England, of course England has the canal. The Senator from Michigan says there is no possibility of that, however. He underwrites that there never will be any more wars between any of the English colonies or England and America. Well, that is a pretty good guaranty.

We have the Senator from Michigan giving us a guarantee that there is no possibility of there ever being any more war between any of the English colonies or England and America. We have only had about half our wars with England since we have been over here; but the Senator from Michigan fixes that thing up, and that is all settled. That is fixed. Now if the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT], who is of French descent, will give us the same certificate that we will have no wars with France, and I think I can give you one that we will have none with Holland, we will be about four fifths out of wars the balance of my lifetime with certificates of this kind.

But let us take the Senator from Michigan at his word. Let us say we are not going to have any more wars with England. Have you ever thought about another thing in regard to this treaty? This is supposed to be a neutral canal. Suppose England gets into a war with Germany, or with Japan, or with France: If England is allowed to use the canal at all, America is going to have to be a party to the war; otherwise, we will be violating our own neutrality. In other words, America will have to be a party to every war that England has, or else the canal will have to be shut down, under international law.

The canal is supposed to be neutralized. A war comes on. England has done two things. In case of war with America she has her own canal that she built with American money, and that fixes that. In case England has a war with anybody else, if America uses the canal that she has herself built with American money and Canadian labor, she will have to be on the side of the British Empire, or we cannot even use the canal. I have not heard that disputed.

Before I leave this matter of cost I want to branch off just a moment to say that the Senator from Wisconsin talks about Morgan & Co. being against this treaty. I can prove to you, by the same process of reasoning that the Senator from Wisconsin has used here, that Morgan & Co. are in favor of this treaty. I can prove it to you by just the same logic that the Senator from Wisconsin uses, and I do not have to take any long list of disclosures that occurred over in the Banking and Currency Committee about Morgan and put them back in the RECORD to prove it. But if he takes the position that the chambers of commerce of the various places that are opposing this treaty, particularly the Chamber of Commerce of New York, are dominated by memberships coming from officers of corporations in which Morgan is interested, then he has not a single chamber of commerce in Wisconsin or in Michigan, or in any other place, that has endorsed the thing that is not subject to the same condemnation.

In other words, the power companies, the railroads, and the utilities are all good joiners. They join these chambers of commerce to get business. They join them in order to promote and increase their own business just as much as they can. You will find that resolutions have come from various and sundry boards and commissions favorable to this treaty, and, as a matter of fact, we happen to know that in the original conception of this treaty it was expected that Mr. Mellon and Mr. Morgan were going to be the greatest beneficiaries of anybody from it.

Mr. Morgan, however, has another interest in this matter besides America. Mr. Morgan is the fiscal agent in America for the British Empire. He has a considerable interest in Canada. He has a considerable interest in England. He pays an income tax to England when he does not even pay one to the United States. Mr. Morgan has a substantial interest in this matter. Not only has he an interest in the communities through the chambers of commerce that have endorsed this project but he has his British interest. When you refuse to let American ships carry the grain, that puts my kind of people out; but that does not put Mr. Morgan out, because he is inextricably interwoven with the interests of the British Government the same as he is with the interests of the American Government, and it makes no difference to him.

As a matter of fact, the project no doubt will be a very, very wonderful thing in the eyes of Mr. Morgan from the standpoint and line of reasoning that has been adopted by the Senator from Wisconsin, because the New York Chamber of Commerce is opposed to it. I can tell you one port with which Mr. Morgan has not anything to do, however, and that is the port of New Orleans. We had the help of these distinguished gentlemen in order that we might build up the navigation to the port of New Orleans. You heard the Senator from Wisconsin tell you what he has done. He had, too. You heard him tell you what help he gave, which he had to have, and I want here to acknowledge it and thank him for it. You heard him tell you of the work he had put forth on the Great Lakes-to-the-Gulf waterway. Now let us see what he is doing. I will give him authority from Canada. Here is what he is doing:

Chicago checked, Lake Michigan internationalized.

I am reading from this Canadian newspaper—

As already noted, the treaty itself puts an end to Chicago's ambition to drain the Great Lakes for the benefit of a deep waterway to the Gulf of Mexico by way of the Mississippi Valley.

In other words, after all this work has been done here, for which the Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to as much credit as anybody in this country; after all this work has been done here to give us a deep waterway from Chicago to New Orleans, along we come here and internationalize Lake Michigan, a lake that never was considered anything like an international lake. It never has been disputed that it was not an international lake. It was solely owned by the United States, including all its shores. Here they come along, after all the money we have spent and all the good work that has been done, and say that the whole thing now is out; that there is not going to be any deep waterway.

Take the people in Kansas, take the people on out beyond Kansas, and those in Missouri, and even as far up as Montana, who, if they ever get anything like water transportation into those States, must have it through connection with the Missouri River into the Mississippi River so that they can either go north to Chicago or south to New Orleans or over east to Pittsburgh. Take even those far Western States and reflect what the result will be if, according to the dispatch we have, and the interpretation placed upon it by the Canadian newspaper, they internationalize the lake so as to keep the people from taking their own water in order to have a deep waterway route through the Mississippi Valley.

Who is right about this thing? Are we going to stand here and have the American people go into a proposition that may involve us in an expenditure of a billion dollars, and have us go into a treaty with England that in time of war with England will mean that England will take that canal over and use it against us, or, if England shall go to war, we cannot use it at all unless we go to war with England; build it with American money, internationalize Lake Michigan, and take away from us the water we need to flow down to New Orleans in order that we may have a Lake-to-the-Gulf waterway? If you are going to decide all of this with one stroke of the pen in order that America may spend its money for the glorification of Canadian ports, what kind of a reason are you going to give for having gone ahead and spent this money to build up the Mississippi Valley?

The Senator from Michigan said yesterday that there was one thing I was trying to say to him which he could not understand. He said he felt as if I were blowing hot and cold. He said he could not understand how, in the course of one of my speeches here, I had said that we were flooded with water part of the time, and did not have near enough water part of the time. That is just the trouble with the advocates of this treaty; they do not know anything at all about the inland waterway system. They do not know anything at all about the need for water in one season and the lack of need for water in another season.

This is what I was trying to tell the Senator from Michigan which he does not understand, and apparently cannot understand, blind, as some people are who favor this treaty, to the point where they never have been able to see what is in front of them. This is what I was trying to tell the distinguished Senator from Michigan, that we have drained such States as Wisconsin and Michigan and Indiana, we have drained them year after year, making such provision that when rain would fall it would immediately be forced into the sluices and find its way into the Mississippi River.

Those lands up there have been drained, area after area, never once taking into consideration that every time a thousand acres of land in the West and the Middle West and the North were drained the flood problem of the South has been made that much more dangerous; so much so that in the months of February, March, April, May, and June, when the melting process takes place in the North, when the snow and the sleet and the ice begin to melt, and they begin to drift down into the Mississippi River, and the spring rains begin to come, we find ourselves in that particular season of the year with the floods coming bank to bank and over the banks and flowing miles and miles and tens of miles. Sometimes I have seen the flood waters go as much as a hundred miles and more through the lands of that country, taking the houses and the homes of the people, in the spring months of the year. Then I have seen the same stream in the fall of the year when there was not water enough in the river to carry traffic from a place like Vicksburg as far down as New Orleans, even.

We want the water to be so controlled that there will be a constant flow. We who have too much water in the springtime have not enough water in the fall, and it is necessary that we have recourse to the waters of Lake Michigan if we are going to keep traffic there the year round. The Senator from Michigan evidently knows that.

A great deal has been said about power. Who gets this power? I am going to read from the Canadian newspaper again:

The treaty has its power side as well as its navigation side. The work in the international section and in the national section will develop about 5,000,000 horsepower. Of this, 2,000,000 horsepower will be available in the international section and 3,000,000 in the national section. Canada—that is to say, the Province of Ontario—is to obtain 1,000,000 of the 2,000,000 horsepower to be produced in the international section, but all of the 3,000,000 horsepower to be developed in the national section, which is wholly in Quebec, will belong to this country. This means that Canada is to obtain 4,000,000 horsepower and the United States 1,000,000 horsepower out of the whole St. Lawrence waterway development.

Senators are talking about the power, the great power project. If it is a power project, they are spending hundreds of millions of dollars of the American people, and every time they produce 5 horsepower Canada gets 4 and the United States gets 1. The cost of this thing is one of the most stupendous things ever undertaken by the American Government. There never has been anything heard of like it.

I want to say that the danger of this kind of project is realized by more people than myself. I have here a letter from the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, dated May 26, 1933, from Cleveland, Ohio, addressed to me. It says:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am taking this opportunity to drop you a line to express my appreciation for your opposition to the ratification of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty.

Then they go along to show, as the Canadian papers show, that if this treaty is ratified it is going to take away from the American laboring people not only the work of building the canal but it is going to take away the traffic our people are hauling over our own rail lines.

I have another letter here from the Order of Railroad Conductors of America, dated Cedar Rapids, Iowa, May 26, 1933, which reads:

DEAR SIR: As you know, our organization is opposed to the ratification of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. I am informed that this question is out of the picture for the present session of Congress, largely due to your opposition—

And so forth.

That is the attitude of the labor organizations of the United States.

I should like to suggest in that connection just what it is claimed can be done. The treaty calls for a 27-foot channel. As of 1929, our authors point out that only 5 percent of the passenger-cargo ship tonnage engaged in American overseas trade could use this channel; only 38 percent of the faster cargo tonnage and 15 percent of the vessels, only 13 percent of the tonnage operating out of Montreal and Quebec, only 40 percent of grain tramp tonnage operating out of Montreal, no tankers, and only 19 percent of intercoastal tonnage eastbound could use it. This channel—would, broadly speaking, accommodate only boats of the type now engaged in the local coastal trade and the smaller steamers, mainly the war-built United States Shipping Board boats and tramps.

To accommodate the type of ships which people commonly have in mind as calling, for example, at Chicago, a 33-foot channel would be required.

The season of navigation on the Lakes averages about 6½ months. Lake boats can take chances of being caught in the ice; ocean-going boats cannot. That is something else that ought to be considered. Lake boats can take a chance of being caught, but the ocean-going boats cannot. That is something else; they never will be able to use the ocean-going boats in this canal.

Ocean-going boats would have to reduce speed at least one quarter between Montreal and the Lakes. Even with a 33-foot channel first-class liners would not use the waterway, so at least the leading shipping companies of the world say, and the same view is expressed as to regular cargo liner service.

Our authors after a careful study of available traffic estimate a total potential tonnage for the waterway of 10,500,000, of which grain would account for about 6,500,000—mainly wheat. Of this a little more than one half—2,000,000 tons grain and 3,400,000 tons other freight, mainly metals and minerals—would be American traffic. Livestock, packing-house products, and dairy products offer comparatively small opportunity. The Southwest cannot be expected to furnish much tonnage, and Atlantic ports will make rates on grain that the waterway cannot profitably meet. The Lake carriers will determine grain rates as they have hitherto done, and these rates are already very low, so that much saving in this way is unlikely.

The cost of the waterway is estimated, by these authorities, including the Welland Canal, at a total sum of $712,000,000.

I cite these facts from a very good authority—namely, the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. The cost is estimated at $712,000,000, and that is not as much as has been estimated by some of those favoring the treaty. Some of the proponents of the treaty estimate it is going to cost over a billion dollars. I put into the RECORD a statement from the chamber of commerce of one of the places that is supporting this treaty—the Chamber of Commerce of Massena, N.Y.—which was supplied to me by the distinguished Senator from New York, showing that they themselves estimate it is going to cost over a billion dollars. But here is an estimate of our side that it is going to cost around $712,000,000. According to the same authority to which I have been referring, this sum includes interest during construction, not included in the engineers' reports, and an allowance of 20 percent for underestimate as compared with final costs. It also includes an allowance of $250,000,000 for the extensive and expensive improvements of Lake ports, which would be necessary to enable them to take ocean-going vessels. They reckon annual charges for interest, 4 percent; depreciation, maintenance, and operation at the round figure of $40,000,000. Three double-track, all-freight railroads could be built from the head of the Lakes to the seaboard for the same money, which would have 30 times the carrying capacity of the waterway.

Three double-tracked railroads can be built from this territory to the seaboard, three double-tracked railroads with a carrying capacity of 30 times the amount of the capacity of this waterway, for the same money, having 30 times the carrying capacity. With interest charges and depreciation of $40,000,000 the taxpayer's subsidy to the traffic using the waterway—no tolls are to be charged—will be some $3.50 per ton—say, 11 cents per bushel on grain. The maximum saving on grain rates would be 4 cents a bushel as against these 11 cents of subsidy.

Mr. President, I do not desire to take more time, because I am sure the Senator from New York will want to say something on this matter, and I have talked longer now than I had intended to. I wish to say that I am glad that our people have taken a sane and sensible course about this proposition. I do not understand that this treaty is going to be brought up. It should not be brought up. If we get into any fix where we owe anything more to England or owe anything more to Canada, then let us pay them. They are not going to pay us so much. But let us not go out and make a gift of this kind to the Canadian Government or to Great Britain when the United States needs this money.

I want to say now that the United States has enough projects it needs to complete without going to Canada to complete one. We ought to go ahead and complete the waterway down the Mississippi Valley. We ought to complete the waterway on the Ohio River, and on the Missouri River, and the necessary tributaries to those rivers. We ought to complete those, and the Tennessee River project ought to be completed. Until we have completed those kind of projects we have no business going out and talking about spending hundreds of millions of dollars of the money of the United States in order to build up a port at Montreal, when we can build the same thing in New York, to which the mileage would be 311 miles, as against over 1,100 miles to go to Montreal.

This is an iniquitous proposal to filch out of the American Treasury hundreds of millions of dollars for this kind of a project, not justified by any fact, and which should not receive any kind of consideration at the hands of Senators.

EXHIBIT A

OUR ATLANTIC PORTS—USE THEM

In past years Canada planned and developed her transportation facilities and her seaports so that she would be enabled to transport and ship the surplus of her grain crop overseas from her own ports. Today Canada's Atlantic seaports offer facilities equal in efficiency to any seaports of this continent. Millions of Canadian dollars have been spent in creating these transportation and shipping facilities. Canada's seaports are the property of the Canadian people and yet they are only being used to a fractional part of their capacity, while the great bulk of Canadian grains goes overseas from foreign ports.

MILLIONS OF INCOME

If Canada were to ship the annual surplus of her grain crop overseas through Canadian ports, vast sums of money would be saved to Canada. Her transportation facilities would increase their haulage, seaports would be busy, and every unit of public life would be benefited. The western Canada producer could market his grain on an orderly, 12-month basis; Canadian industries and merchants would benefit directly through the circulation of these millions of dollars; and thousands of workers in docks, railway yards, elevators, coal mines, and on trains would be given added opportunities to earn a livelihood.

Grain—Canada's major export—should find entry to the world's market through Canadian ports instead of through foreign ports.

Keep your transportation dollars in Canada!

HELP CREATE YOUR OWN PURCHASING POWER!

If the wealth of transportation money invested each year in the shipping of Canadian goods through foreign ports were retained in Canada, it would lighten the taxes of all and give railway employees and dock workers permanent employment, thus enabling them to purchase made-in-Canada products. Canada has adequate transportation facilities of her own—why not use them?

During the past few years Canada's development has taken two distinct lines—transportation and manufacturing. Millions have been spent to create transportation and shipping facilities for Canada which would enable her to transport all of her own products and manufactured articles from their point of origin to Canada's seaports. Other millions of dollars have been spent in developing these seaports until they are equal in efficiency to any seaport on the North American Continent.

These vast transportation facilities are the property of every Canadian citizen and are but partially used at the present time for the transporting of Canadian goods.

Canadian industrialists can help to create a far greater purchasing power in Canada by utilizing to a greater extent these transportation and shipping facilities for the handling of Canada's export trade.

It is as cheap to ship manufactured goods through these all-Canadian channels as it is to ship them through foreign ports—it is therefore to the interests of every Canadian manufacturer, importer, and exporter to make the fullest use possible of these highly developed and efficient Canadian transportation facilities in order that the demand for their goods may be increased by the added purchasing power which these transportation dollars bring.

Keep your transportation dollars in Canada!

Mr. HATFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I shall not undertake today to say anything about the St. Lawrence waterway project. I intend doing so, if time permits, before the end of the session because of the speech made yesterday by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I did not hear it; I was out of the Chamber in attendance upon a meeting of the District of Columbia Committee, but I read the speech in the RECORD this morning. I was amazed at the uncalled-for insinuations and innuendoes contained in that speech, and, at the proper time, I intend to make appropriate reply.

LEWIS W. DOUGLAS

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the able Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] in commencing his speech referred to Mr. Lewis W. Douglas, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. The Senator from Louisiana did not impugn the integrity of Mr. Douglas, but said that their personal associations were cordial. The Senator from Louisiana then went on to lament the possibility that Mr. Douglas might at some future time be appointed to the office of Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. President, I do not know that the remarks I am about to make will be welcomed, but I am certain that I should reply to the implication of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. Douglas, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, was born in Arizona; he was nurtured, reared, and, in part, educated in Arizona. The name Douglas in Arizona is an honored name. I know, Mr. President, of no one who for courage, for devotion to the public welfare, for lofty ideals, and high emprise excels Mr. Douglas. I have known him almost since the day, certainly since the month, of his birth. He has held positions of trust and honor in Arizona; he has been signally put to the test, and he was always upon the side of the public.

He was a member of the State legislature when certain power interests, that I shall not take the time to describe, sought to influence members of the legislature but were utterly unable to make any progress in respect to Mr. Douglas. He repudiated any attempt to approach him, and he established himself in the State as a young man of superb mental strength and great power of analysis.

I assure my friend from Louisiana that if there should be any change in the Secretaryship of the Treasury—and I do not know that any change is contemplated; I am not that closely in the confidences of the administration—no appointment could be made that would be better than that of Lewis W. Douglas.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCGILL in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. It was not my intention to suggest anybody for the position of Secretary of the Treasury, but since that matter has been discussed by the Senator from Louisiana and an intimation regarding it has now been made by the Senator from Arizona, I should like to add just a sentence; and I do so without casting any reflection on Mr. Douglas, for he might make an excellent Secretary of the Treasury. The disclosures before the Banking and Currency Committee in its investigation of the Morgan Co. have shown that this partnership has been dealing out its favors to various friends, it is said, all over the United States—to prominent men, some in office and some out, who might get in later on—which favors would have a great deal of influence even if they never did get in public office. So far as I have read in the newspapers, no one of the great men to whom these benefits and favors of Morgan & Co. were extended, which, in reality, were the same as sending them so much money, it seems to me, pushed the crown aside except the great Democratic ex-candidate for the Presidency from Ohio of the name of Cox. It seems to me if the disclosures of this investigation would put a man out of office because he had accepted such favors then, for the same reason, the President might well put a man in who had refused to accept the favors, and, at least in that respect, was a perfect man.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have no influence regarding the appointment of Cabinet members; but if I were President, I would appoint the Senator from Nebraska as my attorney general if I could not secure the services of the present Attorney General.

Mr. President, I arose to counteract and to challenge some of the inferences that may have been left with the Senate by the Senator from Louisiana. That Mr. Douglas, the Director of the Budget, has any connection with Mr. Morgan or any of the Morgan satellites, would be astonishing news to me, but even if Mr. Douglas had a direct monetary interest in any of Mr. Morgan's companies, Mr. Morgan would be utterly impotent and powerless to influence Mr. Douglas with respect to the performance of his public duties.

Mr. President, character still remains in America. We pay America a poor compliment and we pay the Senate a poor compliment by imagining and charging that everybody but ourselves is a crook.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator understand that I paid Mr. Douglas any such compliment?

Mr. ASHURST. At the beginning of my remarks I said that the Senator from Louisiana had frankly stated that he did not challenge the patriotism or the integrity of Mr. Douglas.

Mr. LONG. I want to make myself clear to the Senator by making this further statement: The Lord says, "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."

Mr. ASHURST. Quite true.

Mr. LONG. During 6,000 years or more that statement has never been disproven.

Mr. ASHURST. I knew that I could never finish my remarks without a quotation from Scripture by my learned friend from Louisiana; and since he is so facile in quoting Scripture, I would remind him that there is another injunction—"Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor." The Senator may not need that injunction, but it is wise to remember it as we go through this life.

Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana, as was his right, criticized Mr. Douglas for some of his acts respecting the economy bill. I myself do not agree with Mr. Douglas, the Director of the Budget, in respect to some of his opinions on the economy bill. But because, forsooth, I do not agree with my friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] on some question, or because, forsooth, I do not agree with my friend the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], or my friend from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], I do not for a moment charge that they are influenced by anything other than what they believe to be the right or that they are not following the best lights as they see them.

I do not know that Mr. Lewis Douglas has any connection with or any interest in the Phelps Dodge Corporation. If he did have, it would not be an improper interest. When did it become an offense for a man, born and reared in Arizona, to become a holder of stock in the Arizona copper-mining industry, which is Arizona's prime enterprise and upon which industry—copper mining—the State must depend in large part to maintain a State government.

If it should be shown here that my learned friend from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] owned some copper stock in Michigan's copper mines, he would be secure from my prejudices. If it should be shown that Mr. Douglas owned some stock in Arizona's copper mines, he likewise would be secure from my prejudices.

Mr. Douglas has lived a good life, and certainly he needs no defense at my hands. I predict for him a useful career in the public service. I read from the Congressional Directory:

Lewis William Douglas, Democrat, of Phoenix, Ariz., was born July 2, 1894, at Bisbee, Ariz.; graduated Amherst College, 1916; special course metallurgy and geology, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, 1916; attended first officers' training camp, Presidio, San Francisco; commissioned second lieutenant, Field Artillery; assigned Three hundred and forty-seventh Regiment, Field Artillery; promoted to first lieutenant, Field Artillery; served overseas July 19, 1918, to March 19, 1919; assistant, G–3 staff, Ninety-first Division; cited by General Pershing during Argonne offensive; decorated by Belgian Government during Lys-Escault offensive. Instructor of history, Amherst College, 1920; taught chemistry at Hackley School for 6 months in 1921; 6 years' mining and business experience; served one term in Arizona Legislature. Married and has 2 sons and 1 daughter. Elected to the Seventieth, Seventy-first, Seventy-second, and Seventy-third Congresses.

One rainy morning some years ago, walking about the streets of London and at Waterloo Place, I came upon the statue of John Fox Burgoyne. I was interested when I read on the base of the statue the eloquent inscription from Shakespeare's Coriolanus:

> How youngly he began to serve his country,

I believe when this young man, Mr. Douglas, shall have finished his career and ended mortal things that some biographer will use in writing of him these same words from Shakespeare's Coriolanus:

> How youngly he began to serve his country,
> How long continued.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am glad my friend from Arizona acquits me of having said anything that reflects on Mr. Douglas; I am glad he further acquits me of having said anything about Mr. Douglas that is not true; I am glad he gives me these acquittances in the speech which he makes, notwithstanding his warning to keep me from departing from these principles later.

But, Mr. President, I will use a statement that I have already used on the floor of the Senate that I learned away back in the country, "You do not have to eat a whole beef to tell when it is tainted." You cannot make a hen lay a duck's egg. We are told an old story—I believe it is from Æsop's Fables: Once upon a time a swan laid an egg in a hen's nest, and after the time it took the hen to hatch the swan's egg the swan came from the shell and grew up and acquired the same strut and walk and demeanor that might have been expected whether it had been hatched under a swan or under a hen.

Mr. President, the Lord has been mighty good to us. I do not like to quote Scripture; the Senator from Arizona knows it so much better than I do.

Mr. ASHURST. No; I do not.

Mr. LONG. The Lord gave us a few rules. He told us about the rich young man who went to the Savior and asked Him what he should do to have eternal life, and the Savior gave him the commandments. The rich young man said, "All these things have I kept from my youth up", and the Savior said, "Go and sell that thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, and come and follow me", and the rich young man went away sorrowing. Then the Lord said:

"A rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven. * * * It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God." "Wherever your treasure is", said the Lord, "there is your heart also."

That might not be good philosophy, Mr. President, but the point I am making is that we have had disclosures with reference to Mr. Woodin to show his connections with and his receiving favoritism from the House of Morgan, his getting stock for $20 that was worth at the time $37, when he was a member of the Federal Reserve bank—not when he was entirely a private citizen. Do not get this thing confused. We have been hearing talk that Mr. Woodin was a private citizen at the time of this incident. He was connected with the Federal Reserve bank, right where he could do some good for whoever he wanted to help. I do not know whether it is wrong or not, but if the fact is that he got stock for $20 when it was listed on the board at $37, and if all he had to do was to sign his name to get the $17,000 without taking a chance in the world, and if that kind of connection with Morgan is sufficient to cause him to retire, then I submit that we do not want to come back into the Morgan group and get another man of that type to succeed him.

I have shown from Moody's Manual that the Phelps Dodge interests are the Morgan interests. I have shown that to be the fact. I have shown that Thomas S. Lamont, the son of Thomas W. Lamont, the Morgan partner, is a member of that board. I have even shown the Douglas family through two generations has been connected in this thing and is still connected in it. I have shown that one of the members of the Douglas family sits on the board today and is on Morgan's preferred list, the same list that contains Mr. Woodin's name.

I do not say that these are sufficient reasons for Mr. Woodin's resignation. If the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] does not think so, that is his business. He is as honest in his opinions as I am in mine. He may be right and I may be wrong, but I do not believe that we who are called upon to advise the President in performing our constitutional duty—because it is not only our duty to consent but it is our duty to advise the President—should be misled in the matter. It is the duty of Senators to advise the President, and the Senator from Arizona, having given his advice, it is our duty as I conceive it that we should tell the President: "Give us a chance to breathe here in this country. Do not tell us we cannot get out of the House of Morgan without going right back into it. Do not tell us we cannot be relieved. Give us a chance to breathe the breath of new life. Do not have us put under a dictatorship and under the ruling of one member of a family for a while, and when we escape from that put us under the wing of another member of the family. Give us a chance. That is all. We want the 120,000,000 American people to have a chance. We may not get much of a chance, but give us some kind of a chance."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia be good enough to yield further to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] presumes that Mr. Douglas has some connection with the Morgans. I know of no evidence to that effect. The Senator from Louisiana then presumes or assumes that because possibly some of Mr. Douglas' relatives may have had and may still have some connection with the house of Morgan that, therefore, Mr. Lewis Douglas is guilty of something. I ask the Senator from Louisiana if he wishes to be judged by the performance of some of his relatives? I think not. We do not judge men by their relatives. We do judge men by what they themselves are.

As so as to Lewis Douglas—no tainted breath has ever dimmed the bright mirror of his character. There exists no reason why the Senator from Louisiana should proceed to make insinuations that the Budget Director is tangled in some way with the House of Morgan.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, who inherited the grandfather's property in the Phelps Dodge Corporation? Where did it go?

Mr. ASHURST. Dr. Douglas was in part the discoverer and developer of some copper mines in Arizona. Dr. Douglas was a man of high ideals. I speak the voice of Arizona when I say that Dr. Douglas' name is revered in Arizona.

Mr. LONG. I do not doubt it.

Mr. ASHURST. The fact that he happened by industry and prudence to make some money ought not to be counted against him. He used much of his wealth in a noble way.

Inasmuch as this controversy has drifted thus far, I desire to say that in my numerous campaigns in Arizona practically no political support worth while came to me from copper companies. Doubtless in one campaign they supported me, not that they like me most, but disliked me the least of the two candidates. I was the lesser of two evils.

I do not know to whom Dr. Douglas bequeathed his property or who were the beneficiaries of his will. His heirs, instead of squandering their inheritance, if any, in riotous living, began to work in a serious way to build the State and to help to pay the taxes and bear the burdens of government.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me just briefly?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I shall not prolong this debate. I did not get an answer to my question I asked the Senator from Arizona, so I assume he does not know who inherited Grandpa Douglas' Phelps Dodge property. I mean Grandpa Douglas who was the grandfather of Lewis Douglas. Who inherited the Phelps Dodge property? Did it fall in natural order? If so, where? If so, would it not fall or did some of it fall to Lewis Douglas?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia permit me to thank him for yielding so generously of his time and permitting me to consume so much of it?

Mr. HATFIELD. I am always glad to yield to the genial and able Senator from Arizona.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia has been most generous in yielding. I should like to ask his permission to send to the desk and have read a short letter.

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield to the Senator from Montana for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the letter as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

MAHANOY CITY, PA., April 27, 1933.

President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR PRESIDENT: The people are with you. You can live in history as America's greatest man by pulling the country out of the depression.

I believe the Wheeler bill (S. 70) for the remonetization of silver will prove the most effective instrument to give a sound and adequate currency, and help the producer by an advance in commodity prices. I believe there should also be additional paper money for quick restoration of wages and earnings—the Senator Thomas bill.

Better if the inflation bill were amended in the House to include the Wheeler bill for the remonetization of silver at $1.29 an ounce, mandatory instead of discretionary.

The world needs a change in money standard; bimetallism will best serve the debtor and give a ray of hope to burdened industry. Let me again repeat the hope of the world lies in helping the debtor and the restoration of values. Bimetallism is the first offensive to rout the depression and usher in prosperity.

You lead on, all will follow. My memory runs to a stanza of Whittier's:

"All our hopes,
All our fears,
All our hopes of future years,
Are all with thee,
All with thee."

Respectfully yours,

MERCHANTS BANKING TRUST CO.,
D. F. GUINAN, President.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S POLICIES AND ACCOMPLISHMENTS

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, beginning with March 9, 1933, legislative history in America has been made by the recommendation and dictation of the Chief Executive and not by Congress, initiating the policies and measures which have been adopted. I wish to deal briefly with the accomplishments up to this hour. By so doing, I hope to point out, not only to this body but to the Nation, that if the President of the United States pursues the course opened to him by Congress, at his request, we will be well on the way to new and strange methods in dealing with industries, public-service corporations, farming, and all the different elements which go to make up the complex order of our society.

Our governmental and national activities that started with the first administration and have continued down to the present time depended upon individual initiative; each individual had the opportunity to blaze his own path. This is a fundamental and basic principle which has directed the destiny of this Government, and which has heretofore controlled and guided us, and served as a protection to the individual citizen in his freedom of action, in either an individual or collective way in the embarkation of business activities by fostering and not fathering any business in which he or they might engage.

The new policy has been suggested by the President, and has been promptly ratified by the majority of the Congress, abdicating their responsibility with the hope no doubt that it would solve the problems of the depression which developed after the stock-market debacle in 1929, and that in its solution the rehabilitation of our industrial activities as well as the reemployment of 17,000,000 would speedily come. But instead, Mr. President, we may awaken to the fact that by our continued disregard of the Constitution of the United States we have created a government whose principles are foreign and unnatural and which will deny to the individual man his freedom of action and his freedom of living and working out his ideas, such as he enjoyed under the Government of his forefathers. While I shall deal in a passing way with the different ideas of paternal legislation up to the present time, some of which may be justified, the basis of my theme, however, will be upon the subject which is yet to be considered by this body, namely, the industrial recovery bill.

Mr. President, during the past 10 weeks there has come to public notice a group of college professors who, through the influence which they apparently have with the Chief Executive, are credited with proposals for legislation so different from what we have considered in the past that it is worth while for the Senate to pay some attention to these men, the attitude they take, and the legislative proposals they openly advocate.

During the discussion on the farm bill Members of the Senate became familiar with the name of Mordecai Ezekiel. The Congress was led to believe that unless the farm bill was passed almost immediately when presented, and practically in the identical form in which it was presented, we would do great harm to the farm population of America. We were asked to raise the prices of the necessities of life to the pre-war average prevailing from 1909 to 1914 to the wage earners who are employed part time, and in many instances not employed at all. Nevertheless, the workers were refused an ample amount of protection in the way of an amendment offered that would have given them the same consideration that is given the farmer. It would have meant additional employment, as well as an increase in standard of wage of which they are sorely in need at the present time.

I understand that Mordecai Ezekiel, following an extensive study of Soviet Russian ideas on agriculture, succeeded in securing a place high in the councils of the old Farm Board. When the present administration junked the Farm Board he found refuge as one of the pioneer members of the "brain trust." The farm bill was signed by the Chief Executive on a Thursday, and I understand its principal prop, the processors' tax, was suspended on the following Sunday, due to the possible opposition of representatives of foreign nations.

In the enactment of the farm bill the Congress created a dictatorship in the person of the Chief Executive. Since the passage of the farm bill we have received from the White House a bill, sponsored by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], through which those who guide the activities of the White House seek to make the Chief Executive dictator of American industry.

Press reports indicate that even prior to any action of Congress on this proposed legislation President Roosevelt has designated Gen. Hugh Johnson to act for him as the dictator of American industry. I have no criticism to offer of the capacity, the ability, or the integrity of General Johnson. It is rather a strange coincidence, however, that General Johnson, as the dictator of American industry, has been closely associated with Mr. George Peek, of Illinois, whom the President has made virtual dictator of the American farm interests. I do not know Mr. Peek, and I have no criticism to offer of him. I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that neither of these gentlemen has ever held public office, nor have they ever been entrusted by a vote of the people with any task.

Mr. President, since the passage of the farm bill, carrying with it a new era in American legislation and the idea of dictatorship, which to my mind has been, is, and will be repugnant to every American, I have tried to inform myself as to the merits behind this revolutionary change in our legislative policy.

The presentation of drastic and untried methods of government emanating from the White House has come so fast that I question whether the American people yet realize how our Government machinery now operates or what dislocations are taking place which are most strange and unnatural and contrary to the policy heretofore adopted in severe epochal periods of depression, far more disastrous than this one.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to an incident during the depression of 1837 which may be found in the files of old newspapers of that period:

> At an auction sale in 1837 in Muskingum County, Ohio, horses, cows, and oxen brought but a dollar per head, and hogs 6½ cents each. At an auction sale in Pike County, Mo., 2 horses, 2 oxen, 5 cows, 2 steers, 1 calf, and 24 hogs brought $3.75. The report shows that these animals were sold separately except the 24 hogs, which were sold in one lot, and brought 25 cents for the bunch.

Mr. President, I recite this historical fact to demonstrate that, comparatively speaking, the conditions which confront the American people today are no exception to those that confronted the generations of former days during the periodic visitations of depression. I know of no incident similar to that I have just read happening during the present depression.

A few days ago I secured from the Library of Congress a book entitled "The Industrial Discipline and the Governmental Acts", written by Prof. Rexford G. Tugwell.

Mr. President, it is common knowledge that Professor Tugwell and his associates, Professors Moley, Berle, Ezekiel, and others, seemingly have a controlling or at least a decided influence with the President of the United States; and through the influence of the White House they seek to force through the Congress legislative proposals of a character far different from that which might well be termed the "American idea of voluntarism."

A perusal of the book written by Professor Tugwell, to which I have referred, justifies the belief that the writer and his associates openly advocate the socialization of industry through placing control of American industry and the American people therein engaged, in the hands of a body of intellectuals or technicians acting as agents for the people through designation of the White House.

Professor Tugwell's book takes to task the failure of American business and American labor. Yet, perhaps without realizing it, Tugwell describes a government that he considers "as near Utopia as human beings are ever likely to get", and in this description portrays the United States as the only nation in the world which could qualify with his suggestions of a modern Utopia.

Mr. President, what brought about this condition of Utopianism in America if it was not those stalwart men who blazed the path of civilization under the Stars and Stripes?

The "new deal", wherein control of the Government of the United States has been turned over to a group of college professors, with the taxing power and the right to engage in foreign alliances—which alliances, if consummated, would probably force America into European conflicts—turned over to those representing international bankers, is, to my mind, far different from what the people of the United States had reason to expect when they elected Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt last November.

A number of inquiries have reached my office seeking information as to the necessity for this drastic change in governmental procedure without the Congress of the United States being ever consulted.

Some two weeks ago the President of the United States, in a radio address to the American people, in substance apologized for the dictatorial powers now possessed by the Chief Executive, and, at considerable length, suggested that the Chief Executive had had these dictatorial powers foisted upon him by the Congress of the United States, for whom he was merely acting as an agent.

The President's statement was most misleading and contrary to known and undisputed facts. So far as I can recall, since the inauguration of the "new deal" on March 4, no legislation has yet been enacted which was not drafted by the "brain trust" and sent to the Congress from the White House, with the possible exception of the Glass banking bill. All the legislation wherein the Congress has created a dictatorship over our monetary system, or is considering the creation of dictatorships, such as the dictatorship over American agriculture, the dictatorship over American industry, and the dictatorship over American railroads, has emanated from the White House.

Less than 2 weeks after explaining to the American people that the Congress had foisted dictatorial power upon the President, we find the President appointing a dictator over American industry before the bill creating such dictatorship has even been considered by either the House or the Senate.

Is it possible that the President wanted to assure American industry that he would not entrust this work, if Congress passed the bill, to the present Secretary of Labor?

Is it possible that the Chief Executive has come to the conclusion that his Secretary of Labor is incompetent or not fitted to handle this task?

Surely, Mr. President, such activities as are outlined come within the scope of the authority supposedly entrusted to the Department of Labor.

Is it possible that the humane interest which the Secretary of Labor has openly indicated in the unfortunate and exploited workers of the Southland made it necessary for the Roosevelt administration to place this dictatorial power in the hands of one more pliant and more subservient to political pressure?

This bill embodies a minimum-wage feature, providing that minimum wages be paid to all workers rendering the same type of service. This feature of the bill, if honestly administered in perhaps the only way legislatively possible, will lift the heavy hands of those who, prior to the Civil War, believed in and practiced slavery, from continuing to exploit the colored workers of the Southern States.

Surely no honest administrator will permit workers, white or black, to work for lower wages in one locality than are paid for similar work in other localities.

True, provision is made in this bill authorizing the dictator to differentiate in the wages paid in different localities. Yet is it possible that those who, through the enactment of this legislation, hope to realize State socialization in America, will tolerate a condition wherein workers rendering the same service will accept lower wages in one locality than are paid for the same type of service in other localities?

The legislative sponsor of this bill, the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], as well as the Chief Executive, represent a State wherein there is no discrimination practiced or permitted. Therefore, assuming that the views of the Chief Executive, as well as the views of the distinguished Senator from New York, prevail, it is fair to expect that at least one element of our people will substantially benefit through the enactment of this bill, if it is honestly administered.

Yet, despite the benefits which our colored workers will possibly derive from this legislation, I know of no effort on their part to sacrifice their present freedom to gain this doubtful benefit. Our colored people, long the victims of slavery, cherish their freedom too dearly to sell that which they possess for the mirage promised in this bill.

The press at times has referred to the "brain trust" and the influence of the "brain trust" on the activities of the White House. The press seemingly have yet to realize that the "brain trust", or the majority thereof, are professed Socialists who, realizing that the American people will not tolerate socialism in America, now operate under what is known as the "new Democracy" or the "new deal."

Whether such unbridled authority is justified is another consideration which will interest those members of the Senate who, blindly following the President, depending entirely upon his great sense of equity and justice, have made it possible for the President, responding to the cries of the National Economy League, to pauperize almost a million of those who in years gone by have bared their breasts to the enemy to support and to add to the prestige of the Stars and Stripes.

The President in a message to the Congress insisted that in order to balance the Budget we must deprive these needy veterans of $400,000,000 each year. Since that legislation passed we have, through one act or another, created thousands of jobs—all outside the Civil Service—to be filled by political heelers, at salaries from $12,000, paid to the man who supposedly supervises the work of the dollar-a-day army, down to those paid nominal wages who render honest service to the Government.

While we may be led to believe that the dollar-a-day army is supervised and led by civilians, the slightest investigation on the part of any Member of the Senate will prove that the United States Army is directing this work and is entitled to any credit therefor.

We have deprived thousands of needy veterans who served their country well, returning to their families with health shattered, even if bodily whole, of the aid they richly deserve in order that others might be enriched.

During the Hoover regime the Democratic congressional leaders were often loud in their criticism of the centralization of power, or the attempted usurpation by the Chief Executive of the power vested in the Congress under the Constitution. If such criticism was based upon principle and not on political expediency, why, then, are the critics of centralization of governmental control so silent now? Surely the present occupant of the White House has eliminated not only State lines but in addition thereto he has virtually taken upon himself, with the help of the Democrats who still look hungrily at the patronage table, all political and economic power in the United States.

Last November the people of the United States placed the Democratic Party—the party of State's rights—in complete control of all branches of our Government. In so doing the people had a right to assume that control of the Government would be vested in practical men, men well versed in statecraft and in American legislative procedure, men believing in upholding American traditions and the American Constitution. At no time in the history of the United States has legislation been proposed by the Chief Executive or been enacted which so openly and so flagrantly overrode State borders and centralized complete control of the Government of the United States in one individual.

The Democracy of the present day praises the attitude of Jefferson and Jackson, yet it is common knowledge that Jefferson and Jackson fought for local control, community and State, and opposed the centralization of government at Washington.

The "new deal", while it sings the praises of Jefferson and Jackson, is more in keeping with the preachings of Norman Thomas, Stalin, Mussolini, and Hitler.

The people of the United States last November had the opportunity of placing a Socialist in the White House, but the opposition of the American people to socialism is so strong that the presidential candidate of that party received only 2 percent of the total vote cast. While the American people were justified in thinking that as a result of the last national election they had definitely rejected socialism, they are now awakening to the fact that they were grossly misled. Since the 4th of March we have had proposed by the Chief Executive and the Congress has enacted more out-and-out socialistic legislation than has ever been enacted in a similar period by any major power other than Soviet Russia.

It is interesting to note that Socialism, Communism, Fascism, and Hitlerism predicate their success on the necessity of eliminating the influence of the so-called "middle class" of a people. In America, as in most other countries, the so-called "middle class" comprises not only the majority of the people but it is also from the middle class that the major improvements in living standards emanate. They form the backbone of every modern government, with the exception of Soviet Russia.

For me to say that the "new deal" is dependent for its success upon the elimination of the middle class of the American people by forcing those now comprising the middle class into industrial slavery or industrial servitude may seem harsh. Yet a careful reading of the catechism of the proponent of the "new deal" written and published since the inauguration of the present Chief Executive permits of no other belief.

It may be of interest to know from whence this "new deal" emanates. It may even interest the legislative leaders of the democracy to know from whence they may secure now an outline of the "new deal" which they will be expected to support, and how, through the working of the "new deal," the people of the United States are to be forced into socialism or a socialized society.

Socialism to be successful must have a dictator—a dictator in name and fact. Thus there is a common ground for socialism, communism, fascism, and Hitlerism. They are all predicated on the belief that through the manipulation of a few, or the hypnotic power of a few, the few can force the many to live as the few believe people should live.

An indication that the views of the so-called "brain trust" are incorporated in the recovery-of-industry section of the Wagner bill is found on page 3, line 1. Herein we find this language:

> The President may establish an industrial planning and research agency.

Compare this authorization with the following citation found on page 100 of Professor Tugwell's book:

> American institutions would necessarily require great changes in the system—such, for instance, as the establishment of organization for national planning and control.

We are told by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], legislative sponsor for the proposed recovery of industry bill, that one of the prime purposes of the bill is the elimination of competition, and we find, on page 130 of Professor Tugwell's book, the following:

> Whether they operate under single management or not, business men have learned that competition, in most of its forms, is wasteful and costly, and they are stubbornly opposed to its reestablishment.

Control and governmental direction of capital is one of the fundamentals underlying the operation of the "new deal." Control of capital is provided for in the dictatorial control of industry, the dictatorial control of agriculture, and the dictatorship to be established over the railroads.

Another purpose set forth in the recovery-of-industry section of the bill sponsored by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is to control the investment of capital to prevent a surplus of production.

Again we find the influence of the so-called "brain trust", as set forth in the book of Professor Tugwell, where, on page 136, we find the following:

> Scarcely an industry but possesses capital equipment which, if it were used continuously, could produce many more goods than in any single year it does produce. Every industry has its own surplus problem. But what this means is that we have permitted capital investments of certain kinds to outrun the possibility of market absorption at the price which must be charged. * * * A better-regulated flow of funds into industry which could use capital effectively and continuously might correct the difficulty. But how shall we achieve such regulation so long as we insist on competition, on voluntarism, and on the sacredness of the right of each to do as he sees fit with the property to which he holds the title?

What will happen to the individual initiative of the millions of our people who through self-sacrifice on their part have toiled long years in an industry in the hope that their knowledge or their skill would soon result in promotion which would permit of better living conditions for themselves and their families?

What incentive is left to the many thousands of young Americans still in school or college if the Congress of the United States is to socialize American industry and virtually place a bar against the elevation of young America to profitable employment and the use of the talents developed through years of study in school or college? What would have happened to the genius of Edison, of Marconi, of the Wright brothers, to name but a few, had such legislation been in force in their day?

We are told that this socialization of industry has the approval and support of the United States Chamber of Commerce and of the various manufacturers' trade associations. We are told that manufacturers are willing to pay this price in order that they be permitted to set aside the provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act and the Clayton Act.

However, personally I believe that manufacturers have temporarily been blinded by another presumed fact, that is, that there will be no new developments with which present-day manufacturers will have to compete. Consequently those who now possess wealth in the form of control of industry will be guaranteed profits, which, of late years, they have not received.

From whence will these profits come? There is but one source, and that is the general public. Therefore, the general public, or the consumers of our country, through the action of the Congress of the United States, inspired and directed by the Chief Executive, will be bled white that owners of industry may temporarily prosper. Again we come to the well-known claim of the Socialist and the Communist.

In order to make such un-American doctrines prevail in America, it is essential that the workers and the farmers be arrayed against the property owners. Two years hence, when the Government will supposedly lift its heavy hand from the control of American industry, those who would socialize America will be able to point to the control which property owners presumably had over the Congress of the United States; they will be able to point to the guaranteed profits in the form of dividends or improved asset value of large and controlling plants in various American industries; they will be able to point to the development of trusts such as America never before witnessed.

During the past 40 days the securities of the key American industries have increased in quoted value many millions of dollars. The quoted value of some securities have increased more than 100 percent without the physical property or the balance sheets of such concerns being much different from what they were prior to the inauguration of the "New Deal."

Who is responsible for the rigging of the market, may I inquire? The answer is evident to those who will visualize the results of the enactment of the legislation proposed by the Chief Executive, acting on the inspiration of what is known as the "brain trust."

Bankers and speculators, some of whom may be more conversant than others with the plans of those now in control of the Government, to my mind, are gambling that with guaranteed profits to the few, through the exploitation of the many, they will be able to unload their holdings on the dear public, at a later date, with tremendous enrichment to themselves.

These are the problems, Mr. President, to which we should direct our attention, and not to the problem which may grow out of someone who, perchance, had an opportunity to purchase stock through some banking house, which he did purchase, and which it was his privilege to do, so long as the investment was not tainted with corruption and bribery.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DICKINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HATFIELD. I am always glad to yield to my good friend the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I appreciate the courtesy of the eminent Senator representing, in part, the State of West Virginia; but knowing, as I do know, him to be a man of practical thought and much reflection, he having defined what he feels the present relations to the country of the Government under the present administration, and then having referred to what appears to be a rising prosperity and to multiplying advantages from what may be called the stock market, may I ask the able Senator if the methods of government to which he has alluded have not produced this result and thus brought again the suggestion of prosperity where before only universal depression prevailed? What else, does the able Senator say, has caused the increase of prices and given this new impetus to industry?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I do not think there is any question but that the cause is the legislation enacted or the legislation projected; but the point that I am trying to make is that this prosperity has begun at the wrong place—the stock market. The increase in stock prices is not based on an increased business activity of those industries represented by the stock. It did not begin with an increase in the speed of the turning wheels of industry throughout the length and breadth of this land; it did not begin with the coal miner, who is walking the highways today begging for bread and looking for work. The same condition prevails today in the industrial plants of America that prevailed, generally speaking, some time before the recent legislation was enacted into law.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HATFIELD. I should be very glad to yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I think there cannot be any doubt that the increase in prices of certain articles, including industrial stocks——

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator please speak a little louder? I should like to hear what he is saying.

Mr. FESS. My observation comes from the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois. I said I did not think there can be any doubt in the mind of anyone that there is a better feeling in the country, a feeling of greater confidence which has stimulated psychologically an increase in the prices of commodities, including industrial stocks; but the measure of whether there is any increase of wealth is to be determined by whether there is any increase in employment or any decrease in unemployment. There can be no doubt that there has been a constant decrease in employment, or that unemployment has continued to grow greater. I repeat that there is a better feeling and a hope that because of the action at the White House there is going to be a recovery; but unless we can find some way by which we can provide employment for a portion of the unemployed the improvement is purely psychological and must have a fatal effect in time to come, which will not be far removed.

The increase of prices in the stock market cannot be a barometer to indicate whether there is an increase in prosperity, for that is a gambling place which is operated on the basis of hope; and unless there is some assurance that industry is reemploying labor the improvement is purely artificial, as the Senator from Illinois must know. I am fearful that we will face a very serious problem when it comes to the financing of the obligations of the Government that are soon to mature. That is when we will find whether or not there is any prosperity here.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am truly glad even to think that there is soon to be a recovery as forecast by some. I am not complaining about the better feeling that exists among the rank and file of the American people or the support that is being given the policies of the President. What I am complaining about is the strange and un-American methods of approach, which are foreign to the policy that has heretofore been applied in working out a solution of industrial problems growing out of debacles that have plagued the American people in the past. I am delivering this address not as one of censure or criticism but of admonition that we may not depart from that broad, beaten path which has given to the average American more comfort, more protection, and more independence than has been enjoyed by the people of any other nation in the annals of history.

Mr. President, rugged Americanism—the type of Americanism that built a Nation out of the wilderness—was developed by voluntary effort and the willingness for self-sacrifice on the part of our hardy pioneers.

No governmental agency settled our Western States, or built or developed our railroads, our industries, or the pioneering spirit of the American people, which alone has made America great.

Despite the present world-wide depression, even those, like Professor Tugwell, who are using the present emergency to put over their program of socialized industry, admit—and I quote from page 77 of Tugwell's book—

> Regulation may be a prelude to public ownership; but the nature of our traditions makes it likely that we will try it pretty thoroughly before we go on to socialization in any complete sense.

[At this point a message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, which appears under the appropriate heading.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, at this point, feeling that I will not take the Senator from West Virginia too far from his text, I rise, with his permission, to address myself to the observations of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

May I say that I was impressed with the thought of the Senator from Ohio, partly replying to my interrogatory to the Senator from West Virginia as to what he would attribute what appeared to be the present increase in employment and what also appears to be a trend in the direction of prosperity. The able Senator from Ohio indicates that, while it is true that there is the appearance of a prosperity in the way of a rise in prices, in the general market for securities, and in the general atmosphere of hope in the structure of what we call the business world, still the able Senator joins my eminent friend from West Virginia, the orator addressing the Senate, in the suggestion that, with all this, he cannot find consolation, nor does he see anything that will secure prosperity. If I understand the able Senator, the patient was about to die under the previous doctor; it was evident that life was ebbing away and the ceremonial processes of the funeral were upon the eve of undertaking. A new doctor has come in, and under the treatment of the newer one something has transpired by which the patient seems to rise, get to his feet, take on new life, dismiss his illness, and assume what appears to be the promise of permanent health; but because it was not done and secured under the previous prescriptions of the doctor who has been dismissed, the health returning to the patient and new life afforded him should not be regarded as regular, permanent, nor profitable, if I understand the able Senator. Therefore, I must say that I am not able to concur in the theory that the success which we are enjoying, the development the able Senator from West Virginia discloses can be charged to anything else, if it is to be credited, than the action of the Government itself and the confidence of the American people in the revival through the instrumentalities put into effect by the President and his associates.

If this be not true I ask both eminent Senators, the orator from West Virginia and the eminent philosophic Senator from Ohio, how and in what other way would prosperity, or any evidence of it, come to our country than in the very manner which is now being enjoyed?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. It is far-fetched for the Senator from Ohio to reply to the doctor's analogy when there is a physician now on the floor of the Senate——

Mr. LEWIS. Of great eminence and ability.

Mr. FESS. Yes; and I should prefer that he would deal with that analogy. My suggestion would be that when the patient is ill sometimes a stimulant will give him the promise of life for a little while, but when the effect of the stimulant has worn off he is in a poorer condition than he was before he got drunk. That is the situation we are in today. The Senator from Illinois will be one of the first men to recognize this axiomatic statement, that when the Government itself proposes to spend unlimited money, that is a promise of money going into circulation. That of itself will stimulate the market and offers a splendid opportunity for the gambler on the stock exchange to make money. That is what is being done now. Let us wait for 6 months and then see the effect of the sort of legislation which we are now enacting and the policies which we are now pursuing. That will be a better time than today.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I think the eminent Senator from Ohio is possibly a better doctor of literature and philosophy than I am of medicine. My conclusion as to the situation which confronts the United States today is that the American people are looking, hoping, and praying, and no one more fervently than I, for restitution to come, but I cannot make up my mind that this restitution can come and be stabilized unless it be upon a sound constructive basis. I question the basis which has been adopted and which is threatened to be applied at the present time by the present administration.

Here again it will be noted that Professor Tugwell advocates a deferred socialization as necessary, due to the nature of our traditions, but as a prelude to public ownership we should have rigid regulation. Is it possible for the Congress to legalize any more drastic regulation than is called for under the recovery-of-industry section of the Wagner bill or more rigid regulation than is called for in the railroad control bill or more rigid regulation than was enacted in the dictatorial control of American agriculture?

Mr. President, I have no hesitancy in stating that, to my mind, those who are temporarily dominating the policies of the Roosevelt administration are bent on the socialization of our industries and of our country. Whether or not the President will go with them remains to be seen. I say temporarily, believing that the Democratic leaders, having but one view at present, and that of securing as much at the political pie counter as possible, will soon awaken to the fact that they are competing for continued control of their own party with the modern-day Socialists, some of whom are anchored close to the Chief Executive at the White House.

Every Member of the Congress has given his pledge to uphold the Constitution. I will admit that there is considerable opposition to some recent changes in the Constitution, but the great majority of the Congress and of the American people believe in the principle of government as embodied in that Constitution.

Yet I have no hesitancy in pointing out to the Senate that we will soon be asked, in the name of emergency, to enact a bill through which we will, or, at least, those who vote for it will, most emphatically destroy the effectiveness of the Constitution of the United States.

It remains to be seen whether Professor Tugwell is justified in his surmise that the Supreme Court, because of the importance of the period, or due to the emergency, will be forced to approve a socialistic dictum, or will they, as the Court has always heretofore done, continue to uphold the Constitution?

In so doing the Democratic Party will again be complying with the principles of government as outlined for the "brain trust" by Professor Tugwell. The following quotation, page 192 of Tugwell's book, will interest those who still retain faith in the Constitution of the United States:

> Those who wish for some control over industry and who are plagued with the obvious effectiveness of State powers, are reduced to appealing from the restricted view of commerce as commerce to a view of it as industry. When, on a few occasions, such attempts have been embodied in legislation, another clause of the Constitution—the fifth amendment—has invariably been invoked in rebuttal. That clause says that property cannot be taken without the process of law, and has served to obstruct, most effectively, attempts to extend Federal controls to industry.

A further indication of the influence of the "brain trust" and its expressed intention of forcing the American people into socialism, as set forth in Professor Tugwell's book and as outlined in the so-called "Wagner bill", is found on page 133. The recovery of industry bill places control of industry temporarily in the manufacturers' trade associations. Professor Tugwell, on page 133, says:

> The industrial world belongs to the business man, not to the workers; and since it belongs to them, the business men make its rules. The workers have a veto power, which is more or less effective; but it is only that and is not transformed into a positive force in the direction of affairs. * * * Organized labor has always consented to this entirely uncreative subjection. There are almost no instances, since the industrial revolution, in which, as a group, it has been able to dictate the policies and to determine the forms of economic life. The small business man of the eighteenth century has evolved into the corporation of the twentieth century; but, essentially, there is no change to record among the unions. They even, many of them, retain their craft organization. This is an age of unprecedented integration.

It is evident to every clear-thinking American that the enactment of the recovery-of-industry section of the Wagner bill will set up an American dictatorship of industry.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HATFIELD. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator has been reading from Professor Tugwell's book.

Mr. HATFIELD. That is true.

Mr. FESS. Has the Senator refreshed his mind with reference to the principles of Karl Marx since he has been examining the movement for industrial control?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, in response to the question of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, Karl Marx, after reading the radicalism of Professor Tugwell, would, were he living, necessarily be compelled to apologize for his conservatism to Professor Tugwell.

Mr. FESS. The reason why I asked the question was that in examining the proposal, and I have read it carefully and studied it through and through, I reach the conclusion that it goes farther than the principles of Karl Marx.

Mr. HATFIELD. There is no question about that, and I propose to have published in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks a section of the book that was copied from the works of Karl Marx.

The apparent lack of interest in or consideration for the Constitution, which has served the United States so well for the past 145 years, is manifest to everyone who has seen the evident purpose of the present administration to usurp the duties delegated to the Congress. Under the guise of emergency we find that the Chief Executive, contrary to party pledges, has debased our currency; seeks to establish a dictatorship over American agriculture and American industry, patterned, in part at least, after the Soviet idea; seeks, in concert with foreign nations, to destroy our industry and deny employment opportunities to our workers by reducing our tariff rates; seeks to enter into entangling alliances with foreign governments through which will be pledged the finances and the man power of our country to meddle into the thousand-year-old feuds of Europeans and Asiatics.

Well might we ask why this strange and uncalled-for procedure after the experiences of our entry into the conflict of 1914 to 1918.

Is it possible that any sane person, knowing the American attitude toward Europeans who have no respect for their word or their bond, and who have indicated their ingratitude, would attempt to beguile foreign nations into the belief that the finances and man power of America will again enter into the feuds existing between foreign nations at a cost so stupendous to the American people that it has brought suffering, privation—yes, death, in hundreds of thousands of cases to the lifeblood of America for the past 19 years?

Again we find the answer to this new and strange attitude toward the Constitution of the founders of our country on pages 77 and 78 of Professor Tugwell's book, wherein he writes:

> Any people which must be governed according to the written codes of an instrument which defines the spheres of individual and group, State and Federal, action, must expect to suffer from the constant maladjustment of progress. A life which changes and a constitution for governance which does not must always raise questions which are difficult for solution. The changing of our Constitution is not easy; it is easier to get new interpretations of it, which alter the possibilities of action, from the courts which are intrusted with the scrutiny of legislative acts.

Mr. President, Professor Tugwell in these words definitely calls for the elimination of our Constitution. Despite the fact that our Constitution has stood the test of time and has protected the humblest of our citizenry, according to Professor Tugwell it is now in the way. To bring forth the new deal or industrial democracy we must, I assume, junk the Constitution; but, how? Professor Tugwell says it is not easy to change our Constitution, but he suggests—

> Courts, therefore, which cared more that the economic life should freely develop new forms, * * * could clear the way for advance.

Does this mean that new appointees to the Supreme Court will be judged on the basis of their willingness to eliminate constitutional restrictions?

Continuing, Professor Tugwell writes:

> It is their duty to determine whether specific legislative acts are consonant with its principles. Courts, therefore, which cared more that the economic life should freely develop new forms, and that the necessary corollary kinds of control should develop rapidly, than that the letter of an instrument which is written in preindustrial terms should be preserved, could clear the way for advance. But our courts have not, until recently, provided confidence in their determination to accept the civilizing processes of industry. Jurists seem to guard the letter as more precious than the spirit, and usually prefer the old competition to the new control. Our social facilities are provided, but in an unplanned, competitive, and costly way.

The proponents of this modern way of achieving socialism, knowing well the power of public opinion once it is aroused, do not hesitate to offer manufacturers and those in possession of wealth an opportunity of temporarily greater security for such wealth.

The recovery-of-industry section of the so-called "Wagner bill" temporarily insures to those who at present possess property rights not only security but added profits. In so doing, they preempt the field of industry and deny to the fertile mind or the skilled hand of the many any opportunity of rising beyond their present status. This suggestion might interest the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who has indicated his hostility to the outlawing by legislation of competition in industry.

Mr. President, I have the conviction that it would be to the interest of every individual to see to it that each and every industry under the American flag shall continue to have the proper competition; and it is a well-known fact that when we enter into the field of regulation by commissions the American people will pay the price. Yet while temporarily insuring added profits, as I have said, this program of "the new deal", as outlined in Professor Tugwell's book, insures in time the demoralization of the very industries it temporarily seeks to enhance in value.

We find on page 156 of Professor Tugwell's book the following:

> We have already said that to obtain a straight, unwasted stream of effort, it is necessary to have one dominant group. But any dominant group will, just as the business men did, pursue a single interest. If we repudiate the capitalist-entrepreneur group as a possibility—though this group still holds the greatest power—for the creation of a better future, there are only two really inclusive and powerful groups left—the workers and the technicians.

The quotation I have just read is positive. It is honest. The writer does not conceal his thoughts or his ideas.

The business man, according to Professor Tugwell, referred to as "the capitalist-entrepreneur", should be ousted from control of American industry, and control of American industry should be turned over to "the workers and the technicians." Professor Tugwell qualifies as one of the latter.

Continuing to quote from this book, we find Professor Tugwell stressing the point that—

> They (the workers) have the best chance of usurping the dictatorship which now belongs to business men.

We find that Professor Tugwell is aware of the opposition of the American people to socialism, for, on page 192, he writes:

> For one thing, the Democratic idea has a powerful traditional appeal to us, and the logic of applying it in industrial as well as political affairs is quite obvious.

I trust the obvious intent or recommendation herein contained will not go unnoticed by those interested in political as well as industrial affairs. As I read it, Professor Tugwell and those associated with him believe that the successful way to implant socialism in free America is to do so under the guise of "industrial democracy", using their present control of democracy, with its traditional appeal to many.

Continuing to quote from Professor Tugwell, we find that—

> This alone would persuade many to its acceptance.

Acceptance of what, other than socialism, even though it be labeled "industrial democracy"?

Professor Tugwell refers to the combination of workers and technicians, and then says:

> The difficulties with the combination of labor are obvious. As a group, it (labor) includes numerically a greater number of individuals than either of the other two; but for control the qualifications are lacking. Then, too, size makes it unwieldy and inflexible. Also, its present organization and leadership are not such as would justify any great confidence in enlightened action.

Professor Tugwell, a believer in soviet ideas, gives vent to his feelings of opposition to the present leadership of the American Federation of Labor and the railroad brotherhoods because of their inflexible opposition to recognition of Soviet Russia, and their inflexible demand for the continuation of Americanism and for voluntarism.

In closing this part of his peroration, Professor Tugwell writes:

> But all these difficulties are less than those which disqualify the business men who have had their chance and have shown their inability to function socially.

The quotation I have just cited indicates that Professor Tugwell finds American industrial leaders at least incompetent; and, continuing, we find that Professor Tugwell holds the same relative opinion of those intrusted by the workers with the leadership of American labor organizations.

> It has already been suggested that a gradual growth of industrial democracy might reconstruct the labor movement. It might, by growing in this medium, become relevant to industrial structure, as it is not now; it might, by new organization, engage a different type of leadership; it might even, as has also been suggested, develop a working faith in expertness and learn to protect the principle of qualification.

Possibly, under the domination of the new deal and the leadership which the White House will place in control of American workers, Professor Tugwell hopes to establish a basis for a new labor movement and a union with the technician, as we find Professor Tugwell predicting:

> This would be most promising of all, for this really involves a union of the technical and labor group. Industrial organization on this basis would be fundamentally controlled in the interest of the greatest number, but would attain flexibility, initiative, and qualified ability by keeping in the foreground the necessity for knowledge and skill in actual operation.

If this does not portray industrial servitude for manual workers, what, then, is it?

If it is possible to secure such a union of workers and technicians, we find Professor Tugwell asserting:

> A program based on this control idea could be supported with some confidence in its good effects, as well as some confidence in its coming into being. And both these are important tests for any proposed program to meet.

Mr. President, personally I believe that the remedy proposed by Professor Tugwell, which I have reason to believe is concurred in by the other members of the "brain trust", and which we find incorporated in title I of the bill sponsored by the genial and able Senator from New York, is an indication of what the American people may expect when the wheels of the new deal commence to roll.

To my mind, the proposals contained in the farm bill, as well as the remedies outlined in title I of the so-called "Wagner bill", place the Federal Government well on the road to socialism. There are some who, placing political expediency and desire for political favor ahead of principle, may contend I am wrong. To any who may question that the legislation we are asked to enact places America well on the road to socialism it might be well to quote the meaning of the word "socialism" as found on page 1987 of Webster's New International Dictionary of the English Language, printed in 1930. This dictionary defines the word "socialism" as meaning the following:

> Political and economic theory of social reorganization, the essential feature of which is governmental control of economic activities, to the end that competition shall give way to cooperation, and that the opportunities of life and the rewards of labor shall be equitably apportioned.

Mr. President, the American people have passed on the question of whether or not they would intrust control of our National Government to the hands of those who honestly and freely preach socialism.

The Socialists last November received some 2 percent of the total vote cast.

However, those advising the present Chief Executive, realizing that he was elected as a Democrat and knowing also the attitude of the American people toward socialism, trying to be true to their own belief, namely, socialism, and having to cloud their activities will probably call their type of socialism the "new deal" or "industrial democracy."

As an evidence of the truth of what I have just said, I might call the attention of the Senate to the following quotation found on page 157 of Professor Tugwell's book:

> In a former chapter, the argument seemed to conclude that industrial democracy held considerable promise, and it would not seem altogether unlikely as a possible development. For one thing, the Democratic idea has a powerful traditional appeal to us, and the logic of applying it in industrial as well as political affairs is quite obvious. This alone would persuade many to its acceptance.

In the quotation I have herein given, you will note that Professor Tugwell advocates that the Socialists in America who wish to carry out their program change their name to industrial democracy. To indicate the close workings of those in control of the Socialist Party of America and the "brain trust" it might be well to bear in mind that the Socialist leaders of America met in Washington on May 9 and listened to an address of their presidential candidate, Norman Thomas, in which Thomas declared it was necessary to change the party's name if they were to be successful, but while he advocated a change in name he did not advocate any change in principles.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope and trust that the Members of the Senate, elected to represent the Republican or the Democratic viewpoint, will give some serious consideration to the evident attempt now being made to force socialism on the American people under the guise of industrial democracy, taking advantage of this period of depression, and as a matter of expediency on the part of those who lack the courage to openly tell the American people that they in reality believe in Socialism, and not in Republicanism or Democracy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of my address a chapter from a book entitled "The Essentials of Karl Marx," headed "Position of the Communists in Relation to the Various Existing Opposition Parties."

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POSITION OF THE COMMUNISTS IN RELATION TO THE VARIOUS EXISTING OPPOSITION PARTIES

Section II has made clear the relations of the Communists to the existing working class parties, such as the Chartists in England and the Agrarian Reformers in America.

The Communists fight for the attainment of the immediate aims, for the enforcement of the momentary interests of the working class; but in the movement of the present they also represent and take care of the future of that movement.

In France the Communists ally themselves with the Social-Democrats against the conservative and radical bourgeoisie, reserving, however, the right to take up a critical position in regard to phrases and illusions traditionally handed down from the great Revolution.

In Switzerland they support the Radicals, without losing sight of the fact that this party consists of antagonistic elements, partly of Democratic Socialists, in the French sense, partly of radical bourgeois.

In Poland they support the party that insists on an agrarian revolution, as the prime condition for national emancipation, that party which fomented the insurrection of Cracow in 1846.

In Germany they fight side by side with the bourgeoisie whenever it acts in a revolutionary way, against the absolute monarchy, the feudal, squirearchy, and the petty bourgeoisie.

But they never cease for a single instant to instill into the working class the clearest possible recognition of the hostile antagonism between bourgeoisie and proletariat, in order that the German workers may straightway use, as so many weapons against the bourgeoisie, the social and political conditions that the bourgeoisie must necessarily introduce along with its supremacy, and in order that, after the fall of the reactionary classes in Germany, the fight against the bourgeoisie itself may immediately begin.

The Communists turn their attention chiefly to Germany, because that country is on the eve of a bourgeois revolution that is bound to be carried out under more advanced conditions of European civilization, and with a more developed proletariat than that of England was in the seventeenth and of France in the eighteenth century, and because the bourgeois revolution in Germany will be but the prelude to an immediately following proletarian revolution.

In short, the Communists everywhere support every revolutionary movement against the existing social and political order of things.

In all these movements they bring to the front as the leading question in each, the property question, no matter what its degree of development at the time.

Finally, they labor everywhere for the union and agreement of the democratic parties of all countries.

The Communists disdain to conceal their views and aims. They openly declare that their ends can be attained only by the forcible overthrow of all existing social conditions. Let the ruling classes tremble at a communistic revolution. The proletarians have nothing to lose but their chains. They have a world to win.

Workingmen of all countries, unite!

LOANS BY RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION TO CLOSED BUILDING-AND-LOAN ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, yesterday I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 1648, to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, to provide for loans to closed building and loan associations, introduced by the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], was passed. I did that because I was not on the floor of the Senate when the bill was passed, and in reading it through I discovered that no mention had been made of savings and loan associations or banks which might be closed, and it seemed to me that there was no defense to allowing building and loan associations which are closed to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and not allow savings and loan associations to do so. For that reason I entered a motion to reconsider. The Senator from Ohio is anxious to have the matter acted upon.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will it take any length of time?

Mr. DILL. I think not. The Senator from Ohio has an explanation of his view of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. We have been 2 days trying to get some action on the independent offices appropriation bill, and not a line of it has been read. I had hoped that we could go ahead with that now.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I think this will take but a few minutes. I do not think there is any controversy.

Mr. McKELLAR. With that understanding, I should be willing to allow the matter to be taken up.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. DILL. I wanted the Senator from Ohio to have an opportunity to say a word.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I think I can safely assure the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] that it is not necessary to have the words "savings and loan associations" included in this bill.

The words "savings and loan associations" did not appear in the original Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, yet loans were made to savings and loan associations in the State of Washington and in my State under the general generic term "building-and-loan associations." Loans were made in Louisiana to homestead associations, also under the general generic term of "building-and-loan associations." The interpretation is well established, I am advised by the legal department of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Those loans having been made under that language in the original act, similar loans would undoubtedly be made to closed savings and loan associations under the language of Senate bill 1648.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator does not want the amendment, adding the words "savings and loan associations", in the measure?

Mr. BULKLEY. I would rather not have those words inserted, for the reason that I think that raising the question at this time would only add confusion to the situation. Loans have already been made to savings and loan associations under authority to lend to building and loan associations. Amending this act now would be to repudiate the interpretation with which the Senator and I are entirely in accord.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, my reason for feeling concerned about this is that last year, on my own suggestion, the law was amended to include savings banks, and I thought the language then inserted would take care of savings and loan associations, but I found that it did not. That is why I am so fearful. But if the Senator has consulted with the legal department, and they have assured him that the language "building-and-loan associations" does include savings and loan associations, and that they have been making loans with that understanding, I do not want to press the reconsideration, and I am willing to withdraw the motion.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is exactly the assurance I have from counsel for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. DILL. Then, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COOLIDGE in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion is withdrawn.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will report the first amendment.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "American Battle Monuments Commission", on page 4, line 23, after the word "periodicals", to strike out "$112,000" and insert "$129,000", so as to read:

For every expenditure requisite for or incident to the work of the American Battle Monuments Commission authorized by the act entitled "An act for the creation of an American Battle Monuments Commission to erect suitable memorials commemorating the services of the American soldier in Europe, and for other purposes", approved March 4, 1923 (U.S.C., title 36, secs. 121–133), including the acquisition of land or interest in land in foreign countries for carrying out the purposes of said act without submission to the Attorney General of the United States under the provisions of section 355 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 34, sec. 520; title 40, sec. 255); the maintenance of memorials erected by the Commission until the Secretary of War is advised of their completion and assumes their maintenance; employment of personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; traveling expenses; the establishment of offices and the rent of office space in foreign countries; the maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles which may be furnished to the Commission by other departments of the Government or acquired by purchase; printing, binding, engraving, lithographing, photographing, and typewriting, including the publication of information concerning the American activities, battlefields, memorials, and cemeteries in Europe; the purchase of maps, textbooks, newspapers, periodicals, $129,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Interstate Commerce Commission, salaries and expenses", on page 23, line 24, before the word "of", to strike out "$2,250,000" and insert "$2,400,000"; and on page 24, line 2, after the figures "$50,000" and the semicolon, to insert "not exceeding $150,000 for holding field hearings", so as to read:

General administrative expenses: For 11 commissioners, secretary, and for all other authorized expenditures necessary in the execution of laws to regulate commerce, including 1 chief counsel, 1 director of finance, and 1 director of traffic at $10,000 each per annum, traveling expenses, and contract stenographic reporting services, $2,400,000, of which amount not to exceed $2,155,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia, exclusive of special counsel, for which the expenditure shall not exceed $50,000; not exceeding $150,000 for holding field hearings; not exceeding $3,000 for purchase and exchange of necessary books, reports, and periodicals; not exceeding $100 in the open market for the purchase of office furniture similar in class or kind to that listed in the general supply schedule: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be available for rent of buildings in the District of Columbia if suitable space is provided by the Public Buildings Commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 28, at the end of line 8, to change the total appropriation for the Interstate Commerce Commission from $5,040,000 to $5,190,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Supreme Court Building Commission", on page 35, line 10, after the word "For" to strike out "continuing" and insert "completing", so as to read:

Supreme Court Building: For completing the construction of the building for the United States Supreme Court in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of a building for the Supreme Court of the United States", approved December 20, 1929 (46 Stat., pp. 50 and 51), $3,490,000, to remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Veterans' Administration, Military Services", on page 45, line 14, after the word "prescribe" and the semicolon, strike out "and notwithstanding any provisions of law to the contrary, the Administrator is authorized to procure actuarial services by contract, without obtaining competition, at such rates of compensation as he may determine to be reasonable"; so as to read:

Administration, medical, hospital, and domiciliary services: For all salaries and expenses of the Veterans' Administration, including the expenses of maintenance and operation of medical, hospital, and domiciliary services of the Veterans' Administration, in carrying out the duties, powers, and functions devolving upon it pursuant to the authority contained in the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to consolidate and coordinate governmental activities affecting war veterans", approved July 3, 1930 (U.S.C., Supp. VI, title 38, secs. 11–11f), and any and all laws for which the Veterans' Administration is now or may hereafter be charged with administering, $85,273,000: Provided, That not to exceed $8,000,000 of this amount shall be available for all expenses and maintenance of all regional offices of the Veterans' Administration: Provided, That not to exceed $3,500 of this amount shall be available for expenses, except membership fees, of employees detailed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to attend meetings of associations for the promotion of medical science and annual national conventions of organized war veterans: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be available also for personal services and rentals in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, including traveling expenses; examination of estimates of appropriations in the field, including actual expenses of subsistence or per diem allowance in lieu thereof; for expenses incurred in packing, crating, drayage, and transportation of household effects and other property, not exceeding in any one case 5,000 pounds, of employees when transferred from one official station to another for permanent duty and when specifically authorized by the Administrator; furnishing and laundering of such wearing apparel as may be prescribed for employees in the performance of their official duties; purchase and exchange of law books, books of reference, periodicals, and newspapers; for passenger-carrying and other motor vehicles, including purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of same, including not more than two passenger automobiles for general administrative use of the bureau in the District of Columbia and three for the Washington, District of Columbia regional office; and notwithstanding any provisions of law to the contrary, the Administrator is authorized to utilize Government-owned automotive equipment in transporting children of Veterans' Administration employees located at isolated stations to and from school under such limitations as he may by regulation prescribe; for operating expenses of the Arlington Building and annex, and the Wilkins Building, including repairs and mechanical equipment, fuel, electric current, ice, ash removal, and miscellaneous items; for allotment and transfer to the Public Health Service, the War, Navy, and Interior Departments, for disbursement by them under the various headings of their applicable appropriations, of such amounts as are necessary for the care and treatment of beneficiaries of the Veterans' Administration, including minor repairs and improvements of existing facilities under their jurisdiction necessary to such care and treatment; for expenses incidental to the maintenance and operation of farms; for recreational articles and facilities at institutions maintained by the Veterans' Administration; for administrative expenses incidental to securing employment for war veterans; for funeral, burial, and other expenses incidental thereto for beneficiaries of the Veterans' Administration accruing during the fiscal year 1934 or prior fiscal years:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, line 21, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$15,000", so as to make the additional proviso read:

Provided further, That the appropriations herein made for medical and hospital services under the jurisdiction of the Veterans' Administration shall be available, not to exceed $15,000, for experimental purposes to determine the value of certain types of treatment.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I invite the Senate's attention to the inclusion in the pending bill of the appropriation for the Veterans' Administration, particularly to that provision in the bill which provides money for the payment of pensions to veterans of the various wars in which our country has taken part.

It is fitting that the Senate should be engaged in the consideration of these items upon this day. For over threescore years the American people by common consent have united in paying a tribute of high honor and respect to the Nation's soldier heroes. I think I can render no finer service to those who have worn the uniform than to make some comment upon this item in the bill and upon some matters which are very closely related.

We all remember that upon March 20 approval was given to Public Law No. 2 of this session, commonly known as the "Economy Act."

Title I of that act repeals all pension laws relating to veterans serving in the World War and in the Spanish-

American War, provides a new basis for pensions, delegates to the President the power to fix the rates and within stated limitations to prescribe the conditions under which different classes of veterans may receive pensions.

Pursuant to this law, on March 31 the President made the regulations contemplated by the act, and subsequently the Veterans' Bureau published certain instructions in furtherance of the regulations and of the act. This law, these instructions, and the regulations to which I have referred, in combination, constitute the laws fixing the right to draw pension in this country at this time. With respect to them, I desire to submit certain observations.

In order to present the whole picture at a glance, if that is possible, I want to remind Senators that in the appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, the sum of $927,000,000 and more was provided for the Veterans' Administration. In the appropriation bill passed in the last Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, the sum of $945,000,000 and more was provided for the Veterans' Administration. It will be remembered that that bill was not approved by President Hoover, and it therefore failed of enactment. For that reason the pending bill has become necessary. The pending bill provides appropriations for the independent offices, including the Veterans' Administration.

In the pending bill there is carried for the Veterans' Administration a total figure of $493,988,000. Compared with the bill which was disapproved by President Hoover, this is a reduction of more than $450,000,000, but, deep as this slash is, it reveals little of the character and effect of the cut which has been made in the pensions to the veterans of the Spanish-American War and the World War. This is true because, in the item, there are carried many other related items, such as the appropriations for hospitalization, adjusted compensation, insurance, and possibly other items.

In order to reach a correct understanding of the cuts in pension—and by the word "pension" I mean the payment made in hand to the veteran, and not the related matters to which I have referred—it is necessary to eliminate the collateral items. I have accordingly prepared a table which is limited to pensions only. This table shows all pension appropriations in a lump sum, and discloses the amount provided under each of the three bills, namely, the June 30, 1933, bill; the June 30, 1934, bill, which was passed in the last session but disapproved by President Hoover; and the pending bill. These lump-sum figures show the appropriations for the veterans of the various wars; that is to say, the World War, the Spanish-American War, the Indian wars, the Civil War, and for the peace-time soldiers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps.

The figures carried in the pending bill for pensions is $231,750,000. It is not broken up in classes by wars, but is a consolidated figure.

I have obtained from the Veterans' Bureau and from other sources estimates by which we can make a distribution of this sum into the various items providing pensions to be paid to the different groups of veterans of the different wars. The tabulation has been prepared in this form.

I ask, Mr. President, that it may be incorporated in my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

	Appropriation act for fiscal year 1933	Bill disapproved by President	Pending bill
Disability and death, service- and non-service-connected pensions, lumped together:
World War	$352,482,732	$372,800,000	$103,786,000
Spanish War	119,862,683	124,773,477	41,659,644
Civil War	94,777,154	82,534,100	74,141,390
Indian wars	4,606,610	4,833,216	4,070,966
Regular pensions	6,734,108	7,789,974	8,072,000
Total for bills	578,463,287	592,730,000	231,730,000

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, these figures disclose that the bill disapproved by President Hoover would have provided in excess of $124,000,000 for the veterans of the Spanish War.

The pending bill provides for the same purpose forty-one million six hundred-odd thousand dollars. The cut in this group therefore is more than $83,000,000, and on a percentage basis the reduction will be approximately 67 percent.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. STEIWER. I am glad to yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, does the Senator believe that the Senate understood that the Spanish War veterans were to be so cruelly cut as they have been?

Mr. STEIWER. I cannot reflect the feelings or beliefs of individual Senators, but I am sure that there was a general feeling in the Senate that, by reason of the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] and agreed to by the Senate, the Spanish-American War veterans would not be cut as deeply as they have been cut. I think that is absolutely true.

Mr. COPELAND. That is exactly the feeling I had when I voted for that amendment.

Mr. STEIWER. I think that was a very general feeling.

Mr. COPELAND. I never dreamed for a moment that the Spanish War veterans would be cut as they have been. I saw a man yesterday who was a major in the Spanish-American War, a physical wreck, who will be on charity unless some relief is given. He was cut from $50 to $8.

Mr. STEIWER. There are such cases.

Mr. COPELAND. It seems impossible that such a thing was ever intended. I certainly did not have any thought in my mind that a thing like that would happen when this matter was before the Senate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, who made these cuts—the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. DILL. The Senator has referred to the amendment relating to the veterans of the Spanish-American War on the roll because of having passed the age of 62 years. I want to say to the Senator that it did not seem necessary to me when we adopted that amendment to put in a limitation on the cut that would be made by the regulations. If I had been putting in a limitation, I would have been willing to have made that limitation even 33⅓ percent; but if I had dreamed or had had any possible idea that they were going to take away 80 percent, I would certainly never have allowed the amendment to have been adopted in the form in which it was agreed to. To me it is the most indefensible regulation that has been made in connection with this whole matter. It would only cost a few hundred thousand dollars to give these men at least $20 a month, and that would be a 33⅓ percent cut. Instead of that, however, they have undertaken to obey the letter of the law, and leave them on the roll and give them only $6, when they were getting $30.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me simply to make an observation?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Senators voted with their eyes wide open on this whole question. It was brought to their attention by Members of this body; it was currently reported that the slash would be over $400,000,000. It would be impossible to slash that much without making just such cuts as those against which Senators now protest. The whole thing was wrong. Placing it in the hands of the President of the United States, abdicating the authority of the Congress, and giving one man the right to do this vast injustice, this cruel, brutal injustice to hundreds of thousands of the defenders of the country was an outrage, and it will never be righted until the entire law is repealed. That is the way to right it, if Senators want to right it, namely, to move to repeal it; and the quicker we repeal it and the quicker a decent, just, fair, honest, humane structure is set up the quicker the injustice will be remedied, and it cannot be remedied in any other way.

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator from Illinois wanted me to yield to him, and I will do that first, if the Senator from Pennsylvania will permit me.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator. I rise to recall that while the amendment alluded to by the Senator from Oregon was the composite work of a few of us trying to bring some order out of a chaotic situation, the able Senator from the State of Washington [Mr. DILL] is entitled to the credit for the object of the relief. I desire to say as to myself—and I can speak personally—that to the Senator from Washington, to others, and to myself there was the specific statement made by those who were to construe this act and to enforce it, that no such construction as now the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Washington clearly indicate has been made, would ever be applied. I desire to say further that it is a shocking surprise to me to hear upon the floor Senators, whose word cannot be debated, much less doubted, say that the construction thus applied has worked such injury as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] indicates and that the Senator from Washington is compelled sadly to have to confess. We trust for some immediate remedy.

Mr. STEIWER. Now I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am asking a question out of a sincere desire for information. My experience in the enforcement of the new regulations has been that an utterly impossible degree of proof is being required of the veterans in order to show service connection. While I do not like to take the Senator's time by giving an illustration, it will make my point clearer. In Erie there is a veteran dying of cancer of the left breast. He has been compensated since he was discharged from the Army as if the cancer were caused by his service. His medical record shows that he was seated in an ambulance in the Argonne when a German airplane dropped a bomb on the road close to the ambulance—it killed 30 men, incidentally—and two fragments of metal went through this particular veteran, one through his side and one through his shoulder, as I recall. He was thrown against something and knocked unconscious. He is not very sure what it was, but he thinks it was the wheel of the ambulance. The medical records show that for weeks afterward he was treated for a very severe contusion of the left breast, at the exact place where the cancer developed a couple of years later.

No human being can prove that the bruise, the wound, caused the cancer, and yet the Veterans' Bureau says to that man, bedfast, dying, with a dependent wife and two or three children, "Not one penny do you get now until you prove to us that that wound caused the cancer from which you are now suffering." It seems to me that there lies the brutality of this new scheme for veterans' compensation, which calls for an impossible degree of proof in establishing service connection.

We were told when we voted for the bill—some of us who voted for it were told, at any rate—that veterans with service-connected disabilities were going to be treated most generously. If I had not been told that, I would not have voted for the bill, but I never dreamed that before a veteran could get such so-called "generous treatment" he would have to prove what God alone knows, and that is the connection between these admitted injuries and the admitted ailment of the veteran. Is the Senator going to touch upon that in his argument?

Mr. STEIWER. I hope to do so.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

Mr. STEIWER. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. No one knows the cause of cancer. There are two general classifications of the disease, carcinoma and sarcoma. I do not know the kind of cancer from which the soldier referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania suffers.

Mr. REED. I do not know whether it is sarcoma or carcinoma, but it is one or the other.

Mr. HATFIELD. Sarcoma is one form and could well be the result of an injury, and in the absence of any other proof, certainly the soldier is entitled to the benefit of the doubt by the Veterans' Administration, which controls his compensation.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator, and that is what I have been trying to argue with the Bureau, but I have not got very far up to date.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I am in accord with the Senator's position in respect to the entire propriety of giving the veteran the benefit of the doubt in all these marginal cases, but I prefer to refer to the subject later.

I think, if Senators will indulge me with this expression regarding myself, that I am incapable of attempting to obtain any satisfaction from the predicament in which any one of them might find himself with respect to this measure, and I assure them that I am critical of them. My whole object in this discussion is to make some sort of an exposition of the situation as it respects veterans' pensions, and particularly the pensions of veterans of the World War and the Spanish War. Nevertheless, I think it is in order to say that those of you who supported this bill might well have been more particular about the safeguards which we attempted to set up.

Referring to the Spanish War veterans, it is quite obvious, I think, that the splendid purpose of the senior Senator from Washington was not achieved to the extent that he wanted it achieved, and I know how sincere he is, as is the Senator from Pennsylvania and as are others, in expressing their dissatisfaction over the situation. However, the fact is that when General Hines was before the Finance Committee he testified as to the cut that would be made in the Spanish-American War veterans' pensions, and his estimate was that the Economy Act would result in a cut in these pensions of approximately $95,000,000. As a matter of fact, under the appropriation provided in this bill, as I have already pointed out, the cut is only $83,000,000. So after all, the Spanish-American War veterans have not been treated quite as desperately as the Veterans' Bureau warned us they might be treated.

I, too, join with those who criticize the regulations provided under the economy bill on the score that the age pensions were not graduated. The age pensions under existing law, to which I hope to refer presently, provided pensions starting at 62, increasing at 68, again at 72, and then at 75, on this basis providing pensions that range from $20 up to $50. The amendment procured here through the efforts of the Senator from Illinois, the Senator from Washington, and other Senators provided merely that the veteran should not be removed from the rolls; in other words, that nothing in the act should prevent them from receiving pensions if they were otherwise eligible and had attained the age of 62 years. With that protection thrown around them, the regulations give to these veterans pensions of $6 per month, which is the very minimum that could have been allowed under the law; and not only that, but there is no heed taken of advancing years, and no graduation in pension and no increase for the advancing years of the veteran. It seems to me, therefore, that those who were at that time acting in the behalf of the Spanish-American War veterans have a very real grievance in that those old men were not treated more generously in the making of the regulations and in the administration under the regulations.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I only want to contribute justice where it is due. While it is true that the eminent Senator from Washington contributed a splendid effort as described by the Senator from Oregon, and myself and one or two others in a smaller degree, yet the Senator from Oregon himself, who is now speaking, did a great deal to help bring about the success of what he believed and what all of us believed at that time was an amendment to cure these ills. While he does not refer to his own contribution and his efforts in that respect, he is entitled to the same credit as comes to those who participated in the framing and adoption of the amendment.

Mr. STEIWER. I am indebted to the Senator for his kindness.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. COPELAND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield first, if I may, to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I simply desire to ask if the Senator is going to content himself with a discussion of the situation or is he to offer an amendment to the bill?

Mr. STEIWER. That question presents to me a situation with which it is very hard to deal. I would offer an amendment increasing the amount carried in the bill if I thought that the regulations and the instructions issued by the Veterans' Bureau would be liberalized sufficiently to make an additional appropriation necessary or in any way in order. As I shall presently endeavor to show, under the present situation, with the regulations as they are and the instructions as they are, there is no use to appropriate any more money than the $231,000,000 carried in the bill. I understand there has been a bill introduced, possibly two bills, the purpose of which was to liberalize the law in one or two respects. I am not yet prepared to offer any general proposal for the entire modification or liberalization of the act. Indeed, it seems to me, if the proper kind of regulations shall be made, that under this law, even as it is now written, 90 percent, if not 95 percent, of all the hardships of which Members of Congress are complaining may be eliminated.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. STEIWER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BYRNES. In view of the last statement of the Senator from Oregon, may I say to the Senator that within the last few days, by direction of the President, the Veterans' Bureau has been at work upon the regulations seeking to modify them; that within the next few days, in my opinion, there will be an announcement of an increase in the rates of compensation to be paid, certainly to those who have service-connected disability; that while I am not advised of the extent of the changes, yet I know the changes are going to increase the amount of compensation certainly for those ex-service men.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, does the Senator get his information from the new Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Douglas?

Mr. BYRNES. Even the Senator from Michigan should know that Mr. Douglas is not Secretary of the Treasury. I do not know some things, but I do know that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will yield——

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The President himself is giving consideration to the subject. I cannot, as the Senator from South Carolina has stated, announce the details of the changes that may be anticipated, but the subject is being studied by the President himself as well as by others.

Mr. BYRNES. Let me say to the Senator from Oregon that the change is going to result in an increase in compensation.

Mr. STEIWER. That is very reassuring, but the situation becomes a bit involved when we are confronted with the necessity today and tomorrow of considering an appropriation bill and do not know what the law is going to be. The regulations which are under discussion and which are authorized by the Economy Act, so far as the veterans are concerned, have the force and effect of law, and so far as we are concerned they have the force and effect of law because they determine what pensions shall be paid and what pensions withheld. They determine moreover the amount required to be appropriated by the Congress.

It leaves the Congress in a rather unhappy situation. I would certainly urge upon the Senate an increased amount of appropriation except that I do not know what the nature of the liberalization may be, I do not know what the increases may be, and I assume that in any event by a deficiency bill in the next session the Congress can provide such money as may be necessary in order to carry the present regulations into effect.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I am delighted to hear that the regulations are to be changed, but if they are to be changed it will be necessary to have some more money. Why does not the Senator move to increase the amount of money so there will be no embarrassment on the part of those who make the regulations in having the funds to carry them into effect?

Mr. STEIWER. Let me consider that suggestion a little later in the discussion. The suggestion is supported by one argument which is somewhat technical and to which I had not intended to make reference but will in view of this proposal. Section 1 of the Economy Act contains this language:

> That, subject to such requirements and limitations as shall be contained in regulations to be issued by the President, and within the limits of appropriations made by Congress, the following classes of persons may be paid a pension.

I shall not attempt now to enter upon a legalistic discussion of that language, but I suggest that it may be that the appropriation itself operates as a limitation upon the amount which may be authorized by the regulations. Apparently this matter has an interlocking relationship, the appropriation being related to the regulation, and the regulation being related to the appropriation. The language is a little unfortunate and it may well be that the proper procedure is for us to procure an increase in the appropriation, not only so that the Veterans' Bureau may be released of any possible legalistic embarrassment, but also in order that we may assure that money enough will be available to carry out the purposes of the Congress under the regulations.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Replying to the Senator's statement about an increase, with his consent I should like to send to the desk and have read a very short amendment which covers one phase of the veterans' appropriation, and which does authorize an increase. I should like to send it to the desk and have it read because the Senator may want to refer to it later.

Mr. STEIWER. I am very glad to have the Senator do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Alabama proposes the following amendment: Amend by substituting for the figures "$1,000,000", on page 49, line 7, the figures "$2,000,000", and by striking out the period in line 8 and substituting a colon, and by adding thereafter the following:

> Provided, That one half of $2,000,000 so appropriated shall be used for supplying hospital treatment for veterans without regard to whether their disability was service connected or not.

Mr. BLACK. I have offered that amendment because, according to information given by the Veterans' Bureau, there are now 15,000 empty beds in the hospitals owned by the Government. We know there are more than 15,000 sick soldiers in the country being treated at some kind of private charitable hospital. I have offered an amendment to provide this additional appropriation so the Government may utilize the facilities which it now has to treat the veterans.

Mr. STEIWER. That amendment will be entirely in order; but, of course, it does not go to the main question raised by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], which would involve some amendment or increase in amount on page 48 of the bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator a moment ago was referring to the Spanish-American War veterans. I am advised that a man who served in the Spanish-American War and remained in the Army after that war was over and who subsequent to that war incurred a service-connected disability cannot now receive hospital care though he may need it. A veteran of that war can receive hospital care. For instance, I asked for a number of cases of those who would be left out and who would find themselves in that situation. I shall refer to just one by way of illustration.

Private Blank, with a record of 10 engagements in the Philippines, lost a leg fighting against Moros in 1905. As I understand the law today, because his service-connected disability was not incurred in the actual war, he is not entitled to receive hospital care. I may be wrong, but those who have presented me with this information say that is the case. If it is the case, the law should be amended to allow a man who finds himself in that situation to have the same privilege that a veteran would have whose disability was connected with the service and in actual war.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. May I say to the Senator from Maryland that I have introduced a bill to give to the peace-time veteran, who has direct service-connected disability, hospital facilities just as the others are entitled to have them? Let me also say to the Senator that I know of a case where a veteran was actually wounded in battle, but 5 days after the official termination of the war, and hospital treatment has been denied.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield further?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am glad to know the Senator from Georgia has offered such a proposal, which would extend mere justice to those veterans with service-connected disability, received in actual combat in some cases, though not in a declared war. It seems to me the likelihood of a bill of that character going through at this session of Congress is somewhat rather remote, and at the proper time I shall offer an amendment to the pending bill which would give to that class of veterans, of whom there are very few, the right to domiciliary and hospital care.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am moved to ask the Senator from Maryland whether there is any doubt about the construction he has just given or that the officials of the Government have given to the case he quotes? A man who lost a leg in a battle with the Moros is refused hospital treatment. Was he under the command of the United States officers engaged in that conflict?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is my understanding.

Mr. NORRIS. And he is denied hospital treatment?

Mr. TYDINGS. He gets a pension, but the law refers only to veterans who were injured within certain periods of time, according to my recollection. This was in 1905 after the so-called "emergency", the Philippine insurrection having been settled. The law is not broad enough to give that man coverage.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield further?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Hospital treatment of domiciliary care is given only to veteran soldiers who suffered a disability during a war period, and the period of the several wars, including the Boxer rebellion and Philippine insurrection, is defined.

Mr. NORRIS. Can anybody by any construction hold that the case cited by the Senator from Maryland does not come within that provision?

Mr. GEORGE. It does not because the period of war is fixed.

Mr. NORRIS. The man was certainly injured in line of his duty.

Mr. GEORGE. The same situation would prevail as to one of the regularly enlisted men today in Nicaragua who might be actually wounded or in line of duty would receive what is actually a battle wound. That is not a war period covered by the economy bill and as limited by that bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield further?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. An illustration in line with the one just suggested is one within my knowledge which occurred in Nicaragua. A man lost his leg in Nicaragua and had his pension reduced from $90 a month to $22 a month, but under the law he would not be entitled to hospital and domiciliary care. That is my understanding of the law. However, that is not written into the law verbatim, but I understand is a result of the regulations of the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will allow me to proceed for just a moment, my amendment would contain only 3 or 4 lines; but I should like to read it, and then I will yield, with the Senator's permission. It would say that this service is to be furnished—to men discharged from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard for disabilities incurred in line of duty, and to veterans of any war—

And so forth, as the old act reads.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me—of course, the Senator from Oregon has the floor——

Mr. STEIWER. I should like to continue my remarks, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not like the first part of the Senator's amendment. It says "discharged soldiers." The difficulty that we are confronted with, it seems to me, is to enact a law in such a way that no one, by any possible imagination, can reach the conclusion that a soldier who was in the war was not in the war, and that a soldier who was wounded or lost a leg in line of battle is not entitled to any consideration.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield there, I think the word "discharged" is properly in the amendment, for the reason that as long as the man is actually in the service he gets the hospital care as a matter of natural operation of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps; but when he is discharged from the service for a disability incurred in the service, that is where all of the trouble comes.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me cite a case that it seems to me might arise and put the soldier out. Suppose the Senator were a soldier, and he were discharged today, and tomorrow, on his way home, he were injured, perhaps by the very enemy he had been fighting. He would not be entitled to hospitalization if we had an official who was trying to find a possible way out and avoid giving him the right to hospitalization.

Mr. TYDINGS. I see the Senator's point; but I may say to the Senator that, while his amendment certainly would broaden the scope of the provision, I understand that practically all these cases of apparent injustice arise in the cases of men who incurred their disability in line of duty, and who have since been discharged, but because the disability was incurred at a time not fixed in our declaration of war the men have been eliminated from benefits which I am sure Congress and the President and the American people want them to have.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I had not intended to cover special cases of the sort to which the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] has just referred, but hoped to address myself to more general considerations. My attention, however, has been called to cases of this sort, and I am of the opinion that he is right in his understanding that the soldier injured by a Moro under the circumstances stated is not entitled to hospitalization under the Economy Act. I base that opinion upon section 6 of the Economy Act, which reads:

> In addition to the pensions provided in this title, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized, under such limitations as may be prescribed by the President and within the limits of existing Veterans' Administration facilities, to furnish to veterans of any war, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, domiciliary care where they are suffering with permanent disabilities, tuberculosis, or neuropsychiatric ailments, and medical and hospital treatment for diseases or injuries.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The amendment I have just read is an amendment to the very section the Senator has just quoted.

Mr. STEIWER. That is the appropriate place.

A little while ago, in response to some questions propounded by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I made the observation that I though 90, if not 95, percent of all the complaints presently being made against this act could be remedied by Executive action through modification of the regulations and through change in instructions with respect to proof, and I think that is a correct statement. The particular question raised by the Senator from Maryland may not, however, be treated in that way, but must be reached by amendment to the act.

Now, if I may, I desire to proceed with these general considerations.

I had just stated that as between an earlier bill and the pending bill the cut in the appropriation for the veterans of the Spanish-American War, on a percentage basis, amounted to 67 percent. For the veterans of the World War the bill disapproved by President Hoover would have provided a total of $372,800,000, and the pending bill for the same purpose provides $103,876,000; these figures all being estimates made within the total carried in the bill the total of $231,000,000.

The cut in pensions to the World War group is therefore nearly $270,000,000, and on a percentage basis represents a reduction of approximately 72 percent. As provided in the Economy Act, the cuts for Civil War and Indian war veterans are limited to 10 percent, and the cuts for the peacetime pensions are limited, as I remember, to 15 percent.

In order to understand the application of the Economy Act and of the regulations and of the instructions, these regulations and instructions being the child of the act itself, it is necessary to outline the procedure by which the cuts are made.

It is a correct statement to say that the cuts have been effected by literally hundreds of different devices, but most of them are of little importance. There are four that have been resorted to chiefly; and these four by their accumulated force result in the greater part of the total amount taken away from the veterans of these two wars.

These four propositions are the following:

(1) Regulation 1, which cuts the basis of service-connected compensation from $100 to $80 per month. I will interrupt myself there to say that I believe there is no solid objection and no very general complaint as to this proposition.

(2) Regulation 1, read in conjunction with regulation 3, divides disabilities into 5 classes in such a way that the veteran is not compensated strictly in proportion to his disability but is rated arbitrarily into 1 of the 5 classes in a manner to which I will refer a little later.

(3) Regulation 3 authorizes the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to adopt and apply a new schedule of ratings, and provides that the new schedule shall be based on average impairment in earnings.

(4) Regulation 1 modifies the presumption of soundness at time of enlistment, and destroys in large measure the presumption that certain special diseases were acquired or aggravated in military service if manifest prior to January 1, 1925.

These four main provisions for effecting cuts account probably for more than 90 percent of all the cuts made.

Now permit me to refer more specifically to the situation of the Spanish-American War veterans.

Under the act of May 1, 1926, disabled veterans of the War with Spain and the related wars who had served 90 days or more, and who had received honorable discharges from the Army, were provided pensions that ranged from $20 up to $50 per month. If such a veteran had attained the age of 62 years or more he was entitled to an age pension that was not based on disability. The age pensions I have already described. For the various ages they varied from $20 to $50 per month. These benefits, and all of them, were repealed by the Economy Act except for the saving amendment to which we referred earlier.

In lieu of these provisions for veterans of the Spanish War and for their widows and dependents, these veterans become eligible for pension if permanently disabled, in which case they get $20 per month, or if the veteran can trace his disability to a cause "incurred in line of duty in such service." In addition to that, the President must direct the payment of the age pension which we have been discussing.

The regulations issued by the President on March 31, as I have said, limit the age pension to $6 per month, without making any provision for increase to veterans of more advanced age.

It is everywhere known that the veterans of the Spanish-American War cannot service-connect their disabilities, except in a very limited number of cases. Incidentally, that is well known in the Veterans' Bureau; it is well known to the President; and even though my discussion today is a little critical of the regulations and the procedure had under this act, I am most happy to say that there is one rather bright spot in the regulations, and that is regulation no. 12, in which the President by express terms acknowledges the difficulty of this group of veterans in their attempt to service-connect their disability, and in their behalf creates a presumption of service connection, which presumption, incidentally, the Veterans' Bureau so far have very effectually destroyed in their instructions and in their administration under the act.

The veterans of the Spanish War cannot connect their disabilities with their service because of lapse of time, because they fought in the Tropics, far off from hospitals, because records were incomplete or erroneously made, or because they were not made at all, or in some cases, even though made, because they have been subsequently lost or destroyed.

Ultimately, under regulation 12, to which I have just referred, and with some few exceptions, it is my opinion that the Spanish War veterans will receive a pension; but because the presumption will be overturned and rebutted they will receive a pension only if they are permanently disabled or if they have attained the age of 62 years; and beyond that, in the great majority of cases, they will receive nothing at all, unless the action of the President or of the Congress by its compelling force requires the Veterans' Bureau to make proper disposition of their cases.

The average age of these pensioners, as we know, is between 59 and 60 years, and their financial condition I need not comment upon.

In the tabulation I presented a little while ago it was shown that the pending bill provides for the Spanish-American pensioners a total appropriation in excess of $41,000,000 as compared with an appropriation of nearly $125,000,000 carried in the bill disapproved at the end of the last session. In my humble opinion, the entire sum of $41,000,000 that is provided in the pending bill cannot be used for payment of pensions to this group of veterans; and this statement in one sense answers a question propounded earlier in this discussion. The bill provides $41,000,000; but unless a very definite liberalization is made in the rules and the instructions, there is not the beginning of a possibility that the Veterans' Bureau will find themselves spending $41,000,000, or any sum in excess of one half or two thirds of that sum.

It is noteworthy that the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, testifying before the Finance Committee, estimated the savings under the Economy Act with respect to Spanish War pensions at $97,000,000. The decrease in the appropriations is approximately $83,000,000; and, as already stated, this decrease shows a reduction of 67 percent.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question at that point?

Mr. STEIWER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator's prior statement mean that he prophesies, deeply as the Spanish War veterans have been cut in this bill, that in actual administration there will be a further reduction below the appropriation?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; I think there is no question about it. It is my considered judgment that unless the President enforces a change in the regulations or in the instructions the cuts are greater than are exhibited in the appropriations in the bill. That is true also of World War veterans, and it is true particularly of the overhead item for hospitalization. I did not intend to discuss that matter today, but this bill provides, as I recall, $85,000,000 for hospitalization and overhead.

I do not think there is one person in the Veterans' Administration who would testify under oath that they expect to spend all that money under their present set-up.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, as I have followed the Senator's calculation, the naked appropriation is reduced from $121,000,000 to about $40,000,000, and only about $20,000,000 of the $40,000,000 is going to be expended under the regulations as now administered.

Mr. STEIWER. The first part of the Senator's question is absolutely correct, subject to correction for exact figures. I venture, as my own opinion, that a little over half of the $40,000,000 would be paid by the Veterans' Administration to the veterans of the Spanish War unless the President takes action to liberalize the regulations and instructions.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Therefore the Senator leaves us with no conclusion except that the situation must be reached by an affirmative amendment of the basic law and that it could not be reached by even an increase in appropriation. Is that correct?

Mr. STEIWER. It could not be reached by an increase in appropriation; but I have said that much of the evil inherent in this situation can be corrected by Executive action and by change in the regulations and by change in the instructions heretofore issued by the Veterans' Administration. I believe that it does not require much change in the basic act.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But in the first instance is not this appropriation bill made up on estimates from the Bureau of the Budget, which presumably reflects the rules and regulations which are to be administered?

Mr. STEIWER. Oh, I assume so; but there was no effort made to review the allowed cases for some days, possibly 2 or 3 weeks, subsequent to March 20, and since that time the review has been going forward at a very rapid pace. At the time the estimates were made, or at the time the matter was under negotiation with the Veterans' Administration and the Bureau of the Budget, I do not imagine that they could have had a very close estimate of the situation. When I obtained certain figures last week, I was advised by a statistical employee of the Veterans' Administration that at that time only 16 percent of all these cases had been reviewed or rerated. The Bureau itself is considerably in the dark as to the result of their own efforts, because there is a claim there, to which I hope to refer later, that they started in with that class of cases which would show the greatest cut.

It is my opinion that they started with that class of cases which logically ought to show the least cut, and I think the Senator will agree with me that under the instructions already promulgated, the Veterans' Administration started with the service-connected cases, with those service-connected in fact, and then they took up the cases that were service connected by presumption, and they went into a class of cases where the percentage of cut ought to have been much less than it was with respect to some other classes of cases which are to be reviewed later.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, is the Senator going to maintain that this same relationship exists with respect to World War veterans, and that only half of the appropriation is going to be used under the rules and regulations as to them?

Mr. STEIWER. No; I am not. My inquiry into that subject leads me to the belief that the Administration could not expend the entire amount which this bill carries for World War veterans, namely, $103,000,000 and a little over, but that the amount expended will be considerably over half that sum. I cannot estimate just exactly what it will be.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator is right, that the expenditures may be even lower than is estimated now.

Mr. STEIWER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator is right, but I am of the opinion that no amendment to the basic law is essential. There is bound to be a cut, because now we are under the stress of economy, and the order has gone out to cut wherever possible, and that is exactly what every department will do. It will all depend upon the liberalization of the regulations, and the way in which the President, who has the authority, will be able to look at the matter. My opinion is that we ought to increase the appropriation to the amount we think is feasible and leave it to the President, because otherwise we cannot pay out more, under the reading of the law, than the appropriation will permit; and if we increase the appropriation, with the power already in the hands of the President, who can change the matter as to regulations if he desires, because we have given him that power, it will be changed, but if it is left to the administrative officers such as the Veterans' Administration, they are bound to reduce to the minimum; but that is the force under which they are operating.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, so far as World War veterans and Spanish War veterans are concerned, I think the Senator's statement is substantially if not entirely correct. At least, I will observe that in my own analysis of the situation I have reached the conclusion that no legislative action is necessary in order to provide pensions for them. With respect to some of the incidental and collateral questions, of which a good illustration is the one made by the Senator from Maryland earlier in the afternoon, I think that legislation is necessary, and that it ought to be taken up at an early date.

Mr. FESS. I admit that.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I want to make one further comment with respect to the Spanish-American veterans' pensions. Before the Finance Committee the Administrator estimated that the so-called "saving" would be something like $95,000,000. Such a saving would not result in the figure of 67 percent in reduction which I used a little while ago, but it would be nearer 80 percent reduction; and that, I think, provides some support for my conclusion, that the $41,000,000 in all likelihood will not be expended, and that a very great portion of it will never be used, unless, as we have said, the President shall liberalize his regulations, or the Veterans' Administration shall liberalize its administration under the act.

A better understanding yet of the effect of this act and of the regulations and instructions upon the veterans of the Spanish-American War is gained by a consideration of the condition of the dependents of those veterans. I refer to the widows, the dependent fathers and mothers, and, of course, the orphan children.

Under existing law, if a veteran served 90 days or more and was honorably discharged, his widow, provided, I think, she had married prior to September 1, 1922, was eligible for a pension during her widowhood, and the base pension rate was $30 per month. In addition, she was entitled to $6 per month for every child under 16 years of age. In a like way, minor children and dependents were entitled to pensions paid direct to them in case no widow survived the veteran.

Under part 3 of the President's regulations no. 1, a widow eligible for pension will receive $15 per month in lieu of $30 per month. For one child she will receive in addition the sum of $5 per month, in lieu of the present rate of $6 per month. For children in addition to one she will receive the further sum of $3 per month, which, of course, is in lieu of the old figure of $6 per month.

The regulation, in order to guard against what I might ironically refer to as "unbounded generosity", placed an outside limit upon the amount to be paid to one family, and that limit is fixed at $27 per month, regardless of the size of the family or the number of persons participating in the pension.

A little while ago the Senator from Maryland referred to the fact that many of our soldiers who had fought in the Tropics and in the Orient had remained there after their period of service had expired. That statement is true and, to my mind, affords an appealing and compelling reason why Congress should give sympathetic consideration to the rights of this particular class of veterans. I have been furnished with General Orders 38, dated July 1, 1899, and issued by command of Major General Otis. I am going to ask the Senate's indulgence while I read some part of this order:

MANILA, P. I., July 1, 1899.

Emergencies have rendered it impossible to transport to the United States the volunteer organizations of the army of the Philippines as soon as meditated and desired, thereby preventing their members from joining their homes and reengaging in their civil pursuits for a considerable period of time after they acquired the acknowledged right to demand their release and return. Notwithstanding this unexpected detention, these soldiers have uncomplainingly given to their Government uninterrupted military service, attended with deprivations and dangers to life and health, which those of their countrymen unacquainted with conditions can neither realize nor approximately appreciate.

* * * * * * *

Withstanding the heat of the Tropics, its scorching sun and drenching rains, overcoming every obstacle which prolific nature and a wily, active, and courageous foe could devise, their onward march has been a series of astonishing successes. They have responded with alacrity to every demand made upon them, however desperate the consequences might appear, and have never failed to more than accomplish expected results.

To all soldiers of the department the department commander desires to acknowledge his great obligations. The country owes them a debt of gratitude which it cannot repay. To the volunteers and troops of the Regular Establishment who pledged their services during the War with Spain only, and who have continued to render them under sacrifices innumerable, without complaint, and cheerfully, intelligently appreciating as they did the public necessities, even greater praise and regard are due. Some have recently departed. All others will follow within a short period of time and as rapidly as facilities can be secured. The department commander desires for them a speedy and safe return to their homes and that merited rest and public gratitude to which their exceptional services entitle them.

Mr. President, in recognition of the sacrifice and valor of these men, the Congress in 1906, passed a special act authorizing that a medal be stricken in their honor. Now they have attained an average age of nearly 60 years, most of them are poor, many of them are ill, many of them are unemployed, and at this time of emergency in their lives the Government, which General Otis said owed them a debt of gratitude which it could never repay, is attempting to discharge that debt by cutting their widows' pensions from $30 per month down to $15 per month, by cutting the orphans' pensions in half, provided there is more than one child, by taking away some of the support of indigent parents, and in the very great majority of cases unceremoniously removing the veteran from the pension roll entirely.

We are moved to ask whether there is anything in the situation that justifies that kind of cruelty? Was there any warning given to these people that the benefits under which they had organized their lives were to be withdrawn in so substantial a sense and with so little warning? I say to you, Mr. President, that not only was there nothing to justify them in the belief that they would be abandoned in their old age, but, on the contrary, assurances had been held out to them that the Government of the United States would not abandon them.

There was placed in the RECORD some time ago a letter written by the present Director of the Bureau of the Budget; I shall not read it, but I want to refer to it because it is known everywhere that of those who have been most responsible for the severity of the cut the Director of the Budget Bureau is one. Undoubtedly the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is another; and these two gentlemen, so it is said, helped in drawing the regulations which they procured the President to sign. In the last campaign the Director of the Budget, in a letter which he wrote to Hon. R. C. Stanford, used this language:

It is not now, never has been, and never will be my intention to require of the Spanish-American War veteran proof of service-connected disability. I realize that, after the lapse of all these years since the Spanish-American War, it would be impractical if not utterly impossible for the vast majority of these veterans to prove such service connection, although it actually exists.

I have not now, nor did I ever have, any idea of disturbing any legislation concerning the Spanish-American War veterans, except those economically independent.

That is not the only assurance nor is it the most important one.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. CUTTING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield first to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I inquire what authority has the Senator for stating that the Director of the Veterans' Bureau participated in and approved these regulations that led to the reductions complained of?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, it is known that the chief counsel or solicitor of the Veterans' Bureau took some part in the preparation of the regulations.

Mr. WALSH. I am aware of that fact, but I have been led to believe that the Director of the Veterans' Bureau had little to do with the decisions that led to these particular reductions. I think he was consulted, and I think perhaps his bureau drew up the regulations. I have, however, had reason to believe that he was not in sympathy with all these regulations. Of course, he had to accept and follow the suggestions of his superiors.

Mr. STEIWER. I have no doubt the Senator is right in that, and probably he is better advised as to that than am I; but there is this to be remembered, if we attempt to exculpate the Director of the Veterans' Bureau from responsibility for this situation, namely, that the instructions put out for the guidance of the field officers were issued over the name of the Director. One of the great troubles, one of the causes of the severest cuts, is the rating table which originated in the Veterans' Bureau. So far as I know, the Director of the Budget had nothing to do with that; so far as I know, the President may not even have had knowledge of it except as it was brought to his attention subsequently. That, I think, was the work of the Veterans' Bureau itself, and for that the Director is responsible.

Mr. WALSH. I agree with the Senator, and undoubtedly the Director was instructed by his superiors, to rerate these cases for the purpose of reducing the expenses of the Veterans' Administration. I do not want to make any special defense of the Director, but I have reason to entertain the belief, though not from direct expression by him, that these drastic reductions did not meet with his entire approval.

Mr. STEIWER. I cheerfully accord to the Senator a knowledge which is possibly superior to mine with respect to that.

Mr. WALSH. Let me add while I am on my feet if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. STEIWER. I wonder if the Senator will permit me to ask him a question. I do not want to ask an unfair one.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. STEIWER. But, if the Senator is willing to state it, will he advise the Senate of the person whom he does hold responsible for the severity of the cuts?

Mr. WALSH. I have been of the opinion that the official who initiated and recommended these regulations was the Director of the Budget Bureau. I do not think he himself would dispute that. It was his leadership that has brought about most of the economies promulgated under the present administration.

Let me add now, while I am on my feet, that I concur in what the Senator from Oregon has said to the effect that practically all the alleged injustices in connection with these cuts or reductions could be corrected by Executive order.

Mr. STEIWER. I thank the Senator for that statement. I am sure that is correct. When interrupted, I started to refer, Mr. President, to further assurance that was made to the veterans of the War with Spain at their thirty-fourth national encampment held in August 1932. The Director of the Bureau, I believe, was not present, but he was represented there by the Assistant Director, Maj. O. W. Clark. Major Clark addressed the session of the Spanish veterans. I have in my possession the proceedings of that encampment, and quote from the address which he delivered upon that occasion:

> You all know General Hines served with honor and distinction during the World War, but I believe he treasures in his memory more than that service the service he rendered as your comrade in '98. General Hines asked me particularly to tell you that, in his opinion, you had nothing to fear from the so-called "economy wave." I know that the General himself would be the last person in the world to advocate withdrawing from the Spanish War veterans any benefit or privilege to which they are now entitled by law.

Mr. President we are all, I think, disposed to concede that the President of the United States has no desire to inflict injustice upon these old men. The Director of the Budget some little time ago was asserting that he had no such desire; the Assistant Director of the Veterans' Administration a little while ago on behalf of the administration was insisting that he had no such desire. We hear upon all sides in Congress the assertion that Members of Congress have no such desire. I wonder why it is therefore that through the united influence of all of us we cannot procure such modification of these regulations and of these instructions as may be necessary in order to do justice to this great group of veterans?

Now let me in the same way refer to the veterans of the World War.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds to another branch of the subject I should like to make a brief statement. The Senator has made a careful study of this matter as affecting the Spanish War veterans. A little while ago I recited the case of a major who is approaching death because of the condition of his heart, and who was reduced from $50 a month to $8 a month. Is that reduction the result of the regulations or of the law?

Mr. STEIWER. Regulation No. 3 directs the Veterans' Administration to make a rating table. The Veterans' Administration, pursuant to that direction, made a rating table. I have no knowledge of course concerning the particular case to which the Senator refers, but I have little doubt that the main trouble comes from the application of the rating table to his case. I shall discuss this table as I proceed in my remarks——

Mr. COPELAND. Then, we do not need a change in the law, but if there should be an appropriate and proper change in the regulations these injustices would not happen?

Mr. STEIWER. So far as that kind of a case is concerned, I think the Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. VANDENBERG. We do not even need a change in the appropriation, as I understand the Senator, in order to correct about half of the injustices.

Mr. STEIWER. That is true unless there is a technical limitation placed upon the right of pension by reason of the first section of the law. I have never formed any opinion upon it and do not express any at this time.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. STEIWER. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WALCOTT. I have had fully a score of cases typical of those that have just been recited—extreme cases where the reduction has been as high as from $60 to $6 a month. I have taken up these cases with the Pension Bureau directly, in person rather than by writing, and I get absolutely no satisfaction from them. They promise me nothing, and so far, after 2 or 3 weeks, they have done nothing. I have been rather hopeless about it. I am wondering what possibility there is, unless we can get the regulation changed, of securing relief for these veterans. I have had brought to my attention some of the most extreme cases, both of Spanish-American and the World War veterans who live in Connecticut. The burden of proof rests on them, although I am convinced from their own statements that their disabilities are service connected. It seems utterly hopeless at the present time to secure any redress.

Mr. STEIWER. I wish I could give some assurance to the Senator, but I cannot do so except to refer to what has been said by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES]. Those Senators have been assured that appropriate action will be taken. I am going to propose at a later time that in this matter we do not rest content with a mere change in the regulations, because, regardless of the action of the President with respect to the regulation, if the Bureau of the Budget is permitted to dominate the situation and to say to the Veterans' Administration that we must have a saving of $400,000,000 or $450,000,000 or $500,000,000, or of any other sum of that kind, the procedure under the regulations will be such that the injustices will continue.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. STEIWER. I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUTTING. Was it not the opinion of the Senator that under the amendment proposed, I think, by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] no direct service-connected cases would be taken completely off the rolls? I know that was my understanding, and I think it was the understanding of a great many Members of this body.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. Not only was the amendment of the character indicated by the Senator from New Mexico, but when the amendment was under discussion—and to that I intend to refer if opportunity presents itself this evening—statements were distinctly and directly made that, speaking with authority, the Senate could know that there was no intention of interfering in any way with those who were receiving benefits because of injuries directly attributable to their military service.

Mr. CUTTING. In other words, if the Senator from Oregon, will pardon me further, it seems to make very little difference what legislation we pass on the floor of the Senate as compared with the regulations which are adopted by the people over whom we have no control whatsoever.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. STEIWER. I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. BYRNES. Did the Senator say that by the regulations veterans with service-connected disabilities, directly connected with the service and not presumptively connected, have been entirely removed from the rolls?

Mr. STEIWER. No; not entirely removed.

Mr. BYRNES. Under the act I know that could not have been done, and I think the Senator from California is right in saying that the statement was made that it could not be done.

Mr. STEIWER. That statement was made.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will pardon me further, not only was the statement made that they should not be removed from the rolls, but the statement went farther than that and was to the effect substantially that the rates were not to be touched.

Mr. BYRNES. I did not hear that statement made.

Mr. JOHNSON. The record is before me here, and I will refer to it subsequently, without interrupting the Senator from Oregon at this time.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, so long as this question has come up, I think I might say to the Senator that I have a record of a great many cases which have been taken entirely off the rolls, although the examination of the medical officers immediately preceding the discharge showed the disability existing at that time.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from New Mexico is quite right. There have been innumerable cases where the names of such veterans have been taken from the rolls as well as reductions having been made in the amounts received by those who have been permitted to remain upon the rolls.

Mr. STEIWER. I think it is fair to assume that most of the service-connected cases taken entirely from the rolls in the World War group are cases which have been connected with war service by statutory presumption. I think there may have been some few eliminated because the rating officers rated them at less than 10 percent, and, under the old law as well as the new, they would not be eligible for pension.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator indulge me for just a moment?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to call the Senator's attention to one specific case upon which I have a report—I had almost called it an apology if it amounted to anything—from the Veterans' Bureau bearing upon this very point, and I refer, if they ever want to check it up, to the case identified as no. C 144242.

This is all that they admit is the matter with this veteran. They admit, first, that he had a gunshot wound in his back and that it was service connected. They admit a hernia as a result of service. They admit arthritis of the lumbar spine, and they admit it is service connected. They admit chronic nervousness, and admit it is service connected. But under a strange manipulation of the new regulations this veteran is reduced from $90 a month to $8 a month. If there is anybody in the Senate who ever thought a tragedy and crime of that sort was going to be committed under the so-called "Economy Act", I miss my guess.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, the Economy Act invites just exactly that kind of treatment. The regulations invite that kind of treatment. The rating schedule makes that treatment possible by substituting for the exact rating of the veterans—that is to say, a rating in accordance with their disabilities—this proposition of rating them arbitrarily in classes. That is one way they have of getting at it. A further way is by rerating the disabilities under the new rating tables. A gunshot wound, for instance, might heretofore have been rated 15 percent and now rerated 10 percent. In addition to that the Bureau has a new way of making combinations of ratings. They have a factor or coefficient which I think few of us understand, and they apply it in such a way that the veteran does not enjoy the sum total of all his ratings. After they have determined their different ratings, 10 percent for this, 20 percent for that, 25 percent for something else, and 30 percent for something further, they add them together in such a way that they produce less than the total of all the percents; and then if the rating should be 45 percent, because it is less than 50 it falls back to the 25 percent class. Instead of giving that veteran 45 percent of 100 they give him 25 percent of 80. If it falls down, as in the case to which the Senator referred, to the 10-percent classification, they allow him 10 percent of $80, or $8.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has exactly described the logarithms that are reported in this letter. They are all reminiscent of Mordecai Ezekiel. The net result is that through these various allocations to each disability and the lack of a specific bracket into which they can ultimately fall, they finally force the poor man back to the 10 percent allowance, and he now gets shot in the back a second time, but this time by his own Government.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, reference was made a moment ago to a provision agreed to by the Senate and offered here as an amendment by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. It was said that it had been assumed under this amendment the service-connected disabilities would not be disturbed. I am sure that was the assumption of many Senators. In view of the fact that the matter has been mentioned I want to read the language of the amendment. I think I identify the proper place in the act, as follows:

> The provisions of this title shall not apply to compensation or pension (except as to rates, time of entry into active service, and special statutory allowances) being paid to veterans disabled or dependents of veterans who died as the result of disease or injury directly connected with active military or naval service (without benefit of statutory or regulatory presumption of service connection) pursuant to the provisions of the laws in effect on the date of enactment of this act. The term "compensation or pension" as used in this paragraph shall not be construed to include emergency officers' retired pay referred to in section 10 of this title.

Mr. President, this protective language which brings about a certain group of protected awards, has in it several exceptions; that is to say, it provides in general terms that service-connected cases shall not be removed from the roll; but to that protective provision there are exceptions, although not so termed in all cases. The first exception is as to rates; the second is as to the time of entry into active service; the third relates to special statutory allowances. In the making of the regulations it is probably worth while to comment that every weakening exception that was permitted to creep into this language was availed of by the President and by the Veterans' Bureau, and in the making of regulations and instructions every weakness that was permitted is used as a means of further cut with respect to service-connected veterans.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. STEIWER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. WALSH. Of course the exception that has been most generally used in forcing down compensation is the exception as to rate. If there were not that language used in the amendment, if a veteran who was injured improved in health and upon reexamination it was shown that he was not entitled to the amount of compensation he had previously received, or if his disability increased no change in his allowance could be made. It clearly was my intention and the intention of Congress, in using the words "except as to rates" to permit the Government to make increases or reductions in compensation where there had been new conditions leading to the necessary change in ratings of the veterans. However, the language has been used, as the Senator has stated, for the purpose of making general and in some cases alleged sweeping reductions in the rates to service-connected veterans, many of whose disabilities were incurred in actual combat.

Mr. STEIWER. I think the Senator from Massachusetts and I are entirely in accord with respect to that matter and were at the time this legislation was before the Senate. By reason of his active and long and devoted experience in the enactment of proper legislation for veterans of the wars, I know how sincere he is with respect to this whole subject, and it is not necessary for me to make any testimonial in his behalf.

Mr. President, I wonder if I may not now be permitted to proceed without interruption for a little while. I should like to conclude what I am saying.

I had started earlier in my remarks to invite the attention of the Senate to the application of these regulations and instructions to veterans of the World War. Under the act of July 3, 1930, allowance of non-service-connected disabilities are being paid to approximately 400,000 World War veterans. The total amount paid is in excess of $100,000,000. Under the Economy Act all these veterans will go off the rolls except those suffering permanent and total disability, and they will be paid $20 a month. It has been estimated that the number that will be separated from the rolls on this basis will be about 93 percent of the total. I make no point of this particular reduction. Like others who opposed the economy bill at the time it was before the Senate, I realized that savings must be effected, that curtailments must be made, and that the financial condition of the country justified a very severe change in the basis of pensions. I was ready then to support a proper and just bill. I would now favor a proper and just bill.

I do not want to put myself in the position of maintaining that economy should not be effected in our Government under existing conditions. The thing against which I protest, the thing I seek to have remedied in the remarks I am making this afternoon, is the nature and character of regulations, and instructions, and the way that the curtailment is being applied in the individual cases and the groups of cases affected.

The great class of World War veterans—not in numbers, but in amount received—are the so-called "service-connected cases." They total in number about 330,000. They are receiving a total sum in excess of $200,000,000 per year.

As said today, it was assumed at the time the economy bill was under consideration, that this great group of veterans would not be substantially disturbed, and that if any cuts were made in their compensation such cuts would be made upon a moderate and at least an equitable basis. The World War veterans themselves accepted this idea; and, so far as I can learn, they very generally agreed to the proposition that financial conditions warranted a reduction in their compensation. The veterans, I think, would have voiced little or no complaint to a 20-percent cut, or even a 25-percent cut in compensation for service-connected disabilities. As already stated, the first cut applied to these veterans is the reduction in the compensation basis from $100 down to $80 per month; but a further cut is had by the method of classification.

I have already referred to this subject; but I desire now to read regulation 3, so that Senators who have not examined the regulation may see for themselves just what its effect turns out to be.

I read a part of regulation 3, as follows:

> The schedule shall be constructed so as to provide five grades of disability and no more, upon which payments of pension shall be based, namely, 10 percent, including those 10 percent but not 25 percent; 25 percent, including those 25 percent but not 50 percent; 50 percent, including those 50 percent but not 75 percent; 75 percent, including those 75 percent but not total; and total, 100 percent.

Actual cases have already been cited in this debate; but I want to cite one more to illustrate in a very clear way the application of this method of classification.

C–195515 is a case of a veteran wounded in action in both legs, right shoulder, and face. He was rated 48 percent for gunshot wounds. Under the regulation, because his disability does not rate 50 percent, this case is classed in the 25-percent group, and in lieu of a pension of 48 percent of $100, or $48, he will receive 25 percent of $80, or $20. His reduction in pension for gunshot wounds is $28, but on a percentage basis his reduction is 58 percent.

This is not an extreme case. This fairly represents the application of the new schedule of rates, and, I think, is fairly typical of the battle casualties of the World War.

The national service officer of the Disabled American Veterans has made an estimate of the cuts in the service-connected pensions, and he informs me that the number of such cases that will be eliminated entirely from the rolls by reason of the new regulations and the instructions issued thereunder will be approximately 50 percent. Some students of the subject estimate the elimination from the rolls of service-connected cases in excess of 50 percent. This gentleman's estimate is based on the returns made to him from the service officers of his organization who are in contact with the administration of the Economy Act throughout the United States.

It is further believed that those who remain on the rolls—remember I have just stated that of the service-connected cases approximately 50 percent go off the rolls entirely—I am now saying that this gentleman's estimate is that those who remain on the rolls will receive cuts of approximately 50 percent in the compensation which they are to receive.

The national service officer of the American Legion has made a similar analysis. He has given to me this summary of his views:

Of the number of cases reviewed the number of service-connected compensation cases discontinued was 6,258. The number of service-connected cases rerated so as to receive a permanent and total nonservice $20 award was 289. The number of cases to remain service connected was 7,427. These figures substantially support the estimate made by the representative of the Disabled American Veterans to which I have already referred. They show, moreover, that approximately 44 percent of the service-connected cases were removed from the rolls either because of breaking down the service connection or because of a rating of less than 10-percent disability.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat his last statement?

Mr. STEIWER. I am reading the estimate of the service officer of the American Legion with respect to the service-connected cases. I just stated, from the estimates made by him, that the analysis shows that approximately 44 percent of the service-connected cases were removed from the rolls entirely, and they were so removed either because of breaking down the service connection, through disregarding statutory or regulatory presumptions——

Mr. WALSH. That explains the large percentage—removing the presumptive cases.

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; in most cases.

Mr. WALSH. I could not conceive of such a large percentage on the direct service-connection cases.

Mr. STEIWER. Oh, no! I am talking about the whole group of those who have been adjudicated service-connected.

This analysis discloses that the 54 percent that remain on the rolls for war-service connection remain at a substantially reduced rate. The average monthly rate under existing law for this great class of cases is approximately $46 per month, and under the Economy Act it is approximately $21 per month for the same group of cases. This analysis indicates that those veterans who maintain their place on the rolls with service-connected disabilities will suffer cuts which average about 54 percent.

Consideration of the facts so far recited leads inevitably to the following conclusions respecting the World War veterans, namely, that except for small and relatively unimportant special classes, the net result of the Economy Act under present regulations and under present instructions, is the separation from the pension rolls of a very large but undetermined number of service-connected cases; that the percentage of separations ranges somewhere between 40 and 50 percent; and that the number of service-connected cases still remaining on the rolls, except for the unimportant cases referred to, will be reduced in varying amounts from 31 percent to 88 or possibly 89 or 90 percent. It is certain that the average reduction in payments for those whose disabilities have been attributed to the war, and who still remain on the rolls, will be somewhere between 50 and 60 percent.

I desire to reiterate that these figures do not refer to the disability allowances heretofore provided for those whose disabilities were not related to the war, but they are limited to disabilities which the war brought on or aggravated, and which heretofore have been adjudicated in one way or another as service-connected cases. They include the cases of the war-scarred and the battle-maimed, and of those who suffered loss of arms and legs and bodily function.

Now, in my effort to hurry on, I want to proceed to certain further cases which illustrate the effect of regulation 3.

I have already read a portion of regulation 3, which defined the classifications into which the various groups shall fall, and I have discussed it as much as I care to at this time; but regulation 3 has a further effect with relation to the rating schedules themselves, and I will read that part of the regulation at this time:

> The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to adopt and apply a schedule of ratings of reductions in earning capacity from specific injuries or combination of injuries. The ratings shall be based, as far as practicable, upon the average impairments of earning capacity resulting from such injuries in civil occupations.

Under the authority of this regulation the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs has published a schedule of ratings which purport to show reduction in earning capacity for specific injuries. This is the schedule to which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] referred a little while ago. I am not able to exhibit the schedule of ratings to the Senate, for the simple reason that the Administrator has declined to furnish it to me. For the information of the Senate, and without making any particular point of the matter, I quote from a letter written to me by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs:

> Relative to your request for a copy of the schedule for rating veterans' disabilities, you will appreciate this schedule presents a rather complicated arrangement of disability evaluations and was designed for the use of Veterans' Administration officials directly responsible for the adjudication of claims for pension. In preparing and arranging for the printing of the schedule, provision was not made for sufficient copies to permit of a general distribution, as it was not thought that the schedule would be of value except to those thoroughly instructed in its use.

I eliminate some language there and conclude with the final sentence, as follows:

> It is regretted it is not found expedient to comply with your desire in this instance.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I am glad to yield. I do not want to yield very frequently, because I want to hurry on.

Mr. CLARK. I just desire to ask the Senator if I understood correctly that the Veterans' Bureau were taking the attitude that a Senator of the United States was not entitled to information about the schedules that they made out.

Mr. STEIWER. Well, I would not say that. I think the letter ought to speak for itself.

Mr. CLARK. That is what it amounts to, is it not?

Mr. STEIWER. The refusal was not based upon the fact that I was a Senator, of course. It was based upon the fact that they did not have a sufficient number of the schedules printed, that they were highly technical in their nature, that they were intended for Bureau use, and they did not think they would be of value to anybody else.

Mr. CLARK. As I understood the reading of the letter by the Senator, the refusal was based on the fact that the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs apparently thought the Senator did not have sense enough to understand the schedule. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEIWER. Well, I think I ought to admit the full implication of the Senator's observation. The fact remains that they did not send me the table, and I am obliged to make this discussion without it.

I had started to take up special cases which have been brought to my attention and which become important because they illustrate the application of this rating schedule that has been published by the Veterans' Bureau.

Case 1 is the case of a veteran who has a machine-gun bullet lodged in the lower lobe of the right lung. This veteran also has a bad gunshot wound in his chin, with loss of jawbone, several teeth, and much disfigurement of face. He also has a severe bronchial asthmatic condition, caused from bullet lodged in lung, and has frequent hemorrhages of the lungs. His former rating was 82 percent, with a compensation of $82. His new rating is listed at 50 percent, with a compensation of $40. His reduction is, therefore, more than 50 percent.

I am told by the representatives of the veterans' organizations that the way by which the Bureau officials arrive at the new ratings is, first, to evaluate the disabilities at a figure lower than the present rating, and then, having made the evaluations at the lower figure, to place them in combination in such a way that the total sum of the evaluations does not become the final rating, but is subject to an arbitrary of some kind that is over in the back of the rating book. The application of this arbitrary results in cutting down the total disability of the veteran to a point less than the Veterans' Administration actually finds it to be, and, on an arbitrary basis, to rate the man at a lower figure than his actual disability or his actual reduction in earning capacity. Then, having done that, they take the new classification which is also below the man's rating, and then they employ the percentage thus obtained against the $80 base instead of the $100 base.

The next case to which I desire to draw attention is the case of a veteran who is drawing $60 per month on a service-incurred disability which had resulted in amputation of a leg. He had an additional statutory award of $25 per month, as provided by law in cases of that kind, making a total of $85 per month under the old law. Under the new act he is being granted $20 per month, with an additional $20 statutory award, making a total of $40 per month. This veteran receives a reduction in compensation to the extent of 53 percent.

Another case is that of a veteran drawing $66 per month on a service-incurred disability, including a mastoidectomy and otitis media, chronic—which I will not attempt to define—and certain other disabilities. His last examination showed that the drum of one ear was destroyed, with frequent discharges, and dullness and retraction in the other ear. The hearing in the right ear is completely lost and is 75 percent impaired in the left ear. Under the new act this veteran is reduced to $8 per month. This case is, I think, a parallel to the one that was cited by some other Senator a little earlier in the afternoon. His compensation was $66 per month. It becomes $8 per month, so that his reduction is 88 percent.

Case 4 is the case of a veteran who formerly received $125 a month. The old rating was permanent partial 58 percent for amputation of the left thigh, lower third; permanent partial 20 percent for the residual deformity, diagnosed as inversion and unstable right ankle, with chronic synovitis.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, did the Senator say this man had a 20-percent permanent disability award for loss of the lower third of the thigh?

Mr. STEIWER. The 20 percent was for the residual deformity. It seems to have been in addition to the 58 percent for the amputation. He had certain other injuries and was rated permanent and total without application of the combination table. His disability resulted in the payment of $125 per month.

Under the new-rate schedule his first disability was cut to 50 percent, the second to 10 percent, and the third is rated no percent, and the combination leaves him with a rating of 50 percent. Under the new schedule his reduction is 52 percent.

I think it is not necessary to present further cases of that kind. The Veterans' Administration and the veterans' organizations can furnish any number of cases which are illustrative of the severity of the cuts as applied to the various service-connected cases.

It will be noted with respect to these cases that they are not cases predicated on statutory presumption and for this reason have been removed from the pension rolls; they are cases of battle-scarred veterans whose disabilities are actually service connected by proof in the possession of the United States Government, and a reduction in pension does not come from removal but results from the reduction in the scale of pension rates under the administration of the new law.

It is to be pointed out also that there have been no reexaminations. In all these cases the cuts in compensation are shown as a result of mere rerating. There has been no claim in any case that the patient has recovered. In these surgical cases, of course, there can be no recovery. There has been no claim of recovery. The adjudications are made from the examinations of the same files. The determinations are made upon the same facts, and the difference is to be accounted for wholly and entirely by the application of the new law, the new regulations, and the new instructions.

The question naturally arises, as one examines these cases, by what means are so many of these disabled veterans, who heretofore have been adjudicated as service connected in their disabilities, entirely separated from the pension rolls? The answer is that some of them are separated because the doctors and others in the Veterans' Administration who performed the rerating applied the new rating schedule in such a way that the rating is reduced to less than 10 percent, and therefore the veteran is not eligible for pension. I am not absolutely sure but that statement is a correct statement.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, is the Senator under the impression that the physicians in the medical department have very much to do with the rating of veterans?

Mr. STEIWER. I have no way of knowing, but if one reads the instructions, and examines the history of these cases, he would think the medical department had had considerably to do with them at some time. I have been told, in addition—but this is purely conjecture—that in the effort to get these disability and other cases rerated before the law takes effect, very great haste is sought and the Veterans' Administration has called in the aid of practically everybody in the field offices. I was told by one man that they had used stenographers to turn to the cases and see whether or not they were service-connected in fact, or whether they were service-connected by statutory presumption, and that a little pink slip was put on those that were service-connected by presumption, or which for some reason or other would not be continued under the new law, and when the pink slip was found, the examining officers would turn those cases down, and in that summary way dispose of them.

I should not think the doctors of the Veterans' Administration have had anything to do with this procedure save in aiding in making new instructions. If that is so, it becomes purely a mathematical matter, and anybody, by taking the rules and regulations, can throw a veteran off or leave him on the roll.

Mr. HATFIELD. If the Senator will permit an observation, I want to say that I do not believe the medical department has ever had any voice in the fixing of rates, or in arriving at rates. My view is—and I base this on practical experience—that the rates are made by laymen, and that a layman certainly could not possess a sufficient amount of medical knowledge to result in a just rating being adopted, in justice to the soldier.

Mr. STEIWER. I thank the Senator. There is so much to which attention could be directed that it is difficult, in the discussion of this question, for the speaker to put his finger upon all of the things which have become factors in removing these veterans from the rolls. But in the face of all that might be said, I think the most glaring ignominy involved in this new system of Veterans' Administration lies in the denial, in a most substantial way, of the presumption of service connection, to which the Senator from California and others referred earlier in this discussion.

It will be remembered that under the World War Veterans' Act of 1924 there is a provision that certain special diseases developing prior to January 1, 1925, shall be presumed to have been acquired or aggravated in the military service. This presumption is conclusive in cases of active tuberculosis, but rebuttable with respect to the other special diseases named. This presumption was repealed by the Economy Act, which conferred upon the President the power to prescribe the nature and extent of presumptions.

I might comment on the fact that the Economy Act does not by itself and by its terms deny the benefit of presumptions. It merely repeals existing law and confers upon the President the right to determine whether such presumption shall be had in the consideration of any kind of a veteran's adjudication.

Pursuant to this grant of authority the President, in regulation 1, provided that certain chronic diseases shall be considered to have been incurred or aggravated by service if the disease is manifested to a degree of 10 percent or more within 1 year from the date of separation from active service. This presumption not only limits the presumptive period but provides that the veteran must have served 90 days or more in the active military service, and it further provides that affirmative evidence may rebut the presumptions even in the case of active tuberculosis. Moreover, the presumption of soundness upon entering the service is substantially modified. The act of 1924 makes the presumption of soundness at the time of enlistment conclusive except as to defects or diseases made a record at that time.

In the President's regulation 1, the presumption of soundness is rebutted by defects or diseases noted at the time of enlistment or by evidence or by medical judgment that the defect or disease existed even though not noted. In the administration of the economy law the Veterans' Bureau, without hearings and without granting opportunity to offer additional proof, formulates what it calls a "medical judgment" upon which a determination is made that the veteran was unsound at the time of enlistment, and, therefore, that his disabilities did not originate in the military service. The extent to which this so-called "medical judgment" is capriciously exercised remains to be developed, but obviously it is an important factor in denying pensions to disabled ex-soldiers. It is fittingly adapted to the whole scheme of pillage and plunder upon which the regulations under this law have been formulated. I am glad to be able to state that the hardships caused by the exercise of arbitrary "medical judgment" has been modified to a partial extent by an informal supplementary instruction which has been communicated by the central office of the Veterans' Bureau to the field offices by telegram under date of May 19, 1933. I quote this telegram as follows:

> For the purpose of regulation 1, part 1, service connections previously granted for diseases on the basis that they existed prior to enlistment or during service within 1 year following discharge in cases where veterans served 90 days or more during a war enlistment will be continued unless medical judgment supported by a showing of clear and unmistakable error, conclusively determines that the continuance of such connections is clearly erroneous and unwarranted.

By reason of this modification "medical judgment" may not be exercised to deprive the service-connected disabled veteran entirely of his pension, unless such judgment is supported by a showing of clear and unmistakable error. In a program of the character in which the Veterans' Administration is now engaged, it is gratifying to find this isolated symptom of generosity.

In order to determine the application of the new-rating schedule and the new rules of presumption and proof, I recently directed a letter to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs requesting that he furnish me with copies of the bimonthly reports from the Portland, Oreg., regional office of the review of active awards. Under date of May 12 I received from the Administrator a letter in which he politely declines to furnish this information. From this letter I quote as follows:

> Several requests of this character have been received, and temporarily it is our policy not to release these data as they are not necessarily indicative of the effect of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, and the regulations issued pursuant to it. Furthermore, I think it can be safely said that those cases least deserving under the provisions of the law and regulations are being reviewed first, as they present an easier adjudication problem, and so the initial returns of the review do not represent a true picture for the entire case load.
> On account of the foregoing, may I suggest that your request be held in abeyance for the time being, and that at such time as it is felt these returns represent a true picture I shall be glad to turn over to you the results of the case review in Oregon.

This letter incidentally raises the question whether the review had up to this date will be typical of the completed review. In light of the instructions heretofore issued by the Bureau, it is difficult to accept the statement made by the Administrator that the "initial returns of the review do not represent a true picture for the entire case load."

A little while ago, in answer to some inquiry propounded to me by the Senator from Michigan, I stated that upon information in my possession, I thought that the reviews up to this time were probably taken from the best end of the list, and not from the weakest end of the list. I call attention to that now because the statement made in the letter I have just read directly raises this question.

I want the RECORD to show that instruction 1 under regulation 1, definitely sets forth the order of review. It provides that the adjudication officers shall cause the review to be arranged in the prescribed order. At the beginning of the list is found:

A. All cases wherein the disability of the veteran has been directly connected with the active service.

And then—

B. All cases wherein the disability of the veteran has been connected with the active service by statutory presumption.

The disability allowance claims, which are repealed unless permanent and total, and which I have shown will be separated from the rolls to an extent approximating 93 percent, are not even on the list, and the permanent and total allowance claims which make up about 7 percent of the total are at the extreme foot of the list. It would seem that the percentage of separations will increase as the review goes forward, and the quoted letter of the Administrator becomes still more amazing.

The presumptive periods created by the act of 1924 were worked out after years of study. They are supported by medical testimony and by facts of common knowledge. Medical authority discloses that certain diseases, like tuberculosis, have no definite period of incubation; that the patient becomes infected but the disease will remain inactive; and the germ of infection may be carried in the patient for long periods of time. The evidence before various committees of the Senate and House discloses that it is accepted by a great preponderance of authority in the medical world that tuberculosis and certain neuropsychiatric diseases and other afflictions may make themselves manifest many years after the first inception of the disease. Because of this fact, liberal presumptive periods are necessary in order to avoid injustice to veterans in tens of thousands of cases. Let us assume that a veteran served from April 1917 to the spring of 1919, and that 3 years after his separation from the service, namely, in 1922, he develops active tuberculosis. What was the predisposing factor in the development of this disease? The highest medical skill cannot determine the inception of this disease. Was the infection received before enlistment or during enlistment or after enlistment?

I hope it will not be assumed that because I ask these questions I would presume to answer them. I am merely trying to state, not on my own responsibility but on the highest medical authority, that upon all the information brought before the Senate over the years it is not possible to determine the time when this infection was initiated.

Even after the breakdown comes the veteran cannot prove anything at all concerning the inception of his disability. It is known, however, that unusual strain and stress of environment will contribute to the breakdown. Military service may, therefore, very logically produce an active tuberculosis, but this fact is not proof that the disease did in fact originate in the military service. The truth is that the proof of service-connection in cases of this kind is utterly beyond human power. In the case which I have assumed, the disease may very well have been caused by military service, and the stress and hardship incidental thereto, but the fact is completely beyond power of establishment. In the case cited, the presumption granted by the act of 1924 would service connect the disability. I freely admit that such presumption may service-connect disabilities which are in fact not of service origin. In more cases the absence of presumption will prevent service connection of disabilities which are in fact of service origin.

Shall the United States Government, in generous appreciation for service rendered, grant to the veteran the benefit of presumption, which will result in justice to the veterans in every case, or will the United States, in order to protect itself against the payment of benefits to those veterans whose disabilities did not in fact originate in the service, deny the benefit of presumption and thus leave large numbers without compensation or right of pension merely because medical science cannot supply the proof of service origin?

This question is one of justice. In its moral phases it is more important than economy in the administration of government. The determination of this question against the claim of the veteran—that is to say, against the right of presumption—can be reached only upon the theory that we are to give the Government the best of it; that we will exercise the power of conscription and take the American boy from his fireside to the trenches; that we will resort to compulsion to require his military service; and then when he is afflicted and in need we will say to him, "We cannot deal justly with you for fear we may do an injustice to the Government."

In opposing the enactment of the economy bill, I criticized the delegation of power under which the President was to prescribe the extent of proofs and presumptions. I knew then that the President would sign the regulations which have the effect of law so far as veterans are concerned, but that he could not personally make them. I feared that the Veterans' Administration would make these regulations, and I knew, as we all knew, from testimony developed in the different hearings, that the Veterans' Administration was opposed to liberal presumptive periods, and that if the Bureau were given the power it would embark upon a series of repudiations, in an effort to absolve the United States Government from its plain duty to those who have worn the uniform in time of war.

The Economy Act repealed the World War Veterans Act of 1924, and conferred upon the President the power to prescribe the extent of proofs and presumptions. It was said that the action was necessary in dealing with the financial emergency, but this claim was and is spurious, because the regulations which have been written by the Veterans' Administration and by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and signed by the President, are to become the permanent law of the land. Countless thousands of veterans whose disabilities are service-connected are being separated from the rolls, and they will remain separated until Congress again meets its responsibility by writing into the law the humane and just provisions to which the disabled veterans are entitled.

I shall not detain the Senate to discuss the question of hospitalization. It has already been referred to at previous times in this body. The whole story is summarized in the weekly reports showing the number of patients remaining in the different Veterans' Administration facilities. The Bureau has very kindly furnished me with these weekly reports, and from them a table has been prepared showing the decrease in the number of veterans enjoying hospital facilities by weeks from February 28, to May 20, both inclusive. This table discloses that between the two dates named the number of patients with service-connected disabilities has fallen from 15,600, approximately, to 14,400, approximately; the number of patients with nonservice-connected disabilities has fallen from 30,778 to 20,001; the total decrease in patients is approximately 12,000, and the unoccupied beds have increased from 3,611 to 14,756.

I ask that the table may be printed in the RECORD at this place in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Mr. STEIWER. Now I come to some rather general observations, which I think are entitled to serious consideration with respect to this entire subject. They may be of some aid in determining whether we shall increase the appropriation, whether we shall endeavor to amend the law, or whether we shall insist that the regulations be liberalized or that the instructions of the Veterans' Bureau shall themselves be made more liberal.

Everybody knows that the campaign to support the Economy Act was carried on by the National Economy League. At some appropriate time I may discuss the personnel of that league and its connection with New York financial interests, with Wall Street, with the banking house of J. P. Morgan & Co., and with other groups in New York, but I shall not do that at this time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. STEIWER. I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I merely want to suggest that the personnel of the National Economy League is being discussed now by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the United States Senate, and some of the disclosures are startling.

Mr. STEIWER. It is true, Mr. President, that some of those disclosed as having relations in one way or another to J. P. Morgan & Co., were active in carrying forward the efforts of the Economy League, and some of the disclosures are startling.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. May I observe to the Senator further that it is to be noted that, while these same interests were insisting that the Budget be balanced, for the past 3 years they have not paid any income tax to support the Government.

Mr. STEIWER. So far as my own part in this debate is concerned, Mr. President, I am trying to confine myself to an exposition of the whole situation, and I shall not yield to the temptation to characterize anyone or to criticize unreasonably. I have tried not to make any unnecessary criticism of the Veterans' Bureau, and I am trying to speak in entire good nature and with the highest respect for the President and for the Director of the Budget. I am one of those optimistic enough to believe that the assurance that has been given by the President will be carried into effect at least to a partial extent and that some of these abuses are going to be remedied. I seek by my argument to insure that it will be done.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I do not like to interrupt the Senator so often, but let me suggest to the Senator that some of these abuses are irreparable. Hundreds of men have already committed suicide and others have died as a result of the cruelty of the so-called "Economy Act" or of the regulations, and untold thousands have suffered deprivation and even starvation. It is too late, Mr. President, to cure those matters.

Mr. STEIWER. I am fully sensible of the facts thus stated by the Senator, and I think that is the one controlling reason, if not the best reason, why nothing would be gained by harsh characterization of the acts which have been done up to this time. What we need now is not complaint, it is not punishment, but correction of the evils that exist, and, in order to bring about that correction, I am trying, with the highest respect for all concerned, and in the most friendly way, to criticize the administration of the act and to invite the President to correct these regulations, and to insist that this body shall take such a stand as will result in early and effective action.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should be disappointed if the Senator, after this full exposition of all the evils of the present situation, should fail to present an amendment or propose other legislation which will make sure of the correction. I can well understand that by regulation there can be an improvement, but if legislation should be enacted it should be enacted now. We do not want any more of the deaths and suicides and broken hearts suggested by the Senator from Indiana. If we could create a situation by which we can prevent the evils, that certainly would be our duty, as I see it.

Mr. STEIWER. I will, of course, cooperate with the Senator. I should be glad to favor any move to clear up any weakness in the law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon permit me to ask the Senator from New York a question?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Would the Senator from New York be willing to repeal the entire act and set up again the structure which we had in operation for 12 years?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I do not hesitate to say I would go very far in that direction because as this law has been applied I am convinced that great cruelty has been practiced. I want to find, just as soon as I can, a way out of this dilemma. It is distressing indeed. May I once more refer to the man whom I mentioned yesterday, an old man who came into my office and I was afraid he would die before he got out of the office, who was cut down from $50 to $8. There is something wrong either with the law or the application of it. I want it corrected, and I want it done as soon as possible.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. STEIWER. With pleasure.

Mr. WALSH. The plea the Senator is making for modification is not confined to him alone, although he is doing it ably, nor to Members on that side of the Chamber. On this side of the Chamber Democratic Senators are as anxious and insistent that modifications shall be made of many of these regulations as is the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. That assurance is most happily received and I am glad to feel that I am speaking for other Senators as well as for myself.

Mr. President, I had referred to the part the National Economy League had in bringing about this legislation. The false propaganda put out by that organization undoubtedly created much sentiment in this country against veterans and against the pensions or payments that heretofore had been made to veterans.

The efforts of that organization undoubtedly influenced the planks written in the platform at Chicago. Neither platform supported the non-service-disability allowances. Both, however, declared for just and generous treatment in dealing with disabilities service connected in character. I quote from the Democratic platform:

> We advocate the full measure of justice and generosity for all war veterans who have suffered disability or disease caused by or resulting from actual service in time of war and for their dependents.

The Economy Act did not guarantee to those suffering service-connected disabilities the protection declared for in the language quoted. Nor did it necessarily take away that protection. It did, however, by delegation of authority permit the President, by regulation, to make the cuts which have been outlined in my remarks. The President availed himself of his power to order the cuts, and permitted the Veterans' Administration to issue instructions and rating schedules which enforce the cuts, and brought the United States to the humiliating position of repudiating its obligations to those injured in line of duty in military service during the war. Had the Economy Act and the regulations thereunder been formulated in obedience to the declaration of the Democratic platform, this shameless repudiation would not have occurred. I cannot believe that the Democratic majority in Congress intended to repudiate that plank in the Democratic platform, but the President asked that the power to write pension laws, to make rates, and to prescribe the extent of proof and presumptions should be delegated to him, and he promised to exercise the power in a spirit which all could approve. In his message of March 10 he said:

> If the Congress chooses to vest me with this responsibility, it will be exercised in a spirit of justice to all, of sympathy to those who are in need, and of maintaining inviolate the basic welfare of the United States.

It is evident that the President realizes that Congress was misled and that possibly he himself had been imposed upon by those who prepared the regulations and instructions. I quote from a newspaper clipping of May 11, 1933, from a statement issued by Stephen T. Early, Secretary to the President. The quotation is as follows:

> As a result of conferences between the President, the national commander of the American Legion, Louis Johnson, and the Director of the Budget the following conclusions have been reached:
> As a result of the application of the veterans' regulations it now seems that the cut in compensation of service-connected World War veterans with specific injuries has been deeper than originally intended. The regulations and schedules in this respect will, therefore, be reviewed so as to effect more equitable levels of payment. Careful study also will be made of the other regulations and their effects.

I want to remind Senators that this statement was made upon May 11. Now we are told by the Senator from South Carolina that the President himself is engaged in making a review of the regulations. In a newspaper article this morning I noted an Associated Press story, in which it is stated that—

> Meanwhile President Roosevelt went over the problem of veterans' economies in a lengthy meeting yesterday with members of the House Democratic caucus, at which modifications of the drastic economy regulations were requested.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I think the Senator inadvertently misquoted what I stated. I did not intend to state that the President is engaged in a personal review of the regulations. I stated that my information was that he had directed the Veterans' Administrator to proceed with a review of the cases.

Mr. STEIWER. I think, possibly, the statement I just made and attributed to the Senator from South Carolina was one made by the Democratic leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who also gave some assurance to the Senate that the President is interested and his purpose is to rectify the wrongs done to the veterans.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I cannot agree with my good friend from Oregon, if I understood him aright, that the President may be permitted to escape responsibility for these drastic cuts and injustices. My information—and I mentioned this on the floor and it has never been denied, and I understand it is true—is to the effect that the President's lord high executioner, Mr. Douglas, makes the cut. Then he goes back to the President—and this has happened more than once, unless I am misinformed. The cut might be $387,000,000, for instance. The President has said to his Budget Director, "That is not enough." He has said that he must have a cut of $400,000,000, that we must save $400,000,000 on the veterans, or $450,000,000, or whatever the figure may be. Mr. Douglas comes back and slices some more, regardless of injustice.

Therefore I say there is just one authority responsible for this injustice in the final analysis, and that is the Chief Executive of the United States, to whom this Congress in a cowardly moment abdicated its authority. If it had been left with the Congress, justice would have been done the veterans. The only way justice can now be done is for the Congress to reclaim its authority, which in the most cowardly fashion it surrendered to the Chief Executive.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will yield, I only want to say that every Member of the Senate would know that the Senator from Indiana was not present at the conferences between the President and the Director of the Budget, the details and words of which he relates; but that would not stop the Senator from Indiana from making the statement. When he says it has never been denied, of course no one would ever take the trouble to deny a statement of this nature made by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, was the Senator from South Carolina present at these conferences with the Director of the Budget?

Mr. BYRNES. No; and because he was not, he would not attempt to quote what was said. The Senator from Indiana would never be restrained from quoting what was said when he was not present, however.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then the Senator from South Carolina does not know any more about it than I do.

Mr. BYRNES. And that is my objection—that not knowing anything about it, the Senator proceeds to quote the President of the United States as making statements and does it shamelessly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I had it from what seems to be very good authority, and it has never been denied.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I hope I shall not be asked to yield any further. I shall conclude in just a few moments. It will be patent to all that I am not a party to this discussion between the two Senators with respect to the responsibility of the President.

It will be clear also, I think, to those who have done me the honor to listen this afternoon, that I have not attempted in a harsh or severe way to criticize the President, nor have I even sought to fix the responsibility for the evil that has crept into the administration of this law, nor for the severe injustice and cruelty which have been practiced upon the disabled veterans. I will say that wholly independent of any assumed conversations that may have occurred between the President and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, without knowing just what part the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs has had in the whole matter, there are some things about it that are written into the history of our country. We know that the Congress itself passed the Economy Act and is responsible to the extent that it delegated to the President the power to perform duties which in part were legislative in character and to exercise power which in my judgment the Congress should have retained.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. STEIWER. I hope I will not be asked to yield further.

Mr. ASHURST. Just a moment.

If we are subjected to odium and public criticism over the Economy Act, let us not be so cowardly as to blame the President. Let us not be so cowardly as to blame the Budget Director. We did it ourselves. Why be mice instead of men?

If the Economy Act is cruel, we did it. How shameful to see Senators, if they do so, hide behind their desks and hide behind a screen, if they do so, and say, "The Budget Director did it! The President did it!"

One Senator says, "I did not know what I was doing." "If I had known what was going to happen, I would not have done it", says another Senator.

Such alibis will not avail us if condemnation falls upon Senators. Do not blame the President. Do not blame the Budget Director. Let us stand up and take it on the chin. Let us assume responsibility for our own acts. Why not, as men, take whatever blame there is and make effort to repair whatever damage there is?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not the floor. I assume my share of the blame, if any. I hide behind no President. I hide behind no Budget Director. I take the blame for any wrong that was done and shall employ my time in trying to correct the injustice, if any, rather than in finding someone to blame for my own acts.

The excuse of blaming someone else for our wrongs, if any, is so stale that it avails nothing.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEIWER. I do not want to yield further. I hope the Senator will not ask me to yield. I want to conclude, so that I may yield the floor.

Mr. LONG. Just three words: As long as "the light holds out to burn", now that the Senator from Arizona has confessed, why not let the whole gang put themselves of record and clear their consciences? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Indiana, who have been taking some little part with me in the latter phases of this debate, need not offer any defense in their own behalf, because they were 2 among 13, I think, of those who opposed this bill.

Now, I hope Senators will permit me to conclude, so that I may yield the floor.

Whatever may be said of the responsibility of Congress, or the responsibility of the President, or the responsibility of anyone else, the fact remains that Congress passed this law. The fact remains that the President promulgated and signed 12 regulations. The fact remains that these regulations authorized the Veterans' Administration to make the instructions and the rating schedules, and that those instructions have been made, and those schedules have been made, and the Administration has been going forward; and it has resulted in the desperate and shameful situation which we have been complaining about this afternoon. History, therefore, will place the responsibility in the proper place.

Since Mr. Early made his statement, in which he said the President had directed a review of this situation in order to relieve against the harshness and cruelty that is being practiced, almost 3 weeks' time has elapsed—I hope Senators will keep that statement in mind—but the rating schedules have not been changed. No liberalizing regulations have been issued by the President; no liberalizing instructions of consequence by the Veterans' Administration. I am told unofficially that up to 3 days ago the officers of the Veterans' Administration had received from the President no directions to review, modify, or liberalize the instructions of the rating schedules under which these awards are being reviewed. I hope the Senators from Arkansas and South Carolina are right. I hope that at last there is to be an awakening to a realization of the truth, and that directions have now gone forward, and that an administration will now be had under which we will find a softening of this blow which has been struck against the disabled veterans of our wars.

It is recorded in the newspapers that a certain group of veterans who came to Washington to urge the payment of the adjusted-compensation certificates have been given employment in the civilian conservation corps. Many, if not all, of these men were indigent, and I make no objection to any plan which will provide them employment. The fact remains that they are able-bodied veterans, and it seems exceedingly ungracious that the great Republic of the United States would take away benefits from the sick and maimed veterans whose disabilities have been adjudicated in order to provide money to care for veterans who are admittedly able-bodied.

In the Economy Act there is no definite object clearly set forth except to save money in accordance with the program of the National Economy League. The bill is entitled, "To maintain the credit of the United States." In a financial sense alone it will aid in maintaining the credit of the United States in the money centers and with those who buy Government securities; but its administration is such that it tends to destroy the faith in government of those having the highest right and the strongest claim. That faith will not be restored until the President, in the exercise of the great powers delegated to him, or the Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional authority, brings about a restoration of faith by a program of justice to those who are the Nation's defenders in time of national peril. By justice only will our Government maintain the most exalted credit any nation can know, and that is the credit founded upon the confidence of its own citizens.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD some material relative to the recent Economy Act, including a letter I have just received from a World War veteran calling attention to the effect of the act on the veterans of all wars. It seems to me to be a cruel and inhuman act for the Government to place most of the burdens of economy on those who risked their lives to defend it, and the law should be repealed.

How droll it seems for our people to be placing their wreaths of esteem on the graves of the country's dead today while the United States Senate is passing an appropriation bill for the boys yet alive that more than cuts their disability pensions in two. Certainly that is not an act of gratitude commensurate with the feelings we today express for our dead.

Under this law the President has the power to soften and make more humane this unjust, cruel, and harsh so-called "economy" at the expense of helpless, bed-ridden veterans and their dependent widows and orphans, and I join the many Senators who have expressed their views here today stating that they did not realize to what an extreme extent this Economy Act would be interpreted. I hope the opportunity will soon be afforded when by our votes we can erase it.

I was opposed to it when it was presented and believe now the only way it can be remedied is by its repeal.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BONUS EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
May 27, 1933.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am sending you a copy of a speech delivered over the radio by William T. Kroll, who is the disbursing officer for the State soldiers' relief fund, on the 6th day of April 1933, setting forth the situation in the State you represent in the Senate as a result of reductions in payments to veterans because of the recent act of Congress cutting relief for veterans of all wars.

I am sending you this information because you have always supported the veterans in the past and especially so in being among the very few who spoke in favor of the bonus bill that was attempted last year when the so-called "Bonus Expeditionary Forces" were camped in Washington and out of which was born the organization which I now have the honor to be at the head of in Minnesota.

Our plan as an organization is to carry our message to the taxpayers of Minnesota that they may know who is their friend, not only of the veterans but also of the people in general, and in that campaign I hope to take an active part during the coming year. Minnesota people must know what the so-called "economies" in Washington at the veterans' expense have led to. They should know that the cuts in compensation and discharges of World War veterans from the hospitals have thrown a greater burden of taxation on the State of Minnesota and its local communities. The Bonus Expeditionary Force was instrumental, I am proud to say, in almost forcing an act of the last Minnesota Legislature appropriating $750,000 to help the needy veterans who were thrown helpless upon the streets and highways by the recent economy bill passed by Congress.

Through this act in Minneapolis and St. Paul over 120 World War veterans have been taken into the city hospitals because the economy bill does not allow them to be cared for by the Federal Government. I do not believe that the people of Minnesota realize that $8,777,100 has been taken out of circulation by the Economy Act. This bill in no sense of the word is an economy bill, for the act completely destroys $8,777,100 of potential purchasing power. Such an act as this is the very thing that has prolonged tendencies in continuing this so-called "depression."

The chief reason for an Economy Act is to make it better possible for the Government to pay the interest on the tax-exempt bonds of J. P. Morgan and others. The Government was faced with the situation where it had to cut either the interest on bonds, held by the rich, or the payments to the veterans, and it has chosen the latter, put the burden of tax reduction on the man who fought to make the world safe for democracy.

The recent investigations in the Senate have disclosed one of the many loopholes whereby the wealthy dodge their taxes, namely by rigging up losses that they charge up to their incomes in such a way as to leave them without any taxable income and with no taxes to pay. Hence, the peculiar spectacle of seeing America's leading financier, J. P. Morgan, revealing to the country that he paid no taxes, yet reputed to be worth millions. The country must learn to understand this vital point and as an ex-service man interested in the welfare of his country and at the head of an organization of veterans, I shall do all in my feeble power to let the people know this situation and I hope that the State can depend on its Representatives in Washington to stand by them in relieving this situation.

It is my aim and purpose as State commander of the B.E.F. to spend the better part of the next 6 months in carrying on a lecture tour in the State of Minnesota to expose the damnable rot that has been foisted upon the American people. In this tour it shall be our primary aim to organize the World War veterans into strong political units. In this organization work we shall join the hands of the farmer and the laborer, whom we know are already in accord with our movements.

I wish to serve notice upon the State Senate of Minnesota that we absolutely mean business and that this is a fair warning that we shall work together until we have obtained justice and until the American people can be brought to realize the unfounded principles that lie within our Government.

I wish to again take this opportunity to thank and praise you in your clean record for the stand that you have always taken by the farmer, the laborer, and the soldier.

Yours in comradeship.

HERBERT L. MILLINGTON,
State Commander of the B.E.F.

Listeners of the radio world, if there are any grocers, butchers, bakers, doctors, welfare workers, or veterans of any of the five great wars who are not listening, will you please ask them to come and listen in.

I want to thank Department Commander George Brobeck, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Dr. Russell R. Heim, of the radio committee, and station WRHM for this opportunity of these few moments to talk about the recent veterans' economy bill and its effect upon the citizenry and taxpayers of Minnesota.

I should like to state that the great majority of war veterans voted for President Roosevelt and have every confidence in his sincerity, and that even though injustices are done in the haste that is necessary in this national emergency, they will be adjusted just as soon as the facts become known to him.

It might be interesting to know that the Federal Government is paying pension and compensation to approximately 5,000 veterans, widows, and orphans of the Spanish and Civil Wars in Minnesota at a present cost of about $7,000,000 a year, and that 9,822 veterans of the World War are receiving payments averaging $44 each per month, or $5,186,016 per year, for disabilities which have been recognized by the United States Government as being incident to military service. Also that 4,921 World War veterans are receiving approximately $944,632 per year for similar ailments not yet recognized as incident to military service. Figures for widows and orphans of the World War are not yet available.

In Minneapolis alone 3,446 veterans having disabilities incident to the World War now receive payments of compensation amounting annually to $1,816,957.08, and 1,539 veterans not yet recognized as having war disabilities are receiving $338,856 per year.

In St. Paul 1,348 veterans having disabilities incident to war receive $688,013.04; 745 veterans with disabilities not yet recognized receive $148,104.

If there were time on this radio quarter hour, we might be able to give you the exact pay roll in every city in Minnesota, but the time is limited so I am going to give you just a few instances:

In Grand Rapids, Minn., 56 veterans receive $44,369.32 per year; doctors in that city are paid $837; and supplies purchased for veterans in that city amount to $139.25 per year.

In Madison, Minn., 17 disabled veterans are paid a total of $7,371 per annum.

In Little Falls 57 veterans who are disabled receive $20,769.84 per annum.

In Dawson, Minn., nine veterans receive $3,996 per annum.

In St. Cloud, Minn., 144 disabled veterans receive $54,597.20 per year.

In Wadena 22 disabled veterans receive $8,818.60 per year.

Now, in Minneapolis, in addition to the amounts which I previously stated, doctors and local hospitals are paid $11,971.95; merchants, particularly those handling foodstuffs, are paid $101,403.60. None of these figures include the pro rata share that is paid to widows and orphans of all wars and to veterans of the Civil and Spanish Wars and other wars or expeditions of the military forces of the country. Minnesota pays the Federal Government in direct taxes $13,000,000 per year, and receives, in addition to veterans' benefits, $19,000,000 per year.

It is conservatively and quite accurately estimated that only 5 percent of veterans drawing compensation are employed or have any other source of income except their pension or allowance from the Government. More than 50 percent of all of these veterans are too incapacitated because of age or disability to do any work at all, and not much more than 25 percent could do part-time work if such part-time work was available.

Practically all corporations or institutions employing numbers of men will not hire men who are even partially disabled because of the industrial hazard under the State laws.

Under the regulations which have just been issued and which we have studied diligently these last 48 hours, approximately 4,500 veterans or widows of the Spanish War who are now drawing $50 and $60 per month and who are too old to work will be cut off from the Government pay rolls as of July 1, meaning a loss to the merchants of Minnesota of more than $3,500,000. About 500 others of these veterans of the Spanish War who are over 62 years of age will be reduced from the above rates to $6 per month. About 25 percent of this 4,500 generally will be able to get along, but the other 3,300 will have to go on the bread lines with the other unemployed citizens, and some method will have to be found to raise additional funds to feed, shelter, and clothe their families. This at a cost averaging about $30 per month to the relief departments of the city and county.

Four thousand three hundred and thirty-six veterans of the World War, most of them with families, and now receiving an average of $16 per month, will be separated from the Government pay rolls, and the bread lines of the various committees will have to raise a similar amount to furnish the bare necessities for these families.

Five hundred and eighty-five veterans now receiving $40 per month because of being permanently and totally disabled will be reduced to $20 per month, and as the most of these families consist of five persons, an average of $10 per family per month, will have to be raised by charities to take care of them.

Of the 9,822 veterans' families now drawing compensation for disabilities previously determined to be due to service, 5,339 will be removed from the pay rolls because they were connected as presumptive cases.

This number receive an average of $44 per month. It will cost the taxpayers and people of Minnesota an average of $30 per month to take care of these families and only furnishing them with the bare necessaries of life. Five hundred and fifty-four other veterans of this same class, because of permanent and total disability, will be reduced from $100 per month to $20 per month.

The net loss to the merchants, the hospitals, the doctors of Minnesota because of these reductions will amount to $6,000,000 per year, and this does not include any loss that may be caused by the taking of widows and orphans from the rolls of the Government.

The lowest estimate possible as to the cost of taking care of these veterans and their families on the same basis that persons are now being taken care of in the poor-relief lines of the various cities and townships is the raising for relief funds immediately in addition to those now being raised $1,339,936 per year.

This does not take into consideration the fact that the hospitals have been closed to the treatment of disabled veterans except those with service-connected disabilities or those who are so disabled that they must go to a soldiers' home for the balance of their lives.

Only last Monday the Bureau denied treatment to 125 veterans who are totally disabled and who have needed treatment 2 or 3 times a week in an out-patient clinic. In the early part of this evening, 50 of these men reported to the University Clinic, and many of these men have gone to the Ancker Hospital in St. Paul and the General Hospital in Minneapolis. Some of them have gone to private doctors and the doctors appreciating the fact that these veterans did not have money to pay for treatments and medicines are treating them free of charge, in some instances even paying for the prescriptions and medicines needed.

This is commendable upon the part of the medical profession, and I hope that throughout the State they will be as merciful as these doctors in the city have been.

A short time ago the Star had a letter stating that only 5 percent of the veterans in the veterans' hospital had seen active service. I checked this up and found that out of 553 patients 287 had actually seen front-line service and 99 others had served overseas or in the Navy in the submarine zone.

Ordinarily there would have been admitted to the veterans' hospital here between the date of enactment of the economy bill and the present date, 115 moderately serious cases, but due to this act only 54 were admitted as emergency during that time, and during the same period 100 were discharged and 7 died. I am speaking of the period from March 20 to April 5. Most of these veterans are broke and are seeking treatment through private sources and the charity of hospitals and doctors.

According to these new regulations the monetary reduction will not be effective until July 1, and it will be in August and September that this situation is most seriously felt. It is hoped that the governments of the States, cities, towns, counties, and townships will raise funds sufficient to keep these disabled veterans from starving, going without shelter, clothes, and medical care.

It is suggested to those veterans who get notices that awards are to be materially reduced or terminated, that in order that our good President may know of the situation existing each veteran write a letter telling the hisory of his disabilities and the economical condition of himself and his family to the President of the United States, Congressmen HOIDALE, CHRISTENSON, and KNUTSON, who voted with the masses in supporting the administration, so that these good gentlemen may be able to assist in making any needed and justifiable changes in Executive orders and regulations.

To the public generally and to those veterans who have not yet affiliated themselves with veterans' organizations, I wish to say that while previously veterans' organizations had minor differences in programs and opinions, the seriousness of this situation has united them and the membership of each of these organizations is growing rapidly. The membership of the Veterans of Foreign Wars at the present time is growing more rapidly than the membership of the other veterans' organizations.

In organized veterandom there are 2½ millions of veterans of the wars and three fourths of a million of ladies in the auxiliary. This represents an actual cross section of every walk of life of these United States. They are called the organized minority, but they have many times the membership of the Medical Association, Bankers' Association, and the Chamber of Commerce, who represent themselves to be the representatives of the country at large.

The veterans are pledged to economy and they have asked me to state that they hope by reducing interest rates on Government securities, taking away of tax exemptions, reduction of rates of public utilities, and by taking the profit out of war through conscripting of both property and wealth in time of war they, too, may contribute their bit toward the financial stability and return to prosperity of our glorious country.

In closing I want to plead with the doctors, with the hospitals, with the public-welfare boards, to make arrangements in advance for treatment and at least the bare necessaries of life for these veterans of wars who are unable because of disability to earn their livelihood and the livelihood of their families.

I want to plead with the veterans who are employed to join the veterans' organizations to which they are eligible. If you know of a veteran who does not belong and he does not want to join your veterans' organization, sign him up for one of the other veterans' organizations.

I want to further plead with veterans and their dependents to take an active part in the public life of their community, the State, and the Nation. Attend the political rallies; work actively in favor of the candidate for public office who will pledge himself or herself to the interests of the small merchant and the interests of the great middle class who own modest homes and work in the offices, stores, factories, and on farms.

Thank you again, Veterans of Foreign Wars, for this time on your program.

WILLIAM T. KROLL.

[Excerpt from the Washington Star for May 26, 1933]

Under the regulations drafted by President Roosevelt the veteran has only the right to one appeal of his case, and this must be confined to claims involving benefits and not on the basis of the rating given him on the degree of disability.

In order to determine the number of cases of combat disability being reduced the veterans' organizations have conducted a survey by questionnaire sent to the Administration's various regional offices. An analysis of this study completed from reports sent in by 15 regional offices in various sections of the country is as follows:

The number of cases so far reviewed is 14,227; number of war-connected compensation cases discontinued, 6,258; number to receive nonservice war-time $20 permanent total award, 289; number to receive service-connected war-time pension, 7,427.

The monthly allowance previously paid service-connected pensioners, $344,908.35. New amount, according to the analysis, to be paid this group, $160,470.

The study showed that 44 percent of the cases reviewed were removed from the rolls either because of breaking service connection or rated no percent; 2 percent remain on the rolls for the $20 permanent non-service-connected award, and 54 percent will remain on the rolls for war-time service-connected pensions, but at a reduced rate as follows:

Average monthly rate under old system, $46.

Average monthly rate under new system, $21, or a reduction in money payments of 54 percent.

APPEAL TO PRESIDENT

So drastic were cuts affecting the combat-injured veterans that the veterans' organization recently appealed directly to President Roosevelt for a more liberal ruling. The President readily complied by raising the rating percentage by 10 percent and promising a review.

Under the new ruling veterans who were classified as 10 to 15 percent disabled are given a rating of 10 percent. Those rated from 20 to 35 percent are granted 25 percent; those rated from 35 to 60 percent are given 50 percent; and those from 65 to 80 percent are allowed 75 percent.

Under the old ruling veterans who were classified as 10 to 20 percent disabled were rated 10 percent; those from 25 to 45 were rated 25 percent; and those judged 50 to 70 percent were rated 50 percent.

Because of the lack of time, it was explained, the rating or reviewing boards, composed of 2 laymen and 1 physician each, are not calling on the veterans to appear in person. Instead only his record is studied in determining his new disability percentage.

WORK IS MACHINELIKE

The average board's work is machinelike, and its decisions are limited to the rulings handed down by the Veterans' Administration. A sample rating sheet furnished the boards by the administration shows that John Doughboy in combat was hit by a shrapnel, resulting in the following injuries:

Enucleation of right-eye scars, multiple, disfiguring right forehead and foreign body retained in right cheek. His skull was fractured, resulting with a loss of bone the size of a silver dollar but without hernia of brain. He also received a gunshot wound in right shoulder, moderately severe, which later caused arthritis or other complications to set in. In falling down in a shell hole or straining to remove himself from the line of fire he developed a hernia.

The combined rating for this war-torn veteran, according to the rating sheet, is 75 percent.

For a veteran whose leg was amputated on the battlefield, the rating board may, in its discretion, award a total of 10 to 20 percent disability. He formerly received from 40 to 60 percent disability.

The average bullet-scarred veteran in Washington has no grievance against the Veterans' Administration because in their opinion, this Bureau is merely following out orders. However, the rating board's action in cutting the combat disabled is causing many to flock here to join their local comrades in protests. Unable to obtain a hearing prior to July 1, when the new rating becomes effective, they are to be found at the headquarters of the three veterans' organizations.

VETERANS ARE INTERVIEWED

The Star reporter yesterday interviewed more than 50, who said their compensations had been cut. One veteran, whose right leg was amputated in the Muese-Argonne drive, said he had been cut from $80 to $40. Another who developed ankelosis following a leg wound, causing the kneecap to be removed, displayed his rating-board notice that he had been cut from $67 to $20 a month.

A father of five children, whose hip was shot away in the St. Mihiel drive, has been reduced, he said, from $68 to $40. He is now attempting to complete payments on a little house in nearby Virginia, which he purchased several years ago, he declared.

In the Meuse-Argonne a shrapnel cut off the face of a Washington veteran. When he left the operating table surgeons had removed his lower jaw and part of his tongue. They patched him up the best they could, but, he said, since he has been home he has never dined with his wife and two children because of his unwholesome appearance. He is now receiving $100 a month. The new rating, according to his notice, reduced his disability to 80 percent.

Another veteran, who said he enlisted at the age of 39 years, received a severe gunshot wound in the right thigh, with marked loss of muscle, leaving a tumor of the bone. This has resulted in the knee joint to stiffen badly, he said. He also received gunshot wound in the right hand, which has caused a palsied condition. He said he was drawing $58 a month for many years. He will draw $20 a month after July 1, according to his new rating.

SIX COMPANIONS KILLED

On October 15, 1918, another veteran with six comrades were occupying a shell hole in the Argonne. A German shell exploded, killing, according to his records, his six comrades and severely wounding him. He has very extensive and unsightly wounds and scars, with muscle destruction of left arm, shoulder, and back, rendering his left side useless for work. He was drawing $67 for this disability. After July 1, according to his new rating, his pension has been set at $8.

Although the independent offices bill has passed the House, the measure is slated for a stiff fight, especially on veterans' appropriations, when it is called up on the floor of the Senate next week and when it is returned to the House. It was learned on Capitol Hill last night that the veterans' organizations are prepared to fight to raise the sum allotted for World War veterans at least $60,000,000 in order to prevent the combat wounded from suffering. If such sum is obtained, it is held that the average disabled man will receive $44 a month.

WOULD BLOCK CUTS—SPANISH WAR VETERANS TO SEEK INJUNCTION AGAINST ECONOMY ACT

STOCKTON, CALIF., May 26.—A court injunction to prevent President Roosevelt carrying out provisions of the National Economy Act which would reduce and eliminate pensions paid to Spanish-American War veterans was recommended in a resolution passed at the closing session of the thirtieth annual State encampment of the United Spanish War Veterans here late Wednesday.

The resolution declares the Economy Act seeks to assign to the President powers conferred on Congress by the Constitution.

It was recommended injunctions be sought immediately by the organization's national legislative committee. The injunctions are designed to hold off action by President Roosevelt until constitutionality of the act is determined.

[Excerpt from the New York Times for Sunday, May 28, 1933]

William Conley, of Los Angeles, national commander of the Disabled American Veterans, said today in a statement:

"As soon as the regulations were issued on the act of March 20 the Disabled American Veterans publicly stated that the orders were among the most indefensible actions ever taken by the Federal Government.

"At no time have we opposed a survey of the old laws in a search for reasonable economies, but we insisted upon a delicate operation instead of the use of a hacksaw."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have a petition from a number of citizens of California asking that all service-connected disabled veterans be restored to their former benefits, and I ask that the communication be incorporated in the RECORD, without the signatures, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Finance, and the body thereof was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR,
DEPARTMENT OF CALIFORNIA, INC.,
Los Angeles, Calif., May 24, 1933.

Hon. ARTHUR ROBINSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Enclosed find petitions from citizens of the United States and residents of the State of California, signed by 139 voters.

Respectfully yours,

C. BERT ALLEN,
Department Adjutant Treasurer.

A PETITION TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE AND THE UNITED STATES HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE PEOPLE OF CALIFORNIA TO RESTORE TO ALL SERVICE-CONNECTED DISABLED VETERANS THEIR FORMER BENEFITS, PRIVILEGES, SCHEDULES, RATINGS, ETC.

We, the undersigned citizens of the United States of America, residents and voters of the State of California, do hereby affix our signatures and thereby protest certain phases of the so-called "Economy Act regulations", particularly insofar as they pertain to the legitimately service-connected disabled veterans, and we do hereby further petition the United States Senate and the United States House of Representatives to take such action as is necessary to revise the aforesaid regulations, and/or the Economy Act itself, so that there shall be restored to all veterans who were actually disabled in the military or naval service their former benefits, rights, privileges, ratings, schedules, compensation, presumptions, and pensions heretofore enjoyed by them and existent prior to the enactment of said Economy Act.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I also have a resolution signed by George S. Murphy, commander, and Jackson Smith, adjutant, of Los Angeles, Calif., which I ask to be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the regulations applied to the operation of section 10, title I, of the Economy Act (Public, No. 2, 73d Cong.) make it mandatory to show a "causative factor" for the disabilities arising out of the performance of duty during service; and

Whereas this requirement is an innovation in disabled veteran legislation directed only at one class of officers who were disabled as a result of service in the World War; no such restriction is placed on retirement of Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps officers, neither should there be; and

Whereas nothing was mentioned about "causative factor" in the law which passed Congress last March, and the insertion of such a provision in the regulations is a ruthless discrimination against the permanently disabled emergency officers of the World War, in that it almost entirely eliminates medical disabilities from the benefits of this section; and

Whereas, according to the best medical judgment, it is impossible in the great majority of cases to establish the direct cause, with date and place, of the various medical diseases. Direct military duty should be sufficient "causative factor" in medical disabilities heretofore compensated unless ample proof is produced to rebut this: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Southern California Chapter, Disabled Emergency Officers of the World War, in general meeting assembled this 24th day of May 1933, That we request the elimination of this "causative factor" requirement in the consideration of claims under section 10 and regulation 5 of the Economy Act of March 20, 1933; and be it further Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States; the United States Senators from California; Senator ARTHUR R. ROBINSON, of Indiana; the Members of Congress from California; and the Director of the Veterans' Administration respectfully requesting they look into this discriminatory requirement and eliminate it.

[SEAL] GEORGE S. MURPHY, Commander.
JACKSON SMITH, Adjutant.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., May 24, 1933.

Mr. BONE obtained the floor.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Washington whether he expects to address the Senate at any length?

Mr. BONE. For not to exceed 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES. I wanted to say to the Senator that I know there are several Senators who desire to address the Senate on the veterans' provision in the bill, and I would ask whether we may not consider amendments other than the veterans' amendment if the Senator from Washington is to speak on that amendment, and get the others out of the way, so that tomorrow those Senators who desire to speak on that subject may do so, and we may have no other committee amendments to consider?

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I want to speak on the bill, and my remarks will be very brief.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. I want to give notice of a motion to suspend the rules, which I intend to make tomorrow, and in doing so I should like to say just a word in tribute to the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], who has just addressed the Senate.

Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon has clearly and temperately stated the situation as it exists with regard to the veterans' regulations issued under the so-called "Economy Act." I praise the Senator from Oregon, not only for his address but for the fine statement which he has just made, urging that Congress do not adjourn until either the Economy Act be liberalized or the regulations issued thereunder be modified.

I have sent to the desk a motion for suspension of the rules, which I intend to offer, and I ask to have it read at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DICKINSON in the chair). Without objection, the clerk will read the notice of a motion to suspend the rules.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI, for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H.R. 5389), the independent offices appropriation bill, the following amendment, viz, at the proper place to insert the following:

"Section 17 of title I of the act approved March 20, 1933, entitled 'An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government', is amended by adding at the end of the section the following:

"'Nothing in this act shall authorize the President to reduce to a degree greater than 25 percent the compensation, pension, or allowance of any veteran or dependent of a veteran whose disability has hitherto been traced officially to direct connection with military or naval service (otherwise than by benefit of presumption).'"

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, may I say that the amendment will be offered on behalf of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and myself.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I understand the Senator's amendment will apply only to service-connected disabilities?

Mr. CUTTING. To disabilities directly service connected.

Mr. WALSH. And would restrict the President to making deductions within 25 percent?

Mr. CUTTING. Not over 25 percent.

Mr. WALSH. Of the present rating?

Mr. CUTTING. That is correct.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, we find ourselves now considering House bill 5389, making appropriations for the Executive Office and certain bureaus, boards, and commissions of the Government, among which are numbered the Veterans' Administration and the United States Shipping Board. In the consideration of this measure we shall have to face again the problem of ways and means of financing the fiscal program of the Government, including the program of payment of compensation and pensions to veterans, and it becomes a matter of vital importance to us all, and certainly a matter of vital importance to the people of this country, whether or not the economies which the Government now is practicing and proposes to practice, shall be effected solely at the expense of those who so far have been compelled to bear the brunt of these economies, namely, the veterans of this country, and the wage workers employed by the United States Government.

I find riding gaily along in the pending bill an item of $50,000,000 to continue the work under the Jones-White Shipping Act, passed a great many years ago, which, in effect, provides for a continuation of the great subsidies which the Government has been paying and is now paying shipping lines for operating boats bought from this Government for a tiny fraction of their cost to the Government, and apparently no part of the economy program is to be visited upon these shipping lines.

I call the attention of Senators to just one particular item in this program of shipping subsidies. It affects a steamship company operating on the Atlantic coast not far from the city of Washington. This particular company recently bought five magnificent steel steamships from the United States Government, steamers which cost nearly two and a quarter million dollars apiece, and this company, which is now enjoying fat subsidies out of the Treasury of the United States, subsidies which are not to be compelled to share in this economy program, paid for these steamers, which cost this Government nearly two and a quarter million dollars, the sum of $30,000 apiece, or exactly one seventieth of their cost to this Government.

Mr. President, that company, operating under this present subsidy, which is not to be touched in this economy program, will receive in the next 10 years over $11,000,000 out of the United States Treasury at the rate we are now paying that company. This vast sum of $11,000,000 paid to this company will be in mail subsidies, none of which, apparently, are to be affected by the economy program, which has been imposed solely on the veterans.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will look at page 53 of the bill, he will find that the House provision gives the President the power to change these contracts. Unfortunately, the Senate committee, by a vote of 8 to 7, as I remember, struck out that provision. I hope the Senator will help us restore the provision of the House text.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I am going to present tomorrow an amendment to the bill striking $45,000,000 out of the $50,000,000 now being appropriated for the payment of these ship subsidies. I for one am weary of spirit at the picture of this Government's paying such subsidies in its hour of peril, when soldiers who offered their bodies for the Government and have sustained wounds of the character described by the Senator from Oregon are getting $8 a month. I do not want the spectacle continued any longer of this Government's paying Pierpont Morgan or his associates, as the case may be, $117,000 a pound for hauling mail in boats which he bought for one seventieth of their cost.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in 1931 one company was receiving a subsidy of $1,200,000 owned by 1 man except for 2 or 3 nominal stockholders who had directorships. That man received in dividends and salaries and for personal expenses $182,000 out of a subsidy of $1,200,000.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I am wholly familiar with the activities of the dollar-a-year patriots who plundered this Government very effectively during the war in the sacred name of patriotism.

The particular company concerning which I have spoken is now prosecuting in one of the district courts of this country a suit against the Government to re-form a loan contract made by this Government with that company, whereunder it loaned them millions of dollars at 3 percent per annum, and that company is now, under one of these very peculiar provisions of the Jones-White Act, endeavoring to reduce the interest rate to one half of 1 percent per annum. That company is the beneficiary of these bounties and subsidies at the hands of this Government, which we are assured here day by day is going broke. If that suit shall be successful and that company enabled to take out of our Treasury millions of dollars in loans at one half of 1 percent, when this Government is compelled to pay 4¼ percent for the use of money from the bankers who, directly or indirectly, own the steamship company, we are going to present to this country a most peculiar picture, one at least which the veterans and wage workers of this country will never understand. If that suit be successful and this company is permitted to continue these loans at one half of 1 percent, while the Government is paying 8 to 10 times that amount for money, the time has arrived to make a drastic change in the laws that permit these horrible things to exist in this our hour of financial peril.

Mr. President, I said to the Senate that I was going to be very brief, and I am now going to proceed to make good that statement.

Mr. President, the consideration of this bill, like the consideration of all the legislation taken up at this extraordinary session of the Congress, is colored by the knowledge that our country and our institutions have been facing a supreme economic and social crisis. We have been waging a war on many fronts for the preservation of American institutions.

Today the Nation pauses in this most momentous of its struggles for self-preservation to honor those who died that the Republic might live. In hundreds of cemeteries flower-wreathed headstones give evidence that the men who died for the preservation of liberty and for equality of opportunity are not forgotten. But, Mr. President, I have wondered often of late whether this Republic is not forgetting the principles for which these men died, even in the moments when it places laurel wreaths on their tombstones.

Last night I stood on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial. I looked upon the stone face of the stone image which sits enshrined in that temple. I could not repress a shudder as the thought occurred to me that, impressive as the statue is, cold stone could never adequately express the much more enduring spiritual thing that was Lincoln. I wondered then, as I wonder now on the floor of the United States Senate, while I listen to the consideration of this bill, whether the hearts and the minds of the economic rulers of this Republic are not like that statue, having the outward forms of democracy, of individual liberty, of equality of opportunity, but actually being as cold, as heartless, and as much without the living spirit as cold marble.

Mr. President, today would be a mockery, the tenderest feelings, the noblest purposes that animate the human heart would be purposeless and perverted if the only contribution we make to the memory of the men who died for equality of opportunity, is to place perishable flowers on their graves. These men did not die to earn either wordy or floral bouquets. They died that their children might have a better place in which to live; that these children might have the opportunity to earn a living—the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Mr. President, the right to earn a living has been denied to the children of the men who died, and whose memory we honor today. As I read some of the facts brought out by the Committee on Banking and Currency, I wonder if the state of this Republic today does not dishonor, rather than honor, the memory of those who have been, and those who are, ready to die—not for this Republic, but for the principles for which this Republic is said to stand.

Mr. President, whenever men have died for the safety of this Republic other men in America have fattened and battened. I do not say that they did this illegally. I do say that always, when some have been sacrificing and fighting for America, others were taking advantage of the needs of the Nation to grow rich, to stay at home, and to undermine the very principles for which patriots were dying. These people contributed little to the common cause except at a price—their own price.

Today I call upon those who have great wealth, those who have profited out of wars, to make some actual contribution to the safety of the Republic which has treated them so generously. I call upon the big bankers, who have been proven to be the real economic masters of America, to help our country in this dark hour.

Last night, as I looked upon the statue of Lincoln, the thought occurred to me that it would be a fine thing if the Committee on Banking and Currency could tomorrow night take J. P. Morgan and his Wall Street associates to the place where I stood on the steps of that temple, and leave them there, alone, to look upon that statue. If I remember well, J. P. Morgan's father had business dealings with the Federal Government during the Civil War, while Lincoln was in the White House. My own father, like the fathers of many of us, was fighting at Antietam, Gettysburg, and Spottsylvania Court House. At that time the Government borrowed money from J. P. Morgan & Co. The Government is still borrowing money from J. P. Morgan & Co. Last winter the Government owed to the House of Morgan, alone—I do not include in this figure the money our country owes to the individual partners, the associates, and the connections of the House of Morgan—something over $224,000,000.

Mr. President, there lies on the table of the Senate a resolution I have introduced requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to call immediately upon holders of Government bonds, particularly those issued to finance the World War, to exchange their bonds for new bonds of an issue to be known as the new Liberty Loan of 1933, and bearing a lower rate of interest which would effect a saving as nearly as possible sufficient to service such additional loans as may be made necessary by the pending public-works program, and such other emergency needs of the Government as the President may see fit to prescribe.

The purpose of this resolution, Mr. President, is to afford to patriotic Americans who have loaned money to the country the opportunity to share in the sacrifices we must all make if this Republic is to be preserved.

I here and now publicly call upon J. P. Morgan & Co., as the foremost financiers and money lenders in America, to be the first to undertake this new Liberty Loan drive. I publicly call upon them, who have profited most out of the needs of this Republic, to be the first among the economic rulers of this country to recognize the need for a new deal—a new democracy. I call upon them here, now, publicly, voluntarily to turn their bonds into the Treasury of the Republic, with the announcement that they are not indeed, as many have heatedly asserted, mere Shylocks, but are willing to take less interest than the bond stipulates. This interest is the common burden of all of us. The Government can, and does, by taxation, destroy industry, destroy the worker, destroy the farmer, in order to take from them the money with which this interest must be paid.

I make this call upon J. P. Morgan because his name is now in the public prints as one who during the past 2 or 3 years, in the darkest hours of this Republic, contributed little to the common need.

Actually, J. P. Morgan could not be the first to make such a contribution. On this day—Memorial Day—men who gave their arms, legs, eyes, and health are being called upon to make further sacrifices—great sacrifices—under the terms of the economy bill. Some of the savings, resulting from these sacrifices, will be used to pay interest to J. P. Morgan & Co. and to others who have this Government in their debt.

I call upon the money lenders of America on this day not to insist upon the letter of the bond, not to accept as the price of their money bread taken from the mouths, dollars taken from the pockets of those of their fellow citizens who have greater need than they. I call upon them to make it unnecessary for the Senate to pass the resolution that now lies on the table by voluntarily offering to accept less than a full pound of the flesh of their fellows, when the very safety of our institutions would be at stake were too much of such bloodless bloodletting to continue.

I warn the money masters of America—and I use a favored expression of their own—that if they tax the American people beyond their capacity to pay there may result in America the same consequences which they so direly and dourly predict will occur in Europe if America attempts to collect its debts from its European debtors.

Mr. President, I hope that Mr. Morgan will hear and heed this demand I make upon him today in the name of the hungry and the hopeless—in the name of our country.

I hope that it will not be necessary before this extraordinary session closes for me to call my resolution from the table. I hope that before long, under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt, this Congress will be applying itself to the consideration of ways by which lives of our people may be made fuller and happier, rather than to ways by which new sacrifices—new necessary but inhuman economies—may be effected in order that the Republic may be preserved at whatever price in human self-denial and suffering.

Mr. President, I now send to the desk notice in writing of a motion to suspend the rule, particularly rule XVI, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read the "notice of motion to suspend rules", as follows:

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 1 of rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the independent offices appropriation bill, H.R. 5389, the following amendment, viz, on page 48, line 18, strike out "$231,730,000" and insert in lieu thereof the numerals "$276,730,000"; and on page 50, line 13, strike out "$493,988,000" and insert "$538,988,000."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read, in accordance with the rule, a notice of a motion to suspend the rules for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The notice of the Senator from Florida will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H.R. 5389), the independent offices appropriation bill, the following amendment, viz.:

On page 61, between lines 6 and 7, add a new section, as follows:

"That title I of Public No. 2, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

"SEC. 21. That regardless of any provisions embraced in title I, of an act to maintain the credit of the United States Government, being Public No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the compensation of those veterans who on March 20, 1933, were drawing compensation on account of service-connected disability shall not be reduced more than 10 percent. In any review of a veteran's case by the Veterans' Administration with a view to reducing the rating of or change the cause of his disability the burden of proof shall rest upon the Government."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate for a moment on the amendment which is the subject of my notice of motion to suspend the rules.

The proposed amendment which I have just sent to the desk has in contemplation not only the question of restricting and limiting the amount of reduction that may be made in service-connected cases, but it also provides that when the Veterans' Bureau seeks a revision of the rating of a veteran, or the cause of the disability, the burden of proof shall be upon the Government.

According to the correspondence which I have been having with the Veterans' Bureau on account of a great many veterans appealing to me, it occurs to me that the Government, through its Veterans' Bureau, is executing many of these veterans without giving them a trial and without giving them a hearing, although they have previously presented their cases, the cases were considered upon the evidence, and the Government's agency, the Veterans' Bureau, decided that they were service-connected cases and gave them compensation upon the ground that they were service-connected cases. Yet in my correspondence—I have not it here; I had expected to have it here at another time—I have a number of letters from the Veterans' Bureau in which they notify a person that his compensation will be reduced, in one instance—that of a man who was unfortunate enough to be practically totally blind—from $90 to $20 a month; and when I take the case up with them they acknowledge that it is service connected. They not only advise me, however, that they are making a reduction from $90 to $20 a month in a case of that kind, acknowledging that it is a service-connected case, but they also advise him that that will be the rate until June 30, and thereafter what he will receive will depend upon the action of the Veterans' Administration.

In other instances they have also begun to call on veterans for new proof. They are attempting to require service-connection to be reestablished by veterans who have already established service connection, and have been granted compensation upon the proof they have heretofore offered and which was acknowledged as being sufficient to support their claim.

In cases of that character I think we should have legislation that will shift the burden of proof where it properly belongs, in all right and justice, upon the Veterans' Bureau, to establish that these men are not entitled to compensation on account of service connection. That, as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] says, is where they have already received compensation, and it was granted to them upon a service-connected disability. I can see no justice or right in requiring them to go into the question of furnishing further proof and reestablishing their service-connected disability. Therefore, I think we should specifically provide, in a change in the law, that the burden of proof is upon the Government if they desire to attack the matter of service connection; and I have incorporated that in the amendment which I propose.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask that the reading of the bill be resumed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The pending amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 46, line 21, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$15,000", so as to make the further proviso read:

Provided further, That the appropriations herein made for medical and hospital services under the jurisdiction of the Veterans' Administration shall be available, not to exceed $15,000, for experimental purposes to determine the value of certain types of treatment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 21, after the word "purpose", to strike out the comma and the words "and the amount so expended shall be accounted for separately", so as to read:

Pensions: For the payment of pensions, gratuities, and allowances, now authorized under any act of Congress, or regulation of the President based thereon, or which may hereafter be authorized, including emergency officers' retirement pay and annuities, the administration of which is now or may hereafter be placed in the Veterans' Administration, $231,730,000, to be immediately available: Provided, That Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same shall be sufficient for that purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, at the end of line 13, to change the total appropriation for military services under the Veterans' Administration from $485,988,000 to $493,988,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 22, to change the total appropriation for the Veterans' Administration from $506,838,000 to $514,838,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, at the end of line 1, to change the total appropriation under this act from $535,573,936 to $543,740,936.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, after line 2, to strike out:

SEC. 2. That, except as hereinbefore provided, in the expenditure of appropriations in this act the head of every bureau, agency, or independent establishment shall, unless in his discretion the interest of the Government will not permit, purchase or contract for, within the limits of the United States, only articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, notwithstanding that such articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States may cost more, if such excess of cost be not unreasonable.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I inquire why the particular section is stricken out? And before I make the inquiry, may I ask how late the Senator intends to have the session continue?

Mr. BYRNES. Only a short time longer. There are only a few committee amendments left.

The reason for the elimination of this section is that the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill contains the amendment offered by the Senator from California, which is comprehensive in its scope, and includes everything contained in this one. Therefore there is no excuse for continuing this one.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is exactly what I desired to know. The legislation we adopted before, which becomes law, is general in character, and is applicable to this bill.

Mr. BYRNES. And much broader in its language.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 11, after the word "Acts", to insert "or the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1934", and in line 14, after the word "Government", to insert "or the Government of the District of Columbia", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. No part of the appropriations contained in this act or prior appropriation acts or the District of Columbia Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1934 shall be used to pay any increase in the salary of any officer or employee of the United States Government or the government of the District of Columbia by reason of the reallocation of the position of such officer or employee to a higher grade after June 30, 1932, by the Personnel Classification Board or the Civil Service Commission, and salaries paid accordingly shall be payment in full.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 53, to strike out:

SEC. 6. Whenever it shall appear to the President, in respect of any contract entered into by the United States prior to the date of enactment of this act for the transportation of persons and/or things, that the full performance of such contract is not required in the public interest, and that modification or cancelation of such contract will result in substantial savings to the United States, the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, on or before April 30, 1935, to modify or cancel such contract. Whenever the President shall modify or cancel any such contract, he shall determine just compensation therefor; and if the amount thereof, so determined by the President, is unsatisfactory to the individual, firm, or corporation entitled to receive the same, such individual, firm, or corporation shall be entitled to receive such portion thereof as the President shall determine and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said portion so received, will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by paragraph 20 of section 41 and section 250 of title 28 of the United States Code: Provided, That where any such contract makes provision for settlement in the event of modification or cancelation, the amount of just compensation as determined hereunder shall not exceed such amount as is authorized by said contract. Any appropriation out of which payments upon the said contract were authorized to be made is hereby made available for the payment of such just compensation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this is an amendment which I hope will be rejected. I desire to say that the amendment striking out the House provision——

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I know that this amendment relates to a controversial matter, and I suggest that it be passed over.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am perfectly willing to have it passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent this amendment will be passed over for consideration at a later date. The clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 54, line 20, after the letters "U.S.C.", to insert "supp. VI", and in line 23, after the word "is", to insert "voluntarily or", so as to read:

SEC. 6. (a) Whenever at any time hereinafter prior to July 1, 1935, any employee of the United States or the District of Columbia to whom the Civil Service Retirement Act, approved May 29, 1930 (U.S.C., supp. VI, title 5, chap. 14), applies, who has an aggregate period of service of at least 30 years computed as prescribed in section 5 of such act, is voluntarily or involuntarily separated from the service for reasons other than his misconduct, such employee shall be entitled to an annuity computed as provided in section 4 of such act payable from the Civil Service retirement and disability fund less a sum equal to 3½ percent of such annuity.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, after line 16, to strike out:

(b) In making reductions of personnel due regard shall be given to the apportionment of appointments as provided in the Civil Service Act.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

(b) Reductions of personnel shall be made with regard both to efficiency and to apportionment of appointments by States as now provided by law.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to ask if it is in order to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order.

Mr. BLACK. I send to the desk an amendment to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 55, line 22, it is proposed to amend by striking out the period, substituting a comma, and adding the following:

But when new appointments are made hereafter under Civil Service regulations, and there are persons on the eligible list who are residents of States which at the time are below the quota of Civil Service appointments allotted such States by law, preference in selection and appointment shall be given to those eligible persons who are residents of the State containing the least percentage of its Civil Service quota.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to say——

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator has no objection to it?

Mr. BYRNES. No.

Mr. BLACK. Very well.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a number of Senators have left the Chamber to attend matters in their offices, with the understanding that there would be no business transacted excepting committee amendments. I suggest that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama go over until tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be permitted to go over until tomorrow for consideration at that time, and the committee amendment will also go over. The clerk will report the next amendment.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the amendment on page 58, to strike out lines 8 to 15, inclusive.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does the amendment of the Senator from Alabama apply to the whole committee amendment on pages 55 and 56? Why cannot the remainder of the amendment to which the amendment of the Senator from Alabama does not apply be agreed to?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, subdivision (c) is not involved in any way in the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama. It has reference only to a situation existing in the Canal Zone, and it is necessary to make the provision contained in subdivision (c).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, if it be the desire of the Senate, the clerk will report subdivision (c) of the amendment, and the Senate will consider it at this time.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 55, line 23, the committee proposes to insert the following:

(c) Whenever at any time hereafter prior to July 1, 1935, any person to whom the Canal Zone Retirement Act, approved March 2, 1931 (Public, No. 781, 71st Cong.), applies, who has an aggregate period of service of at least 30 years computed as prescribed in section 7 of such act, is voluntarily or involuntarily separated from the service for reasons other than his misconduct, such employee shall be entitled to an annuity computed as provided in section 6 of such act payable from the Canal Zone retirement and disability fund less a sum equal to 5 percent of such annuity: Provided, That when an annuitant hereunder attains the age at which he would have been entitled to retirement with annuity computed as provided in section 6 of such act, such deduction from the annuity shall cease. If and when any such annuitant shall be reemployed in the service of the District of Columbia or the United States (including any corporation the majority of the stock of which is owned by the United States), the right to the annuity provided by this section shall cease and the subsequent annuity rights of such person shall be determined in accordance with the applicable provisions of retirement law existing at the time of the subsequent separation of such person from the service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to subdivision (c) as reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 58, after line 7, to strike out:

SEC. 11. The President is authorized, in his discretion, to suspend the extra pay or reduce the rate of extra pay allowed to commissioned officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard while on flying duty, and to distinguish between degrees of hazard in various types of flying duty and make different rates of extra pay applicable thereto: Provided, That no such rate shall be in excess of $1,440 per annum.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 9. That under the provisions of section 20 of the act approved June 10, 1922, as amended (U.S.C., title 37, sec. 29), no additional compensation shall be allowable or paid to any person in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, or Army Reserve Corps, or National Guard, or the Naval Reserve, or Marine Corps Reserve, or the Coast Guard, in consequence of such statute as amended at a rate per annum in excess of that now paid to any lieutenant colonel in the Army, or to any commander in the Navy, or to any lieutenant colonel in the Marine Corps, or to any commander in the Coast Guard.

Mr. BYRNES. I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. BYRNES. It is an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina offers a perfecting amendment, which the clerk will report.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the amendment of the committee, on page 58, it is proposed to strike out all the matter inserted by said amendment after the word "of", in line 23, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The maximum prescribed for a lieutenant colonel in the Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. By direction of the committee, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 59, line 13, after the words "United States", it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "including the Philippine Islands."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Without objection, the clerk will be authorized to renumber the sections.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I offer an amendment and ask that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. BYRNES. I desire to offer another amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 58, it is proposed to strike out section 8, as follows:

SEC. 8. The President is authorized to place on furlough such officers of the Army, Marine Corps, Public Health Service, Coast Guard, or Coast and Geodetic Survey, as he, in his discretion, shall deem desirable. While on furlough, officers shall receive one half the pay to which they would otherwise have been entitled, but shall not be entitled to any allowance except for travel to their homes.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I will say that this section relates to furloughs of officers which was discussed in the committee, and by agreement I was to ascertain the situation. After investigation I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, are the amendments the Senator is offering the ones which were adopted by the committee?

Mr. BYRNES. All except the last one as to which, as I stated, I was to make an investigation. I think the Senator was one who advised that such an investigation be made, and as the result of that investigation I have offered the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. That completes the committee amendments. I now desire to present notice of a motion to suspend the rule as to certain amendments which I desire to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina enters a motion to suspend the rules, which the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI, for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H.R. 5389), the independent offices appropriation bill, the following amendments, viz.:

At the proper place to insert the following:

On page 59, in line 10, after the word "discharge", strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following:

"Provided, however, That one half of 1 year's sea pay, as heretofore provided by law, shall be paid to each of said surplus of graduates who shall graduate in the class of 1933 who do not receive an appointment."

On page 61, add a new section after line 6:

"SEC. 16. That section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 28, 1928, entitled "An act to amend the salary rates contained in the compensation schedules of the act of March 4, 1923, entitled 'An act to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services'", as amended by the act of July 3, 1930, be further amended by adding thereto the following:

"'Provided, That in all cases where, since December 6, 1924, in such adjustment the position occupied by an employee has been or shall be allocated to a grade with a maximum salary below the salary received by the incumbent, the rate of pay fixed for such position prior to such allocation may be continued so long as the position is held by the incumbent occupying it at the time of such allocation.'"

On page 61, after line 6, to insert the following:

"SEC. 15. (a) There shall be in the Department of Justice an Assistant Solicitor General to assist the Solicitor General in the performance of his duties, who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Said Assistant Solicitor General shall be allocated to the same classification grade and be paid the same rate of compensation as apply to Assistant Attorneys General and shall perform such additional duties as may be required of him by the Attorney General. (b) One of the existing positions of Assistant Attorney General is hereby abolished."

On page 49, after line 19, to insert the following:

"The unexpended balance of the appropriation 'Fourteenth Annual Convention of French Veterans of the World War, Washington, D.C., 1933' is hereby made available for reimbursement to the Veterans' Administration for all expenses (including transportation to bona-fide residence) incurred in connection with indigent veterans in attendance at the convention of the rank and file organization of World War veterans held in Washington, D.C., during the month of May 1933, and the decision of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in connection with such expenditures shall be final and conclusive."

On page 48, after line 24, to insert the following:

"That the Attorney General of the United States is hereby authorized to agree to a judgment to be rendered by the presiding judge of the United States court having jurisdiction of the case, pursuant to compromise approved by the Attorney General upon the recommendation of the United States attorney charged with the defense, upon such terms and for such sums within the amount claimed to be payable, in any suit pending on March 20, 1933, and on the date of the enactment of this act, brought under the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, on a contract of yearly renewable term insurance, and the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to make payments in accordance with any such judgment: Provided, That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of disbursing officers of the Veterans' Administration for all payments of insurance made in accordance with any such judgment: Provided further, That all such judgments shall constitute final settlement of the claim and no appeal therefrom shall be authorized."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an amendment which I have discussed heretofore today, designed to take care of a very limited number of ex-service men who were injured in line of duty; but because they were injured not within a war period they were denied hospital treatment and domiciliary care. Inasmuch as the Senator in charge of the bill has agreed to the amendment, and there are only a few soldiers who would receive these benefits anyhow, I ask that the amendment may be considered and adopted at this time. There is no objection to it anywhere that I know of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there are various amendments which are ready to be offered at the present time. I have an amendment of similar sort to which there is no objection, which I should like to present; and I think the amendment of the Senator from Maryland ought to go over with the other amendments.

Mr. TYDINGS. Then, Mr. President, I serve notice, under the rule, that I desire to bring up the amendment as legislation on an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Maryland that he will have to serve that notice in writing.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to be printed and lie on the table, to be taken up tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request. I suppose we are soon to go into executive session and to adjourn or recess, and it will therefore be a physical impossibility for the Senator from Maryland to prepare his notice and serve it. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the notice as served from the floor by the Senator from Maryland be considered sufficient notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish the Senator would modify his request. I presume there are a great many amendments to be offered to the bill. Why could we not suspend the rule and make all pertinent amendments in order?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I think that is a very wise suggestion. Let us consider the rules suspended as to the amendments which have been presented today, so that we will not have to take up each amendment under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I should have to object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland submits a notice, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI, for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H.R. 5389), the independent offices appropriation bill, the following amendment, viz:

On page 47, line 10, after the word "amended", to insert the following:

"Provided further, That in addition to the pensions provided in this title the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized under such limitations as may be prescribed by the President, and within the limits of existing Veterans' Administration facilities, to furnsh to men discharged from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard for disabilities incurred in line of duty and to veterans of any war, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, domiciliary care where they are suffering with permanent disabilities, tuberculosis, or neuropsychiatric ailments and medical and hospital treatment for diseases or injuries."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I desire to take this opportunity to thank the Senator from Nebraska for his courtesy.

FOREIGN DEBTS—ARTICLE BY HON. WALTER E. EDGE

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD an article by Hon. Walter E. Edge, former American Ambassador to France, appearing in the New York Herald Tribune of Sunday, May 28, 1933, relative to the foreign debts.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[New York Herald Tribune, Sunday, May 28, 1933]

EDGE URGES BROAD POWERS FOR PRESIDENT ON WAR DEBTS—FORMER AMBASSADOR TO FRANCE ADVOCATES WIDER LATITUDE IF SETTLEMENT IS TO BE NEGOTIATED, BUT OPPOSES SIMILAR GRANT FOR LOWERING OF TARIFF

By Walter E. Edge, former American Ambassador to France

A review of the status of international relations and problems at the moment presents a situation somewhat akin to the calm before the storm. Private and semiprivate conversations between rulers and premiers, apparently covering a multitude of questions, have taken place and in an atmosphere of friendliness.

Reports have been made to home governments, public statements have been promulgated, and somewhat confused reactions have followed.

A very limited time remains before very definite action must be taken in at least two of these world problems—that is, the American war-debt payment, due June 15, and limitation of armaments.

Preparation for the world's economic conference in London, opening June 12, is greatly overshadowed by the feeling that the involved war debts and the uncertainty at Geneva present a barrier and impasse which cloud all other international problems. Unless this situation is relieved, it must have a very deterrent effect and influence on the London deliberations.

Of all these confused international situations a final adjustment or disposition of the war debts would seem, under the circumstances, to demand first attention or, at least, run parallel with disarmament efforts. I am assuming that even the most determined American war debt collector realizes that some revisions must be made. In fact, viewing the problem frankly, while there can be no question of the legality and validity of the existing debt contracts, nevertheless, world conditions that have developed since they were negotiated justify some reconsideration even in our own interest. Proceeding on that premise I am convinced that there is only one practical policy to pursue to bring about a definite or lasting settlement. That goal cannot be reached through discussions at a general economic conference. Likewise, it would be very difficult to conclude any adjustment through the ordinary diplomatic channels unless much greater authority and latitude are delegated than has been the policy in the past.

Everyone must realize at the present moment the unsettled status of these obligations entirely apart from who is right or who is wrong and the unfortunate influence this situation exerts. With the debtors squaring off on one side and we on the other, material headway on any of the other multitudinous monetary, commercial, and even disarmament problems is likewise threatened. The longer the real coming to grips is postponed the more difficult will be the solution, with the cash value of the debts decreasing accordingly, and it must never be forgotten that American public opinion demands substantial recompense.

In the meantime all that can be accomplished probably is further tariff truces or economic armistices like that recently initiated by the eight powers in London, which simply postpones the evil day and only provides a partial status quo, generally to the disadvantage of the United States, and that without settling anything.

I am convinced that the first move necessary to a final adjustment of the war debts is to delegate to the President of the United States very broad powers. Congress has given him unprecedented authority in connection with domestic problems. It would seem to be much more in harmony with precedent if he, or someone delegated by him, were given greater latitude in negotiating debt settlements. Under the Constitution the President already has initiatory power in foreign relations. The theory underlying this policy has presumably been that with domestic questions, differences of opinion naturally developing, they should be disposed of through congressional representation and action. On the other hand, in dealing with foreign nations, the country proceeds as a unit represented in the initial stages at least by the President of all the people.

In my judgment, in the matter of the debts, he should have even more power than the initiation the Constitution provides; that is, if we wish to make real settlements. I do not believe, however, that he should be given the right to reduce American tariffs for trading purposes, particularly if such power resulted in removing protection from one American producer at the expense of another; but I am convinced that he should be given broad jurisdiction to modify the principal and interest of the debts, along the lines of bulk settlements or otherwise, in order to be in a position to conclude final agreements.

We can well afford to accept such settlements if sufficient quid pro quos are secured. It must always be borne in mind that an adjustment of the war debts will greatly influence the settlement of many other international problems, while, conversely, a failure to do so will obstruct all final decisions.

If not already clothed with the necessary jurisdiction, and in order to effectively negotiate, he should likewise be empowered to demand the abolition on the part of debtor nations of particularly aggravating trade restrictions like embargoes and existing discriminations in part return for concessions on the debts. This consideration should in no conceivable way justify the removal of proper tariff protection to our producers. These details belong in the same category. To confuse debt adjustment with disarmament presents greater difficulties because of the political situations involved, although it will always be most difficult to dissociate the two problems in the American mind. Our people, very naturally, will continue to condemn excessive armament expenditures if debt reductions are ever to be sanctioned.

However, there is hardly one of the debtor nations that hasn't in recent months either raised tariff duties, proclaimed embargoes on imports through reduced quotas, or concluded commercial treaties with other nations, giving them distinct trade advantages not enjoyed by the United States.

A careful record of these discriminations should be prepared, applying to every debtor, and then authority given to one man to sit at the table with someone representing the debtor nation likewise authorized to reach a final conclusion which, in the light of present-day conditions, would appeal to the world as fair to both sides. I repeat, this cannot be accomplished at the general economic conference. It is, of course, anyone's guess; but I am of the opinion that if a properly delegated arbitrator, with this authority, presented such an inclusive and completed proposal to Congress it would receive public approval. Anyhow, as the matter now stands, we have the prospect of receiving nothing except international repudiation as well as a continuation of insurmountable trade restrictions.

Why beg the issue? Until and unless this situation is adjusted and the irritation removed, we cannot expect real international comity and understanding.

THE ECONOMIC CONFERENCE—SPEECH BY JAMES ROOSEVELT OVER THE NATIONAL RADIO CHAIN

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech delivered by James Roosevelt over the national radio chain on the subject of the Economic Conference.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen, the past week in Washington has been full of events which have occupied the attention not only of the people of the United States but the people of the whole world. We have all come to realize that although we must primarily set our own house in order and tackle first our national problems, nevertheless we must not forget that a large portion of our trade and prosperity comes through happy relations with the rest of the nations.

Not just America but practically every continent has been in a depression. An economic conference of the nations is going to meet this summer to reach definite agreements as to ways and means to get rid of the obstacles to a more happy world trade. Those of you who have been in a large discussion group know how difficult it is to reach an agreement among approximately 70 different personalities, even when they all think the same language and live in the same community. Naturally the problem is far greater when 70 people representing as many nations, many of them unable to talk to each other, try to sit down and reach some sort of harmony. But the best way to get results is to have as many of the nations as possible understand each other's point of view beforehand, and so the President of the United States invited the governments of these countries to confer with him on an interchange of ideas so that the work of the later conference might be settled in a quicker and more understanding manner.

During the past week two of the leaders of the nations whose views will be of vast importance in these economic conferences have come to Washington, and they were joined yesterday by the leader of our neighbor to the north, the Dominion of Canada.

These meetings have been held purposely in a friendly and informal atmosphere. They began last Friday when the Prime Minister of England, Ramsay MacDonald, and his daughter, Ishbel, reached Washington. Perhaps I can give you best the picture of the friendly feeling which immediately began by describing their arrival. At the Union Station they were met by the Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, the military and naval aides, and other officials of the Government, all in their full dress formal attire, as a mark of respect to Mr. MacDonald's official position and to the nation which he represents. Arriving at the White House, however, the procedure was quite unusual. If you were having guests at your home for the week-end you would try to greet them at the front door and make them feel thoroughly at home as soon as possible; and so the President came out on the front porch, accompanied by my mother, sister, and the rather boisterous dogs, and there greeted the Prime Minister and Miss Ishbel MacDonald into the family circle just as it would be done in any other American home.

All the arrangements for the official visits are, of course, made through the State Department by Mr. Warren Robbins, whose official title "chef de protocol" simply means "general manager of diplomatic procedure." Incidentally, this means that Mr. Robbins is quite the busiest man in Washington, endeavoring to answer at least four telephones at once and to talk in as many languages while making the arrangements for all the guests who are coming to Washington.

In a similar spirit Monsieur Herriot of France, and Mr. Bennett of Canada have been welcomed to the White House with a feeling that they can best understand the American point of view by living in an American atmosphere. Monsieur Herriot is, of course, the only one of the three who does not speak English as his native tongue, but luckily both the President and my mother are able to speak French well enough to make him feel quite at home and enjoy his excellent French stories. There have been formal dinners for Prime Minister MacDonald and Monsieur Herriot at which the entire delegations with these gentlemen have been honored. But I believe that the spirit of the whole series of conferences is the result more of the informal luncheons and dinners which have taken place in the small dining room at the White House.

Here the President and the members of his family, Colonel Howe, and a few guests sit around in a gay spirit of conversation. It is quite interesting to hear the Prime Minister refer to his patronage difficulties, which are not unlike those which occur whenever we have a change of administration in this country; but instead of simply giving out postmasterships and other positions of that kind, Mr. MacDonald is charged with the creating of lords and knights, in what is known as the "King's honors list." I think that both Mr. MacDonald and Monsieur Herriot were perhaps most interested in seeing the rapidity with which the motion-picture companies developed the news reel of their ocean trip and landing, which were shown last Tuesday evening, together with pictures of present American life, such as the work in the new reforestation camps. I personally wondered whether Monsieur Herriot really enjoyed the Mickey Mouse film, which was also shown after dinner, as much as my father does.

The conferences which these gentlemen have held have nearly all taken place in the oval study on the second floor of the White House proper, except for last Sunday's trip on the Sequoia, down the Potomac River. And incidentally, the atmosphere of that day, warm and sunny, going slowly past the green banks and fields of the Maryland and Virginia shores, past beautiful and stately Mount Vernon, could not help but give those in conference a feeling of how good it would be to see all nations with the possibility of war forever banned from disturbing such peaceful scenes.

Very briefly, what are the main problems which the world must settle to take new steps forward? First, the necessity for increasing the general level of commodity prices and a moderation in the network of restrictions, such as excessive tariffs which hamper international commerce. It is a complicated subject with naturally each nation having to look after its standard of living and its own industries.

The complications involved were brought home pretty strikingly by the visit on Monday afternoon, while one of the conferences was in session, of the group of sea captains from Gloucester, Mass., who arrived for a visit at the White House and for a talk on the problems of the fishing industry. That reminds me of the little incident which happened as the captains were about to leave. They had left in the lower hall of the White House their hats and coats on the large rack and they made quite a number. As they began to take them up on going out, Mr. Ike Hoover, the chief usher, came rushing forward to one of his assistants saying, "Good Lord! Look out for the Prime Minister's hat," and I am still wondering if perhaps one of the captains doesn't have in his possession rather a good prize.

The second problem which it is agreed must be solved is to provide for an adequate expansion of credit and the creation of conditions favorable to business recovery so that the governments of the world can contribute toward getting idle money out of banks and thus develop proper programs for capital expenditure. It is suggested that central banks by concerted action may be of considerable help in accomplishing this end.

Thirdly, and in line with the other two, it is agreed that an international monetary standard must be reestablished. In other words, that trade should be a matter of fair competition and not open to the fluctuations of exchange value, such as the dollar and the English pound, or the dollar and the money of any other country.

To show you the importance of stabilizing foreign exchange, let me give you a simple example. Suppose a school teacher was traveling in France for the summer and had saved $500 for the trip. Out of that sum she hoped to spend $100 on French goods; presents to bring back to her family. Let us assume that France is securely tied to the gold standard and that the United States should go off the gold standard. A violent fluctuation or difference in exchange would then occur. Now, if this happened in the middle of her trip abroad when she had only $200 left for her expenses and ticket home, she would suddenly find herself in a very uncomfortable position, because if there was a 50 percent drop in the value of the dollar in relation to the French franc, this school teacher would probably have to walk home or at least get somebody to give her a free ride, because her $200 would then be worth in francs only $100 on this assumed exchange value.

Of course, this illustration is exaggerated but it will give you an example of how such differences disturb trade, especially when applied to a manufacturer depending on imports from France, or a manufacturer exporting goods to that country. He always has before him an unstable outlook and naturally he is hesitant to invest his money and employ people on as wide a scale as he would normally do if the dollar and other foreign currencies were absolutely stabilized.

Last, but not least, the disarmament or peace question has been thoroughly discussed and I think it fair to say that as a result of these conferences both the leaders of the French and English understand more clearly that we in America do not wish to be embroiled in European disputes, but do look forward to doing our fair share in working out an agreement which will lessen to the greatest possible degree such disputes, not only European but between all other nations of the world.

These four problems have been fully discussed and the interchange of ideas has brought to all the parties concerned a higher mutual respect between the nations. The groundwork has been laid for results at the economic conference in London in June, which all firmly believe will produce more healthy industrial conditions and greater employment for all wage earners.

It is particularly fortunate that the gentlemen representing these foreign nations have come to this country at a time when our Congress is in session. They are having not only an opportunity to understand our point of view, but to understand also the workings of our Government, and to see that Americans are not greedy but are essentially a peace-loving people who are anxious to talk in plain and simple language, without frills and fuss, but directly and honestly to the point. In the same way we have had an opportunity to understand their problems and as a result we may look forward to perhaps the first (most) successful world conference ever held.

And so, as I leave you, may I express my appreciation to the Columbia Broadcasting System for this opportunity of talking with so many of you. I shall look forward to being again with my New England friends at our regular 8:30 time next Thursday.

Good night and good luck to you all.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably the nomination of Alexander W. Weddell, of Virginia, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Argentina.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further reports of committees? If not, the calendar is in order.

THE ARMY—ORDER OF EXECUTIVE BUSINESS

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of James Fuller McKinley to be Adjutant General in the Regular Army.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not desire to say anything more about this nomination. I have already discussed it; but I hope Senators will cooperate with me in eliminating further discussion and give me a roll call on the nomination. That is all I ask for.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, a number of Senators requested me, inasmuch as they would be absent, to ask that this nomination go over. I make that request with no purpose of delaying action on the nomination, of course, but anticipating that it might require prolonged consideration.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Arkansas whether we could not agree on a time when a vote could be taken on the nomination?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I shall be very glad to have the vote taken at the next executive session, if that is satisfactory to Senators; and we probably will have an executive session tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. I think a date should be definitely agreed on, so that Senators may be apprised of the time. Could we not go into executive session at 5 o'clock tomorrow?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow, at not later than 6 o'clock, or at the conclusion of the consideration of the unfinished business, the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, and proceed to vote on the nomination of Gen. James F. McKinley to be The Adjutant General.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, before action is taken I might refer to another matter, the nomination of Mr. Guy T. Helvering to be Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

A minority report on that nomination has been made by the able senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS]. After tomorrow the Senator from Delaware will be compelled to be absent from the Senate on public business. I wondered whether it would be agreeable to Senators if on tomorrow, Wednesday, we should proceed to that consideration of that nomination.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in the absence of the Chairman of the Finance Committee, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], I see that the Senator from Kentucky is present, and I yield to him for any statement he desires to make.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I know of no reason why we cannot take up the nomination tomorrow.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

Mr. McNARY. That being the case, can we not come to an agreement as to the hour when we shall enter into executive session? There probably will be quite a little discussion on the subject.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I should not be willing to move an executive session until the pending bill is disposed of. It may be disposed of early in the day.

Mr. McNARY. The only reason why I make the request is the necessity on the part of the Senator from Delaware to be absent. I feel that if we work on the unfinished business from 10 o'clock in the morning until 3 tomorrow afternoon, thereby avoiding the necessity for an evening session, and enter into executive session at about 3 o'clock and take up these two matters, we can dispose of them during the afternoon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I shall be willing to enter into that arrangement, with the understanding that if the unfinished business is not completed prior to 3 o'clock we may resume legislative session following the executive session.

Mr. McNARY. That is satisfactory.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, is this a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. I shall have to object to that, because the nomination of Mr. Helvering cannot be disposed of in 2 or 3 hours tomorrow.

Mr. McNARY. In suggesting the unanimous-consent agreement, I am sure there was no purpose on the part of the Senator from Arkansas—certainly there was not on my part—to specify when the executive session should terminate; but the idea was to fix a time for taking up the matter. Of course we should have to go through to the conclusion, even if the matter went over to the next day.

Mr. COUZENS. May I ask how long the Senator from Delaware is to be absent?

Mr. McNARY. For the remainder of the week.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow, and that at not later than 4 o'clock tomorrow the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator does not mean for us to take a recess now?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask that when the Senate concludes its business today it take a recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow, and that at not later than 4 o'clock tomorrow the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. That is what I intended to say. I did not intend to foreclose the opportunity of confirming the nominations on the calendar to which there is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, that is that we take a recess today until 10 o'clock tomorrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask that the next nomination on the calendar be laid before the Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Stephen B. Gibbons, of New York, to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, Mr. Gibbons' name was reported out of the Committee on Finance at a time when I was absent. Later on, I received a letter from the junior Senator from California [Mr. McADOO], which read in part as follows:

> I enclose a memorandum about Stephen B. Gibbons, who has been reported favorably as an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. Senator Harrison asked me if I would give you some information about it. He is an unusually capable, honest, and loyal citizen.

I send this memorandum to the desk, and ask that the clerk read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read the memorandum.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

> Stephen B. Gibbons, born Pennsylvania; resident of New York City for the past 28 years.
> From 1900 to 1912, followed a commercial career, during the major portion of which time he was secretary to the treasurer of a large trans-Atlantic steamship corporation. In 1912 be became private secretary to the Honorable W. G. McADOO, who as vice chairman of the National Democratic Campaign Committee managed Woodrow Wilson's campaign for President that year. This appointment had not the slightest political significance but was made strictly on merit.
> For the next 2½ years he was employed by the board of estimate and apportionment of New York City in reclassifying and regrading titles, salaries, etc., of the civil-service employees of that municipality. As in the case of his appointment by Mr. McAdoo, this appointment was made without political consideration by the Honorable Charles A. Hervey, then deputy comptroller of the city of New York, on the personal recommendation of Mr. Julian Beatty, at that time secretary to the Honorable George McAmeny, president of the Borough of Manhattan.
> During the 1916 New York gubernatorial campaign he acted as one of Judge Seabury's secretaries, accompanying him on his tour of the State. From 1916 to 1926, inclusive, he was an income-tax examiner for the Bureau of Internal Revenue in New York City. He resigned, and from 1926 to 1932, inclusive, has been engaged in the general practice of accounting and tax consultant in New York City. He has never practiced before the Bureau of Internal Revenue and has never applied for a license to do so.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I desire to say in addition that several stories came to me that Mr. Gibbons at one time was associated with Secretary of the Treasury Woodin. By arrangement with the chairman of the Finance Committee, I met Mr. Gibbons, and he told me that the only connection he had ever had with Mr. Woodin was on several occasions when he had been called in to prepare his income-tax return.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination? Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Arthur E. Morgan, of Ohio, to be a member of the board of directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority for the term expiring 9 years after May 18, 1933.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Thomas Hewes, of Connecticut, to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, Mr. Hewes' name was reported from the Senate Committee on Finance when I was attending one of the sessions of the committee holding the Morgan investigation. Afterward I saw the chairman of the Finance Committee, and he said he would arrange through the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] to have Mr. Hewes appear before the committee to be examined as to his prior connections. The junior Senator from Connecticut submitted a memorandum giving the history of Mr. Hewes, and said that later he would furnish me with a list of clients Mr. Hewes had had before the Bureau of Internal Revenue during the last 3 or 4 years. As the junior Senator from Connecticut is not here, I ask that the nomination go over until that list is furnished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE

The chief clerk read the nomination of Guy T. Helvering, of Kansas, to be Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] is to be absent after tomorrow. I understood the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] to state that the reason for taking up the Helvering nomination was that the Senator from Delaware would not be here tomorrow.

Mr. HASTINGS. I expect to be away after tomorrow or the next day.

Mr. LONG. I suggest that we consider the Helvering nomination first tomorrow when we take up the Executive Calendar.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I see no reason for doing that.

Mr. LONG. We want to get through with it.

Mr. MCKELLAR. But the other nominations preceding it will not take a great while.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be passed over.

THE JUDICIARY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Richard Curd Pope Thomas, of Kentucky, to be district judge of the Canal Zone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of William Thomas Collins, of Missouri, to be clerk of the United States Court for China.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That completes the calendar.

The Senate resumed legislative session.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in accordance with the order heretofore entered I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p.m.) the Senate, under the order previously entered, took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, May 31, 1933, at 10 o'clock a.m.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 30 (legislative day of May 29), 1933

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

Stephen B. Gibbons to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

DISTRICT JUDGE OF THE CANAL ZONE

Richard Curd Pope Thomas to be district judge of the Canal Zone.

MEMBER, BOARD OF DIRECTORS, TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Arthur E. Morgan to be member, board of directors, Tennessee Valley Authority.

CLERK OF THE UNITED STATES COURT FOR CHINA

William Thomas Collins to be clerk of the United States Court for China.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MAY 31, 1933

(Legislative day of Monday, May 29, 1933)

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a.m, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Byrnes	Gore	McGill
Austin	Caraway	Hatfield	Robinson, Ark.
Bachman	Coolidge	Johnson	Sheppard
Bratton	Erickson	Logan	Thomas, Utah
Brown	Fess	Lonergan	Thompson
Bulow	Frazier	McCarran	Walsh

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] is detained from the Senate this morning on official business. He will be in the Chamber later in the day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is necessarily absent on official business.

I desire further to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. FESS. I desire also to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] are detained from the Chamber on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Twenty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The clerk will call the names of the absent Senators.

The legislative clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BORAH, Mr. COPELAND, Mr. DICKINSON, Mr. HALE, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. OVERTON, Mr. POPE, Mr. TRAMMELL, and Mr. VANDENBERG answered to their names when called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. BLACK, Mr. PATTERSON, Mr. STEPHENS, Mr. HASTINGS, Mr. WHITE, Mr. KING, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. NORRIS, Mr. CAPPER,

Mr. VAN NUYS, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. DUFFY, Mr. NYE, Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. CAREY, and Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

APPOINTMENTS TO SUNDRY BOARDS, COMMITTEES, AND COMMISSIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair wishes to say that he asked the parliamentary clerk to prepare a list of appointments that are now vacant under certain statutes and resolutions, and at this time the Chair announces the following appointments to fill such vacancies, which the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

BOARD OF REGENTS OF THE SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION

In accordance with the provisions of title 20, chapter 3, section 43, United States Code, the Chair appoints the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] as Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, to fill the vacancies caused, respectively, by the expiration of the term of service of Hon. Reed Smoot and the resignation of Hon. Claude A. Swanson.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS, COLUMBIA HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN

Under authority of the act of June 10, 1872, the Chair appoints the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] a director of the Columbia Hospital for Women, to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of the term of service of Hon. Lawrence C. Phipps.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS, COLUMBIA INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF

Under authority of title 24, chapter 5, section 236, United States Code, the Chair reappoints the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] a director of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON CONSERVATION OF WILD-LIFE RESOURCES

The Chair appoints the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] a member of the Special Committee on Conservation of Wild Life Resources, created by Senate Resolution 246, Seventy-first Congress, and continuing resolution, to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of Hon. Harry B. Hawes.

SPECIAL SELECT COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE THE ALASKA RAILROAD

The Chair appoints the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] as members of the Special Select Committee to Investigate the Alaska Railroad, created by Senate Resolution 298, Seventy-first Congress, and continuing resolutions, to fill the vacanies created, respectively, by the death of Hon. Robert B. Howell and the expiration of the term of service of Hon. John Thomas.

MIGRATORY-BIRD CONSERVATION COMMISSION

In accordance with the provisions of title 16, chapter 7a, section 715a, United States Code, the Chair reappoints the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] a member of the Migratory-Bird Conservation Commission.

NATIONAL FOREST RESERVATION COMMISSION

In accordance with the provisions of title 16, chapter 2, section 513, United States Code, the Chair reappoints the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] a member of the National Forest Reservation Commission.

NASHVILLE (TENN.) PRESIDENTS' PLAZA COMMISSION

The Chair appoints the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN] a member of the Nashville (Tenn.) Presidents' Plaza Commission, created by section 2 of an act approved December 12, 1928, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Hon. Cordell Hull.

GEORGE ROGERS CLARK SESQUICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

The Chair appoints the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS] a member of the George Rogers Clark Sesquicentennial Commission, created by the act approved May 23, 1928, to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of the term of service of Hon. James E. Watson.

UNITED STATES ROANOKE COLONY COMMISSION

The Chair appoints the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] members of the United States Roanoke Colony Commission, created by House Concurrent Resolution 26, Seventy-second Congress, to fill the vacancies created, respectively, by the expiration of the term of service of Hon. George H. Moses, and the resignation of Hon. Harry B. Hawes.

MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a telegram and several communications in the nature of memorials from citizens of the State of Louisiana, endorsing Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, condemning attacks made upon him, and remonstrating against a senatorial investigation relative to his alleged acts and conduct, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CUSTOMS OFFICE AT MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from B. B. Sheffield, president of the Minneapolis (Minn.) Civic & Commerce Association, which I think ought to be printed in the RECORD, for the facts therein ought to be brought to the attention of those in control both in the Senate and in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury.

I ask that the letter may be printed and referred to the appropriate committee.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS CIVIC & COMMERCE ASSOCIATION,
May 27, 1933.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR SCHALL: Current newspaper reports indicate the possibility of eliminating practically all the inland customs offices of the country. While we are entirely in accord with every reasonable effort to reduce the cost of government, we do not feel that the best interests of industry and business here and in the Northwest would be served by closing the Minneapolis customs office, if such a move is contemplated.

The Minneapolis customs office has always been a large revenue-producing office for the Government, based upon the cost of operation, and at the same time has provided excellent service at a minimum of cost to the importers of this community, as well as to the State and the Northwest. Upon investigation, we are informed that in 1929 the approximate value of imports handled through this office was $7,251,000 and the duties collected about $1,650,000. In 1932, because of general business conditions, this dropped materially, the imports approximating $2,370,000, with duties collected amounting to about $725,000. We are informed that the cost of operation of this office is between $55,000 and $60,000 annually. It is very probable that certain economies could be effected to reduce further the cost of operation of this office.

We are also informed that Minneapolis is the clearinghouse for many Canadian imports. There is Federal food-inspection service here, and because of this, Canadian fish destined for eastern markets is cleared at Minneapolis. Further, there is a large amount of other perishable commodities cleared through this office. This would indicate to us the importance of this office.

The closing of the Minneapolis office would place a handicap on the importers of this community and the Northwest owing to the fact that they would be obliged to clear through other border or seaboard customs offices, with the resultant increase in or additional brokerage fees, the inconvenience and delay incidental thereto, and the probable increase in transportation charges.

Minneapolis is the largest manufacturing, wholesale distribution, and transportation center west of Chicago and is entitled to the service provided by the customs office. The city is served by 10 trunk-line railroads, 4 of which are transcontinental, serving directly or indirectly 21 States. It ranks ninth in the country as a wholesale distributing center. Minneapolis ranks high in the number of importers, comparable to other cities, who are importing direct and selling to the consumer at prices less than could be sold if imports were cleared at the border or seaboard.

Our feeling is that the Minneapolis customs office is a direct aid to business in the Northwest, and inasmuch as it is not only self-supporting but a revenue-producing agency for the Government, it should not be discontinued, and we therefore urge that every consideration be given by the administration in its reorganization program to the importance of maintaining this office.

We feel that you should have our views on the customs-office matter for such use as you can and may desire to make of it. We are writing a similar letter to the President and to the Honorable Frank Dow, Acting Commissioner of Customs at the Treasury Department.

Yours very truly,

B. B. SHEFFIELD, President.

REPORT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COMMITTEE

Mr. KING, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 1403) to authorize the merger of The Georgetown Gaslight Co. with and into Washington Gas Light Co., and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 102) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FRAZIER:

A bill (S. 1801) granting a pension to Chief Drags Wolf (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ERICKSON:

A bill (S. 1802) authorizing the issuance of a patent to certain lands in the State of Montana to Florence Kerr Facey; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. SHIPSTEAD:

A bill (S. 1803) for the relief of certain riparian owners for losses sustained by them on the drained Mud Lake bottom in Marshall County in the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 1804) to authorize the transfer of certain real estate by the Secretary of the Treasury to C. F. Colvin in settlement of the Northfield, Minn., post-office site litigation, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. PATTERSON:

A bill (S. 1805) granting a pension to Anna Elliott (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 1806) granting an easement over certain lands to the Springfield special road district in the county of Greene, State of Missouri, for road purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HAYDEN:

A bill (S. 1807) to provide for the exchange of Indian and privately owned lands, Fort Mojave Indian Reservation, Ariz.; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CONNALLY:

A bill (S. 1808) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary in 1936 of the independence of Texas, and of the noble and heroic sacrifices of her pioneers, whose revered memory has been an inspiration to her sons and daughters during the past century; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. DILL:

A joint resolution (S.J.Res. 58) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to election and qualification of judges; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 5389, the independent offices appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 58, line 3, before the word "as", to insert "and such civilian professors and instructors at the Naval Academy."

On page 58, line 5, to strike out the word "officers" and insert in lieu thereof the words "such officers, professors, and instructors."

ORGANIZATIONS WITHIN THE FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION—AMENDMENT

Mr. DILL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1766) to provide for organizations within the Farm Credit Administration to make loans for the production and marketing of agricultural products, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, to provide a market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO INDUSTRIAL CONTROL AND PUBLIC WORKS BILL

Mr. BULOW submitted an amendment and Mr. OVERTON submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to House bill 5755, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", which were severally referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COOLIDGE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 5755, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", which were referred to the Committee on Finance, ordered to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. COOLIDGE to the bill (H.R. 5755) to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes, viz: On page 24, line 6, after "(g)", insert "(1)"; and after line 9 insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"(2) Effective as of the day following the date of the enactment of this act, section 617 (c) (2) of such act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows: 'As used in this paragraph the term "benzol" does not include benzol sold for use otherwise than as a fuel for the propulsion of motor vehicles, motor boats, or airplanes, and otherwise than in the manufacture or production of such fuel.'"

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. COOLIDGE to the bill (H.R. 5755) to encourage national industrial recovery, to foster fair competition, and to provide for the construction of certain useful public works, and for other purposes, viz: On page 26, after line 14, insert a new subsection to read as follows:

"(k) Effective as of the day following the date of the enactment of this act, section 617 (c) (2) of such act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows: 'As used in this paragraph the term "benzol" does not include benzol sold for use otherwise than as a fuel for the propulsion of motor vehicles, motor boats, or aeroplanes, and otherwise than in the manufacture or production of such fuel.'"

Mr. COOLIDGE also presented a statement relative to the above amendments, which was referred to the Committee on Finance, to accompany the amendments, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

An amendment to H.R. 5755, section 208–E, is requested for the following reasons:

"Section 617 (c) (2) of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended by inserting the word 'motor' before 'benzol'."

Under section 617 of the Revenue Act of 1932, defining the term "gasoline", the word "benzol" is included. There are two kinds of benzol—first, the crude variety known as "motor benzol" used as a motor fuel, and a second class known as "industrial benzol", which on account of its high purity sells for a higher price and is used in the arts for a variety of purposes.

Industrial benzol, in no case, finds consumption as a motor fuel. The insertion of the word "motor" before the word "benzol" will carry out the intent of Congress to tax motor fuels, and will confine this tax to this class of products, and avoid confusion and an extension of the tax to articles which do not find consumption in motor fuels.

A perfecting amendment is necessary to correct the phraseology in the act of 1932, as consultation with the representatives of the industries consuming industrial benzol shows that the officials of the Bureau of Internal Revenue state that it is mandatory under the definition "gasoline" to tax all kinds of benzol.

Local consumption of benzol of all kinds is about 100,000,000 gallons per year. Some 85,000,000 gallons is of the motor benzol type, whereas about 15,000,000 gallons belong to the industrial benzol class. Consequently a tax of 1 cent per gallon on the latter class amounts to $150,000 a year. A serious handicap is placed upon manufacturers who have contracted the chemical derivatives of benzol before this tax was assessed, thus compelling them to absorb the tax which in many cases will entail a loss.

INSURANCE OF BANK DEPOSITS

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print an address by Donald Despain, of St. Paul, Minn., on the Insurance of Bank Deposits.

This plan was submitted by me in 1931 to the late Republican administration, who did not look upon it with unkindly eyes. It seems to me this address, carrying outline of plan, should be of benefit to anyone who will take the time to read it, and it should be called to the attention of those in authority with the present administration. I know of no better way of getting it to the attention of those who today have the power than to ask its insertion in the RECORD and that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the address was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INSURANCE OF BANK DEPOSITS

Part I. "First things first"—America first—Get to the root of our trouble—Forget Europe until we get our own house in order—What destroyed confidence?—How to restore confidence

The paramount need of the United States for defeating depression is the restoration of confidence.

That premise will be agreed to by every economist, financier, and business man in America.

What is confidence? It is a psychological factor not measured by industrial plants, locomotives, bank buildings, nor even money. It is not found in a tariff schedule, a war-debt payment, nor an international treaty. It is a human emotion associated with a faith in or fear of self-preservation.

It therefore does not pertain to the inanimate but to the animate—to man and human beings. If our greatest problem is the restoration of confidence, we must first ascertain what destroyed confidence before we can intelligently know how to restore it. That, certainly, is plain common sense and logic.

With equal simplicity and clarity let us take a strong, sturdy tree as representing our economic structure. The great mass of countless roots we will designate as "the people" from which all growth above, upward and outward, had its source and support. Next, we will name the trunk of the tree—agriculture—our basic industry. Then let each of the big, strong branches of the tree represent the several major industries—manufacturing, transportation, banking and finance, mining, insurance, wholesale and retail merchandising, education, the professions, and invention and the arts.

The blood of that tree is called sap, the circulating life-giving fluid of the plant. No one will deny that if the roots be cut off or the sap be stopped or restricted the tree will wither and die.

The sap of our economic tree is money. It starts from the people (the roots). If the roots are cut, bruised and injured the flow of sap or money is restricted—and the tree withers.

The foregoing is quite elementary but it seems necessary that our economists, financiers, and statesmen be taken back to the primary grades and some very elementary facts be impressed again.

After 3 years of floundering around in the superstructure of our national and international economy, the most encouraging and refreshing words in the inaugural address of President Roosevelt was his declaration that: "Our international trade relations though vastly important, are in point of time and necessity, secondary to the establishment of a sound national economy. I favor as a practical policy the putting of first things first."

Those words gave hope that we were going to stop doctoring and spraying the branches of the tree and give some attention and water to the roots of the tree.

But aren't we still drifting into that traditional human weakness of playing with theories instead of dealing with hard facts? Of looking yonder in the distance to find the remedy, when it may be right here at home?

DISMISS THE BOGY MEN

First things first is the text and that means the first thing to settle is our home problems—our own economic situation.

To start right, let us set down two indisputable facts:

(1) The United States is the most self-sufficient nation in the world—more self-contained and self-sustaining than any other country.

(2) The United States by reason of being the richest nation, the greatest creditor nation, and the commercial and financial leader of the world is therefore the most important factor in the international machinery.

If these two premises are correct then the minds at Washington are being misled and misdirected, and as a Nation we are being diverted and detoured from the road to economic recovery. We should dispose of the big bogy man that we are dependent on Europe, that we must recover our trade abroad, before we can hope for better things at home.

At the most, our export trade is hardly more than 8 to 10 percent of our production, and a drop in the price of the raw products we import would give us an added buying power at home, to compensate for the export trade lost. But, do not forget, our drop in exports came after the crisis and not before. The truth is, we sustained foreign buying with our loans and our buying, and it was the stopping of these loans and our buying that took foreign nations out of the market. The great price break came from us and not from abroad. Although it would be desirable to have foreign affairs settled, the quickest way to settle them would be to start up our own business again. For we wag the world; the world does not wag us.

Another bogy man is war debts. We hear it said that we can have no prosperity until the war-debt question is settled. That is putting the cart ahead of the horse. If we must accept Europe's alibi of "inability to pay" let's start world prosperity by putting America into high gear and lead the world back to normalcy. America is the engine at the head of the train, not one of the flat cars. Why drag through months and years of never-ending argument and discussion about these debts? Reduction of debts gets us nowhere. We cut them one half once. Cancelation is unthinkable. I am not in favor of penalizing the patriotism of the American citizen and taxpayer because of Europe's ingratitude and desire for repudiation. Let Europe lose its honor, but let's keep ours.

If we declared a moratorium on all debts for 5 or 10 years and got this old world active again in trade and commerce under the leadership of a prosperous United States of America the war debts would fade away like the mist before the rising sun. Let me remind you that after the war closed and we balanced the books, America found itself confronted with a staggering debt of $25,000,000,000 and with the collapse of its greatest industry, agriculture. Confidence was still with us; faith and grit and public morale were here. Spurred by that spirit and backed by the greatest resources in the world we attacked that problem so effectively that we paid off $10,000,000,000 of that debt in 9 years—a financial accomplishment unknown in the history of the world.

Balance the Budget? Well, who can tell us just when we had the Budget balanced or unbalanced? It's a matter of bookkeeping. There is some peculiar bookkeeping going on in Washington right now. Forget the Budget temporarily, get American business moving, and we will have no trouble arriving at a balance within 12 months.

THE MISSING LINK

Did you every try to fix a machine or your car and when you seemingly had everything together and it should run—you found something missing?

Our economists, Government leaders and legislators, have tried plan after plan, theory after theory; they have poured a billion dollars and more into the financial machinery, they have applied artificial price fixing as a blood transfusion, and inflation as a stimulant, but the patient does not respond. We have more currency than in 1929, our resources exceed $300,000,000,000. We certainly are not broke, but the wheels won't turn. Something is missing!

Let's come down from the clouds, out of the fog of confusing legislation, set our feet on the ground, and get close to the human element of the situation.

Worse than industrial, financial, and commercial paralysis we find a complete demoralization of public morale. The confidence of the people shattered.

We hear men in high position announcing that confidence has been restored, and so forth. Those men are totally ignorant of how severe the shocks and how deep the wounds suffered by the American people.

It is well to analyze how this collapse of confidence occurred. First, with our Liberty Loan war bond drives we started a course of instruction which educated 25,000,000 citizens in a knowledge of securities. From this initiation 15,000,000 people later entered the stock market inspired by a faith in the stability of American industry under the leadership and encouragement of our industrial and financial leaders. The gigantic structure crashed, sweeping away millions of personal funds and billions in anticipated profits. But greater than these, the faith of the American public in American business leaders and institutions.

Recital of the next shock leads us to the final bulwark—the last trench—of the people's faith. Since the childhood of every citizen, faith in our banks and bankers has been taught and instilled as deeply as religious convictions. Our laws are supposed to create banks to serve as guardians of public money, to hold and protect the savings of those who toil. To millions their bank stood to them as the Rock of Gibraltar and their banker as the highest example of human integrity.

And then, the crashing of banks began; 1,345 failures in 1930; 2,298 in 1931; 1,453 in 1932; 5,096 of them in 3 years, carrying three and one half billion dollars of deposits with them and consternation, grief, and loss to 15,000,000 depositors. And the failures continued into 1933 culminating in the closing by presidential proclamation of every bank in the United States on March 6.

I shall not go into sordid details of criminal and incompetent banking brought to light in the exposure resulting from many of these failures. I have no desire to indulge in caustic or destructive criticism, except to say that if bankers had clung to the fundamental rules of investing demand deposits they could have liquidated during the past 3 years and the great majority of our banks now closed would be open. The classes of investments available for commercial deposits are limited principally to call loans, Government bonds having slight fluctuation in the market, and self-liquidating loans such as commercial paper of less than 90 days' maturity and with definite sources of income assured. Real-estate mortgages should be bought only with trust, insurance, and other relatively permanent funds.

Evidence is at hand to show that banks did not adhere to such safe methods. From 1921 to 1929 the banks of the United States, despite the fact that vast business activity prevailed in that period, actually decreased their commercial loans and tripled their loans on city real estate, and their investments, outside of United States Government bonds, increased 62 percent. Supervision and restraint was absent.

With practically one half of our banks forced to close their doors, and with as high as $7,000,000,000 of deposits tied up at one time, the evidence is sufficient to convince even the uneducated and unfamiliar layman that as an economic vehicle our banking industry is a broken-down flivver.

There were 49,500,000 depositors in United States banks in 1930—the largest common-interest group of our entire population. Whether you or I lost money directly in a closed bank, we were all indirectly affected through a relative, a friend, or by business reactions.

Volumes upon volumes would be required to print the stories of personal sufferings, the destitution and poverty, the loss of businesses and homes as the result of this Nation-wide banking debacle. You can multiply every one of these "shock victims" by 3 or 5 or 10, because that many friends or relatives were close to their suffering, to gain some idea of what this did to the morale of our 125,000,000 citizens.

How many of our leaders realize these conditions? No Senator or Congressman or Government official with his salary safe and secure and who has not felt hunger or the wiping out of his business or the loss of a home can understand it. And yet they expect a little ballyhoo and propaganda about "confidence has returned" to herd these "burned victims" right back to the flame again without any genuine protection offered. Two billion dollars stowed away in socks, mattresses, and safety-deposit boxes is the answer to the ballyhoo—and it will stay there until some real protection is given the bank depositor.

UNFAIR ATTACKS ON ALARMED DEPOSITORS

I regret that there have been some ill-advised and thoroughly unwarranted attacks by the press and self-appointed dictators upon those citizens of this country, who during the storm of crashing banks withdrew their funds from banks and have withheld them because of fear of loss. It sounds big to call these unfortunate people unpatriotic, but let us not forget that the last hundred dollars is the "hoardiest." But these people are not hoarders. There is a clear distinction between hoarding and hiding. I maintain that 98 percent of money today in private hands is hidden through fear, and who dares say they haven't reason to be afraid? They know full well that the man or woman without money is helpless and is forced to beg for bread. Whose money are they holding? It's their property, is it not? Has the bank any more claim to the right of liquidity than an individual?

In our society the only protection man has against the future is in his savings. Society furnishes him no insurance against unemployment, against sickness, against old age. All these frantic appeals come from those untouched by the fear of destitution. In many instances they have been insulting to, first, the patriotism of the people; and, secondly, to their intelligence. The law of self-preservation has not and cannot be repealed. You cannot kill fear by fiat.

Furthermore, the general assumption seems to be that it is the small depositor who has hidden the money. Nothing could be farther from the fact. The real hiders of money are men and institutions of wealth. Tens of thousands of business men and business houses are maintaining deposits in banks for convenience of checking, and the major part of their funds are in their safes or safety-deposit boxes. It is the thinking man today who ponders upon the exposed corruption of the banking fraternity and who insists upon protecting his funds in his own secret way.

It is simply shouting in the face of the wind to ask or demand that people leave their money in banks unless the appeal is accompanied by some adequate government protection or insurance. Once that insurance is provided there will be no need for the appeal.

The honest and competent bankers are today paying for the dishonesty and incompetency of those who have dragged the banking industry into disrepute. It has been a terrible price, but it has been more terrific on the depositor and he refuses to carry the cost further. It is now up to the bankers to pay for maintaining public confidence and stop periodic and recurring bank crises.

Regardless of the number of sound banks and good bankers, the entire banking industry stands indicted and under a cloud of suspicion. Who knows which is the safe bank? Every one of the 15,000,000 who lost their deposits thought their bank was safe. In too many instances they were told it was safe at 3 o'clock p.m. and at 10 a.m. it was closed. As eminent a banker as Frederick A. Rawson, chairman of the board of the First National Bank of Chicago, is authority for the statement that "banks do not become insolvent overnight. They drift into failure gradually through poor management."

Let us take stock of the gross results of this paralyzing catastrophe that has stricken the Nation.

First and worst, confidence is destroyed. Second, fear has carried $2,000,000,000 (seven hundred million of it in gold) into hiding—into mattresses, under carpets, and into safety-deposit boxes. Third, that $2,000,000,000 of hidden money in the hands of the people puts fear in the heart of every banker, causing him to maintain his bank in the most liquid condition to meet a possible run. So we have, according to the best estimates, somewhere between $3,000,000,000 and $3,500,000,000 of currency now hidden or hoarded (whichever you wish to call it) by the people and held by banks, resulting in a shrinkage of from twenty to thirty billion of credit loans, and the business of the Nation stagnated and throttled.

WHAT A BUSY DOLLAR DOES

It is necessary to get a true understanding of what a dollar can do when it is working in order to clearly appreciate what two billion of hidden money is doing to the commerce of the Nation. We think of the busy bee and the ant as tireless, but they are loafers compared with the activity of a busy dollar.

Consider these facts: In 1929 there were between four and five billions of currency, but bank deposits in the United States amounted to about $60,000,000,000. In the country as a whole the five billion of currency cleared checks for the staggering total of $906,000,000,000. Every dollar of hard cash flowing in the channels of trade turned itself over 2,500 times a year; it paid obligations for 2,500 times its own value.

Is any more proof necessary to demonstrate that banking is a matter of faith more than money? Can't you see what the shattering of that faith does to the business of the country? Isn't it worth expending every possible effort and all necessary legislation in order to rebuild and stabilize that faith?

In bank vaults	1,500,000,000
In action	2,200,000,000
		5,700,000,000

Practically every economist, financier, statesman, and student of public affairs agrees that normal or prosperous conditions cannot be brought back without the revival of purchasing power by the masses. What has stopped purchasing? Two factors—fear to spend by those having funds and the almost complete elimination of credit to those who have the equivalent of funds—property. Fear has destroyed credit.

How, it may be asked, can such a small amount of currency do such an immense amount of work and still stay in bank? The answer is simple. Bank deposits have no hard-and-fast relation to currency. In between the small figures of currency and the huge figure of deposits is that all-powerful, dominating factor of confidence—the handmaiden of prosperity. It is confidence which leads the depositor, whether he be the wage earner at the bench or the high-salaried executive behind the mahogany desk, up to the bank teller's window and gives him the courage to deliver his $5 or his five thousand through the wicket into the hands of the bank, and receive nothing in return but a pen scratch of the amount in a little red book. When you stop to think about it, isn't that the acme—the high mountain peak of confidence? Can you think of any greater, more sincere evidence of faith anywhere along life's highway?

Right there that money begins working. Activity starts. The bank loans that money. When the bank lends money to a customer it credits his deposit account with the amount of the loan. The checks he draws diminish his deposit, but they turn up as deposits in some other account possibly in another bank. Every time a bank makes a loan the total bank deposits of the country are increased, and every time a loan is paid off they are decreased.

It is the banks and not the Government that create the money on which business lives. That money is the result of granting credit. Thus credit is the lifeblood of trade. But remember! Confidence is the heart, the engine, the motive power that pumps and propels credit. Destroy confidence and credit money disappears and currency goes into hiding.

A recital of what occurred throughout the Middle West in 1896 will serve to well illustrate how quickly confidence responds. In June of 1896 there appeared on the western political horizon the dark ominous cloud of populism with a disturbing political program sponsored by the silver-tongued William Jennings Bryan. The conservative financial and industrial East predicted national disaster if that program won. Bryan was sweeping the country with his oratory. The country was alarmed. Money went into hiding so far that none was available or in sight. It was much more of a money panic than prevails now. Local merchants throughout the Middle West issued their personal scrip which was interchangeable in local areas. From June to November this scrip replaced money completely. On November 5, much to the surprise and relief of the country, McKinley was elected. Then the miraculous occurred. Within a matter of days—a very few days—all the scrip disappeared and the money flowed back as if by magic. A striking example of how quick is the response of confidence when fear is removed.

THE WAY FOR SOUND INFLATION AND THE RESTORATION OF CONFIDENCE

When the public is convinced banks are safe, hidden money to the extent of $2,000,000,000 will flow back into the banks. Once deposits are made and fear gone, the individual ceases worrying and hope and ambition take its place. The next step is buying—buying of the shoes, clothing, and of every human need. The banks having excess funds will seek business and commercial loans. Merchants' orders start factories, factories reemploy help, which starts new buying—and the wheels of prosperity are again revolving.

But, mark you, all the nice words, all the propaganda of press and radio, will not restore the crushed confidence of the public. "Prosperity is around the corner" wore itself out in the effort, and the "new deal", in words alone, will not suffice. Something positive and concrete must be done.

I submit to you a complete plan for the positive and definite insurance of bank deposits with the strength and prestige of the United States Government behind it, but with its administration in the hands of business executives of the highest personal and financial integrity.

DEPOSITORY INSURANCE

There exists in the minds of many people a peculiar and illogical attitude regarding the insurance of bank deposits. The same complex existed when the first fire-insurance policy was written, and the supply of condemnatory adjectives was exhausted when Lloyds, of London, underwrote the first maritime insurance.

People can and do eat, drink, worry, and overwork themselves into graves while thousands deliberately commit suicide. Buildings can be and are destroyed by reckless use of matches, carelessly tossed cigarettes, overheated stoves, lightning, spontaneous combustion, and by deliberate use of the torch by the owners. Yet all these innumerable hazards are not considered valid arguments against life or fire insurance.

Consider these myriad dangers which constantly threaten and endanger human life and property with the comparatively limited causes contributing to bank failures.

Furthermore, there are many guardians watching the operation of a bank. These consist, besides the many officers, of from seven to a score of directors, a large number of stockholders plus the supervision and examination by State or national banking authorities.

The fact that bank-deposit-guaranty projects have failed in local, restricted areas only proves one of the fundamental principles of insurance, that is, that there must exist wide and general distribution and diversification. It is as impossible for a single State to undertake this obligation as it is for a single community to successfully insure itself against death or fire. Applied on a national scale with the hazard spread widely, over all geographical sections and diverse conditions, and coupled with proven insurance machinery and uniform standards the risk is calculable on an actuarial basis.

The demand for, and the need of, this type of insurance will persist until someone successfully answers this question: When every individual from messenger boy to president of a bank are bonded and all the property insured against fire, theft, and damage in favor of the bank, why should the depositor, who furnishes all the funds upon which the bank operates and profits, be unprotected?

In principle, there is no reason of importance that I can see why bank deposits should not be guaranteed just as much as bank notes. The only important difference is that bank deposits are now the bigger problem by far. We got the guaranty of bank notes after having had wildcat banking in connection with State bank notes and after having had people injured who held bank notes of the State banks. So that we finally got the national banking system, in which the notes of the individual banks are guaranteed.

It is much more important in principle to guarantee bank deposits, because the real circulating medium of the country is bank deposits. In fact, bank deposits are far more important than bank notes, about ten times more important than gold certificates, plus silver certificates—in fact, than all the actual physical money in circulation. Yet appreciation of this fact is lacking.

Permit me to draw the distinction between "guaranty" of bank deposits and the "insurance" of deposits. Webster defines "guaranty" as "that which is given by way of security; something made or held as a security; to be surety for; to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another." Note the difference in his definition of "insurance" which he says is "to secure against a loss by a contingent event, on certain stipulated conditions."

With that definition in mind I wish to quote from an argument against any guaranty plan to protect peoples' deposits, made by an official of the American Bankers Association, in which he says: "The best safeguards of sound banking are: banking intelligence, plus financial integrity supplemented by careful supervision. Supervision that prevents bank failures is far more valuable to both depositors and stockholders than any plan of guaranty." His argument against the proposal is the best argument I have seen in favor of it, for we have lacked the three factors he suggested, namely, intelligence, integrity, and supervision. Have we any evidence of a type of "careful supervision" that has given any protection to the public? And we never will have such supervision under political regulation and examination; we will never have any supervision worthy of the name that does not have real authority and heavy responsibility tied to it.

Imagine, if you will, an examiner from a reputable surety or fidelity or insurance company walking into a bank and finding evidences of the peoples' money—which his company has insured—being dissipated in the stock market, in personal business ventures without security, or loaned to partners, relatives, or political favorites without proper collateral, as has been found in far too many closed banks recently. Can you imagine the storm that would break instantly from that examiner and his institution? That bond or policy would be canceled pronto unless immediate adjustment and restitution was made. That is the kind of strict supervision that the insurance of bank deposits would bring to banks and to the protection of depositors. And it is because of the provision for that kind of supervision that causes the banking fraternity to fight all plans and programs for genuine guaranty or insurance of deposits.

Too many of us—and especially the banker—forgets that banking is or should be a public trust. Too many of them assume their position as that of a divine right, a license or privilege if you please, to take control of the public's money and do with it whatever their personal judgment or fancy dictates. Too many bankers forget that the money belongs to the depositors.

There are sufficient and well-defined rules of banking—"stop" and "go" signs—well-known commandments of "thou shalt not"—to guide any well-intentioned and honest banker. Supervision of the right kind would only keep him within those rules and boundaries. Therefore, I am at a loss to understand why any banker who wants to be honest will fight honest and efficient supervision. It is equally inconceivable to me why any honest banker would not accept with open arms an intelligent, practical, and efficient system of protection which would permanently allay all public fears, stop panics and runs, and allow him to sleep peacefully at night without the fear of tomorrow.

The argument most resorted to by those opposing insurance of deposits is that "a law of this nature has a tendency to introduce incompetents into the banking business and would be apt to encourage loose and incompetent banking." Well, if I were a banker I would, in view of recent results, leave that argument at home. The natural thought that follows presents itself in the query, Could any law develop looser or more incompetent banking than we have had?

Time does not permit of presenting the details of the Kentucky bank swindle which resulted in the conviction of a governor and United States Senator and others; or the Caldwell bubble, which sank banks in five States; or the Chicago bank epidemic carrying 140 banks to the gutter, where their exposed crookedness gagged the sewers; or the United States National Bank of New York, which swindled 400,000 depositors and sent its officers to Sing Sing; or the exposure of the little family affair in the National City Bank of New York, with its president under indictment, and which sold $650,000,000 of $20 par stock to its employees, depositors, and customers, at $580 per share, and which was short in the stock at the time it was loading its own employees and depositors; or of the charges of fraud, embezzlement, larceny, etc., against 700 indicted bankers in the United States.

These are only a few of the reasons why the banking industry is going to have a different kind of supervision in the future and why they are going to accept some genuine form of protection to depositors or go out of business as private institutions.

Is it difficult to understand why the faith and confidence of the public has been destroyed?

Part II.—The United States Deposit Insurance Corporation—Based on insurance principles, mortality records, and premium rates adjusted to risk hazards, and all costs and losses payable from premium income, with mutual provisions for refunds and reductions

FOR IMMEDIATE RESTORATION OF CONFIDENCE AND PREVENTION OF FUTURE BANK CRISES

(1) The organization of a Massachusetts trust or a Federal charter corporation to be known as, let us say, "The United States Deposit Insurance Corporation."

(2) In order to divorce it from politics, it is proposed that the Secretary of the Treasury, the president of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board be ex-officio directors with 9 directors to be selected from among the outstanding men of highest integrity in the United States, 3 from the insurance field, 3 from industry, and 3 from banking.

(3) The capital in the amount of $500,000,000 to be loaned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or the Federal Treasury, repayable with interest in from 5 to 10 years and reinvested in United States Government securities and deposited in trust under such joint control as is desirable.

(It should be remembered that an insurance company operates on premium income. It is the hope and intention of this plan to avoid gouging the United States Treasury of a single dollar.)

FIELD ORGANIZATION

The personnel for the field organization for accepting applications of banks and premium payments is existant by utilizing the present staffs of National and State bank examiners, and the Corporation should have the authority to employ existing insurance organizations in each State as soliciting agents or an outstanding insurance executive in each State equipped with general banking knowledge as supervisory or examining representatives.

SALVAGE OR LIQUIDATION RECOVERY

The records of the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States, covering 66 years from 1865 to 1931, inclusive, show that the recovery in behalf of depositors of closed national banks amounted to 88.4 percent. In other words, the depositors in all failures of national banks suffered a final loss of but 11.6 percent since the first failure of a national bank, in 1865. The average time for liquidation during that period required 14 months.

Exact statistics from all the 48 States of the Union are not available to show the definite salvage or recovery from liquidation of State banks, but the estimate is made that a recovery from this class of banks will probably average 70 percent or better. Illinois reports an average of 80 percent; Massachusetts, 84 percent; New York, 92 percent; Colorado, 70 percent; Michigan, 68 percent; Virginia, 76 percent. Ohio reports a recovery of 78 percent for a 10-year period, with varying figures from other scattered States. Instances of reduced recovery point to hurried liquidation as the cause. This is proven from the records of reorganized banks where more extended time permitted for liquidation resulted in recoveries of from 90 to 100 percent.

Mortality of banks of the United States

Years	Period of time (years)	Total failures	Average per year	Total deposits	Average annual loss after salvage
1865 to 1932	67	11,761	175	$4,347,956,000	$19,468,415
1900 to 1932	33	10,110	306	3,991,626,000	36,287,509
1921 to 1932	12	8,753	729	3,564,986,000	89,124,650
1929 to 1932	4	5,729	1,432	3,520,000,000	264,000,000

Accepting a figure of 70 percent as being the average recovery from closed banks we find that during the entire period from 1865 to 1932, there were 11,761 failures with an annual average loss to depositors of $19,468,415. Applying this salvage average to the post-war period from 1921 to 1932, inclusive, the period of heaviest mortality of banks in our entire banking history, we find the total failures to be 8,753, involving deposits of 3½ billion dollars and liquidated at an indicated annual net loss of $89,124,650.

Inasmuch as the 12-year period from 1921 to 1932, inclusive, embraces three bank panic periods—1924, 1926–27, and 1930 to 1932, that span of years presents maximums upon which to base mortality expectancy of sufficiently high losses to predicate rates for premium income amply fortifying the corporation to meet its obligations.

As the plan contemplates a definite insurance contract, the corporation is entitled to subrogation in the event it is called upon to pay losses of any bank whose deposits are so insured, and from the outset the corporation should be organized to handle and make effective this right.

PREMIUM RATES

The rates now prevailing in the United States as charged by surety and indemnity companies for the bonding and insuring of public and individual deposits, vary from $10 to $20 per $1,000 of deposits, depending upon the risk condition as determined in each case by the surety company. In other words, the prevailing rate ranges from 1 to 2 percent of the deposit.

The State of Wisconsin has recently enacted a State public deposit law, whereby a charge is made on the deposits of each bank at the rate of 1 percent, thereby creating a prospective fund for guaranteeing all public deposits.

A rate of 1 percent is not considered exorbitant inasmuch as it would correspond to the cost which most banks would gladly pay for the solicitation of new business. Under wide-spread conditions of public hoarding or hiding of money, the costs of a national or Government plan of insuring deposits would mean the development of new business for the banks of the country in recovering hidden money in addition to restoring confidence in banks and reestablishing the prestige and integrity of banks in the minds of the public. Furthermore, there are various proper ways in which the cost of deposit insurance could be passed on to the public through nominal charges that it is believed will be readily acceptable to the public for protection after the recent hectic period of worry and losses.

Bank suspensions 1921–31, inclusive, by size of capital stock

Capital stock of—	Number of suspensions	Percent of total number sus pensions
$25,000 and less	4,861	59.2
$25,001 to $49,000	737	9.0
$50,000 to $99,000	1,438	17.5
$100,000 to $199,000	677	8.2
$200,000 to $999,000	336	4.1
$1,000,000 and over	37	.4
Not available	135	1.6

In arriving at a schedule of premium rates for banks we find that the hazard varies in relation to the size of the banks. For instance, for the period of 1921 to 1931, inclusive, 85.7 percent of bank failures occurred among banks having less than $100,000 capital; 12.3 percent of failures occurred in banks having from $100,000 to $1,000,000 capital; and only 0.4 percent of the failures occurred in banks having $1,000,000 capital and over. It is interesting to note that 59 percent of failures occurred in banks having capital of $25,000 or less. Of the total failures during 1931, 55 percent, or 1,773, were not members of the Federal Reserve System; 18 percent of the total were national banks; and 4 percent were State banks of the Federal Reserve. Since 1865 the total bank failures in the United States numbered 11,761, practically 70 percent of which occurred in the 7 years from 1925 to 1932 and nearly 50 percent in the 4 years 1929 to 1932, inclusive.

By reason of the close relationship of capital to deposits we have classified all banks into three groups of clearly defined hazard probabilities. Class A banks comprise banks having 25 million and upward of deposits and, for purposes of demonstration and example, we have applied to them a premium rate of one half of 1 percent on total deposits. The class B banks consist of those having deposits ranging from 1 million to 25 million and to them a rate of three quarters of 1 percent is applied. The class C banks embrace all those having $1,000,000 and less of deposits and, for the reason that records show 85.7 percent of all failures in this field, a rate of 1 percent of deposits is calculated.

Classification of banks for basing premium rates

[From data supplied by Bankers Directory Blue Book of January 1933 with ratios approximated]

Deposit range	Number of banks	Total deposits	Class and premium rate
Less than $250,000	8,018	$1,403,150,000	Class C rate 1 percent on deposits.
$250,000 to $500,000	3,347	1,255,125,000

$25,000,000 to $90,000,000	202	9,090,000,000	Class A rate one half of 1 percent.
$90,000,000 and over	50	12,415,016,000
Total	18,009	45,568,791,000

Premium income

NO. 1 RATE

Class A group, at 0.5 percent	$107,525,080
Class B group, at 0.75 percent	146,110,000
Class C group, at 1 percent	45,817,750
Total income	299,452,830

NO. 2 RATE

Class A group, at 0.25 percent	53,762,540
Class B group, at 0.5 percent	97,410,000
Class C group, at 0.75 percent	34,363,313
Total income	185,535,853

ANNUAL PREMIUM INCOME

On the basis of this grouping and classification, and at the rates stated, applied to total Nation-wide deposits of $45,568,791,000, the corporation would receive a gross annual premium income of $299,452,830.

This total premium income is considered more than ample to meet any probable insurance obligations. It is more than 2⅓ times the average annual net losses experienced during the high bank-mortality period from 1921 to 1932, inclusive.

The rates above-quoted could be reduced one fourth of 1 per cent for each class of banks, making the highest rate three fourths of 1 percent and the lowest rate one fourth of 1 percent, and give a gross premium income of $185,535,853 annually, more than twice the annual loss figure used.

In considering rates and income we should not lose the thought that this entire plan is not to pay losses but to prevent bank failures. The greatest value of an insurance plan is its psychological effect on the public. It will prevent bank runs—the greatest cause of bank suspensions.

OPERATING ANALYSIS

For the purpose of clearly proving the sufficiency of rates, and to demonstrate the financial strength which this corporation could develop under sound business methods and economy of operation, an analysis of "Income and Disbursements" is presented and carried through a period of 5 years.

By the investment of the capital and premium income, less assumed payment of normal losses of 89 million and administration expense of 10 million, together with interest payment on the capital loan, the corporation ends the first year with a surplus of 164 million.

At the close of the second year after payment of losses, expenses, and interest, together with a capital loan payment of 50 million, the corporation has a surplus of 175 million.

Continuing the analysis to the end of a 5-year period on the same schedule of rates and the same expenditure of losses and expenses, and with a final payment in full of the Government capital loan, we find the corporation with an earned reinsurance reserve of $149,726,415, a surplus of $398,456,655 and the accumulation of its own capital of $500,000,000 or a total financial strength in resources of $1,048,182,000, at the close of its fifth year.

Bear in mind that no calculation of increase in premium income has been taken into account in this analysis which will certainly take place by reason of (1) new banks being opened to supply banking facilities to over 4,000 towns and cities which today have no banks, and (2) the increase in deposits from the 45 billion used in this analysis to the normal amount of 55 to 60 billion which should be reached with the restoration of confidence in banks.

A mutual provision shall be incorporated in the charter of the corporation providing for refunds back to the banks, when conditions prove that the increasing surplus and reserves are accumulating to unnecessary volume. Rates may also be reduced. Banks must thereupon reduce charges to depositors.

The premiums stipulated will work no hardship on banks. A charge of $1 per year, payable semiannually, by all savings depositors and a charge of from 50 cents to $1 on balances of demand deposits will pay the premium. At the present time there is a resolution before the Senate Banking Committee to prohibit the payment of interest on demand deposits which cost reserve member banks alone $215,000,000 in 1932 and $350,000,000 in 1929. Right there is a saving of the entire national premium income.

POWERS OF THE CORPORATION

The corporation shall have the right to issue its insurance or indemnity policy to all banks in the United States now open by authority of the National and State banking authorities.

It shall have the right of examination of banks with authority to supervise banking practices and methods with the right to withdraw its insurance upon reasonable notice to the public of its decision so to do.

It shall have the authority to investigate all new applications for bank charters and have the option of accepting or rejecting the deposit insurance thereon on the grounds of the incompetency, reputation, or inexperience of those seeking to open the bank or upon the question of necessity for the bank in the community.

In event of any bank becoming distressed the corporation shall be immediately notified and it shall have the right and option to (1) loan funds to the bank to tide it over its embarrassment, or (2) to become temporary conservator of the bank until its solvency is reestablished, and (3) to assume charge of the liquidation of the bank for the recovery of the maximum proceeds from its assets for reimbursement of the corporation's payment of depositors.

Subrogation of all rights under the double liability imposed upon bank stockholders by law shall be vested in the corporation. This provision disposes of the objection often presented that deposit guarantees or insurance will place a premium on loose banking. There would be no removal of the double liability on all stockholders of a bank.

There, in brief, gentlemen, is a concrete program for the protection of American bank depositors—sound in insurance principles, practical in its purpose, efficient in operation, mutually beneficial to bank and depositors, and the most powerful agency for the restoration of confidence yet devised in the devastating crisis confronting us.

Let no one say it can't be done—for it can; let no one say, we have tried it—we haven't. Opponents will refer to six States who rushed into "guaranty plans" during the money panic of 1907. I was born and raised in the State which had the saddest experience of all of them—Nebraska. I know why the ill-advised scheme failed there. The State threw the guarantee blanket over all banks, good or bad, sound or unsound. The system was inherently weak, based on a wide-open guaranty fund, not administered by banks themselves but by transitory political appointees. All bars and restrictions of safety were let down. The capital necessary to start a bank was reduced to only $5,000. Everybody went into the banking business. Wildcat banks appeared like mushrooms. Liability was taken off of officials, banks were looted, and the State left to hold the sack.

But, regardless of the very obvious reasons why these State attempts failed, their failures only prove the underlying, fundamental principle of insurance, which is, that there must be wide diversification and distribution of the risks. Under a national program the conditions prevailing in one State causing bank failures would not affect those in the other 30, 40, or 47 States.

As against the wildcat schemes launched in Western States, I submit the experience of the State of New York. The Empire State years ago created by law a safety fund and during 12 years of its operation not a dollar was lost to any bank depositor in New York State. Political and financial forces caused its repeal because of its restrictions.

NOW IS THE TIME

Never were conditions so perfect and appropriate as now for the successful inauguration of this vitally needed reform. Eight weeks ago the President closed every bank in the United States. During the week they were closed the wheat was separated from the chaff, the sound from the unsound. It can be positively stated that every bank open today is absolutely safe and sound provided withdrawals of deposits are stopped.

The proposed corporation is now in position to place its indemnity on preferred risks. What a wonderful opportunity from an insurance man's viewpoint. That fact in itself guarantees the safety and success of this proposal.

But in the very near future new banks will be opened to supply the needs of 4,000 towns and cities which have no banks today. Who will start them? What restrictions have we under present laws to make sure they are opened by honest, competent, and experienced bankers? This proposed corporation furnishes the only restrictive features to insure these new banks being launched under sound conditions and by safe men.

This plan and proposed reform applies to 49,000,000 people, who are the backbone of this Nation and who normally have $56,000,000,000 of deposits. But it means more than protecting depositors of a bank.

Postal Savings deposits in the United States

[In millions of dollars]

	1929	1930	1931	1932	1933
January	154	165	278	666	943
March	155	170	303	705	1,006
May	154	171	325	743	1,125
July	158	181	373	829	----------
September	160	190	470	857	----------
December	164	245	605	900	----------

NOTE.—Feb. 28, 1933, $1,005,572,000. May 1, 1933, $1,125,000,000.

This tremendous accumulating deposit is not aiding commerce and trade. It is not building bank credit—but it proves where confidence still reposes.

It means protecting the national industrial life, stabilizing of business, of commodity values, of employment and wages; it means the revival and stabilization of the business of merchants, manufacturers, railroads, utilities, professional men, the farmers, and every line of human endeavor. It even means the stabilizing of the income of the National Government.

The two largest banks that ever failed in the United States—banks holding over $600,000,000 of deposits.

If you want to see what it will do—go to Detroit right now. Remember, two huge banks closed their doors there 10 weeks ago.

The United States Government through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation went to their rescue. They opened up one bank to take over the two failed banks. With Uncle Sam behind it the deposits rolled into the bank at the rate of 10 and 12 million dollars per day. And exactly 30 days after opening they offered back $175,000,000 to depositors. "Come and get your money" was the order.

Listen over the shoulder of newsboys, cab drivers, hotel clerk, merchant or business man in Detroit and everywhere you hear—"banks are all right; it all depends who is behind them."

Look at the rapidly climbing figures of Postal Savings deposits—from $150,000,000 in 1929 to $1,125,000,000 in May 1933. The people's faith in Uncle Sam. The one and only institution in which the public has not lost its confidence is the United States Government. But these millions are not benefiting business and industry.

In spite of all the logic and fundamental justice supporting the depositors' claim for protection; in spite of the vital need and crying urgency for this reform; in spite of its dominating importance as a remedy for present economic ills—it will not be won without a fight. The people must make a vigorous united demand for it.

The Glass banking bill now before the Senate of the United States carries a provision for insurance of bank deposits but postpones its operation until July 1934.

What does this mean? If such legislation is worthy of consideration and passage why not have it now? Isn't the economic patient sick enough now, or shall we wait until death appears, to give the medicine?

Postponement for a year means the death of the reform. It must be remembered that it was the united effort of the bankers of the country which defeated such a reform in 1908 and again in 1913. Remember also that a deposit guaranty was written into the first Federal Reserve Act. Through bitter opposition of the American Bankers Association and individual bankers, it was taken out, after solemn and sacred promises of cleaning their own house and correcting their practices.

At a convention of the American Bankers Association in Denver in 1908, resolutions were adopted opposing any plan of mutual guaranty of deposits by State or Nation. Some of the reasons were:

"It is a function outside of State or National Government."

But according to these same bankers it is a proper function of government to come to the rescue of banks with millions from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Just why should not the Government come to the assistance of depositors?

"It is impracticable and misleading."

Isn't it somewhat impracticable and misleading to take the depositor's money with the assurance it will be protected, and then mail him a slip from the banking examiners that the bank is closed and his deposits lost?

The resolution concludes with a statement which would be humorous if conditions were not so tragic:

"It discredits honesty, ability, and conservatism."

What banker in this year 1933 will repeat that statement?

The truth is that the one and big reason the banking fraternity opposes this reform so bitterly is that it will impose a more strict supervision on the handling of public money and bring more frequent visitations from the insurance inspector.

The wreckage in the banking field of the past few years is sufficient proof of the urgent necessity of such supervision.

There are two outstanding faults in the Glass bill plan. First, it erroneously assumes that the small depositor is to blame for the hidden money of the country, and the plan provides that the smaller deposits shall be fully insured but that larger deposits shall carry 50 and 75 percent coverage by insurance. In reality this is asking the larger depositors to gamble 25 to 50 percent on bank stability. A partial insurance in this instance is worse than none. It will not register with the American public. Why should the depositor be subjected to any gamble or hazard when he deposits his money for safe-keeping?

Secondly, the bill intends to extend the insurance protection only to Federal Reserve banks. The moment it is put in operation it will kill every nonmember bank in the United States. During the year of delay it is proposed to use this club to force all banks into the Federal Reserve System.

I hold no brief for or against the Federal Reserve System, but I do submit that when our economic ship is battling the storm, it is ruthless to club into submission those seeking aid in the lifeboat. Possibly we should have one centralized banking system, but unquestionably State banks and nonmember banks have their good reasons why they have not joined the Federal Reserve System. Let that question be settled by discussion and negotiation and not by strong-arm methods.

The bigger problem is to conquer the depression by the restoration of confidence.

Let us consider the human aspect of this question—not banking factions. Look at the stark tragedy of the past months and then think of the simple problem that confronts this Nation.

Fifty million depositors, controlling the lifeblood of the Nation, ask the assurance that when they put money in an American bank they can get it when they need it. And they will never call for it as long as they feel the bank is safe.

They will never ask for the cash while their checks are honored. Get that.

When we can put a sign on the front of every bank in America telling the public—

The deposits of this bank insured by the United States Deposit Insurance Corporation
(Backed by the United States Government)

then across the sky of America will appear a new rainbow of hope flashing the golden words, "Confidence restored—prosperity has returned."

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that two committee amendments were passed over by unanimous consent. The clerk will state the first committee amendment passed over.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first committee amendment passed over is on page 53, where it is proposed to strike out lines 1 to 25, both inclusive, and on page 54, lines 1 and 2, as follows:

SEC. 6. Whenever it shall appear to the President in respect of any contract entered into by the United States prior to the date of enactment of this act for the transportation of persons and/or things, that the full performance of such contract is not required in the public interest, and that modification or cancelation of such contract will result in substantial savings to the United States, the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, on or before April 30, 1935, to modify or cancel such contract. Whenever the President shall modify or cancel any such contract, he shall determine just compensation therefor; and if the amount thereof, so determined by the President, is unsatisfactory to the individual, firm, or corporation entitled to receive the same, such individual, firm, or corporation shall be entitled to receive such portion thereof as the President shall determine and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said portion so received, will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by paragraph 20 of section 41 and section 250 of title 28 of the United States Code: Provided, That where any such contract makes provision for settlement in the event of modification or cancelation, the amount of just compensation as determined hereunder shall not exceed such amount as is authorized by said contract. Any appropriation out of which payments upon the said contract were authorized to be made is hereby made available for the payment of such just compensation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this provision was inserted in the bill at the request of the President. It gives him power to modify or cancel what are known as the airways and ocean mail contracts. I think he ought to have the power. When the question came up for a vote in the Committee on Appropriations, as I remember it, the committee voted 8 to 7 to strike out the provision. I hope the amendment will be rejected. I quote the provision.

SEC. 6. Whenever it shall appear to the President, in respect of any contract entered into by the United States prior to the date of enactment of this act for the transportation of persons and/or things, that the full performance of such contract is not required in the public interest, and that modification or cancelation of such contract will result in substantial savings to the United States, the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, on or before April 30, 1935, to modify or cancel such contract. Whenever the President shall modify or cancel any such contract, he shall determine just compensation therefor; and if the amount thereof, so determined by the President, is unsatisfactory to the individual, firm, or corporation entitled to receive the same, such individual, firm, or corporation shall be entitled to receive such portion thereof as the President shall determine and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said portion so received, will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by paragraph 20 of section 41 and section 250 of title 28 of the United States Code: Provided, That where any such contract makes provision for settlement in the event of modification or cancelation, the amount of just compensation as determined hereunder shall not exceed such amount as is authorized by said contract. Any appropriation out of which payments upon the said contract were authorized to be made is hereby made available for the payment of such just compensation.

Mr. President, we have reduced and are reducing tremendously the number and the salaries and the wages of employees; we have reduced the salaries of Congressmen and Senators and all other officials of the Government. We have inordinately reduced, and I believe too greatly reduced, the compensation of our ex-service men, many of whom are in dire want and distress; we have cut off appropriations all along the line; but, Mr. President, these enormous subsidies given to the shipping companies and the aircraft companies are left almost intact. We have made little reduction here. We must reduce these subsidies. Think of giving favored companies, like the aircraft companies and the shipping companies, many of them owned by large banking companies like the Chase National Bank and the National City Bank of New York which directly or indirectly receive a large part of these subsidies, the amounts aggregated between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000. We ought to have cut off all these subsidies before we reduced the compensation of our ex-service men a solitary cent. We ought to have cut off all these subsidies before we reduced the salaries of any of our employees a cent. Subsidies are wrong in principle and constitute a wicked perversion of Government. We have no right to take money from one class of our citizens and give the same to a wealthier class. We must give this right to our President to cut down these subsidies, and we ought to repeal all subsidy laws at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, we have at the present time a special committee giving consideration to the matter of the mail contracts. They are carrying on an extensive investigation. Undoubtedly as a result of their work there will be recommendations made to Congress.

In the next place the Postmaster General and the Shipping Board are now engaged in a study of the contracts in existence. Of necessity, if there are any fraudulent arrangements, the contracts will be canceled without any special authority of law. Likewise, there is a certain degree of elasticity in the contracts so that the amount of money spent can be controlled.

Further, in the Committee on Appropriations section 6 was stricken from the bill by a vote of 9 to 7. Immediately after that I discussed the matter with the President. Further, I saw the President 2 or 3 days ago to see if he was of the same mind. I wish to say to my colleagues that I am authorized by the President to say he does not desire the power which was given by this section and prefers to have it stricken from the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have not talked with the President about it, but this was sent down as an administration measure. The authority was asked for. The House granted it. In the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate the vote was exceedingly close. It seems to me that the President ought to be given the power. He or those under him will certainly exercise it. We all know about these contracts. They have been discussed time and again. There is no reason why the President should not have the power that is authorized in section 6, and I hope the amendment will be voted down and the authority granted to the President to remedy this frightful travesty on justice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COPELAND. What is the form of the question, so we may know how to vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment. A vote "yea" would be to strike out the section and a vote "nay" would be to retain it. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. LOGAN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. AUSTIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is necessarily absent from the Senate at this moment. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "nay." I have already voted "yea." I find that I can transfer my pair to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. I do so, and will let my vote stand.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas (after having voted in the negative). On this question I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], which I transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. PATTERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. I understand that he has not voted. Therefore I transfer my pair with him to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. McKELLAR (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate in attendance on committee meetings:

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS].

I also desire to announce that the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] with the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]; and

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN].

I am not informed how these Senators, if present, would vote.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—28

Austin	Erickson	Kean	Robinson, Ind.
Borah	Fess	Keyes	Thomas, Utah
Capper	Hale	Lonergan	Thompson
Carey	Hastings	McCarran	Vandenberg
Coolidge	Hatfield	McNary	Van Nuys
Copeland	Hebert	Nye	Walcott

Clark	Gore	Reed
Costigan	Harrison	Reynolds

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BLACK. I have an amendment which in my judgment would be germane to the bill as it now is, but would not have been germane if the committee amendment had been adopted. I desire to know what would be the appropriate time to offer that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Chair understands, the Senate has agreed to consider the committee amendments first. After that, any Senator who secures recognition may offer whatever amendments he wishes to the bill.

Mr. BLACK. I was asking in order to ascertain if the fact that I did not offer this amendment until the Senate had voted upon the committee amendment would affect my right to move to amend the bill as it stands at present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That section will be open to amendment after the Senate concludes the consideration of committee amendments. The clerk will state the next committee amendment passed over.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment passed over is on page 55, where the committee proposes to strike out lines 17 to 19, inclusive, and to insert:

(b) Reductions of personnel shall be made with regard both to efficiency and to apportionment of appointments by States as now provided by law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I understand that the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] desires to discuss his amendment. I wish to offer an amendment to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair call attention to the fact that the Senator from Alabama has offered an amendment to the committee amendment, which would be the pending question. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to the committee amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 55, line 22, after the word "law", it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by inserting the following:

But when new appointments are made hereafter under Civil Service regulations, and there are persons on the eligible list who are residents of States which at the time are below the quota of Civil Service appointments allotted such States by law, preference in selection and appointment shall be given to those eligible persons who are residents of the State containing the least percentage of its Civil Service quota.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama whether he will modify his amendment by striking out the last line and changing the wording, so that it would read—

Preference in selection and appointment shall be given to those eligible persons who are residents of States having less than their Civil Service quota—instead of the language of the amendment as it is now, providing that preference shall be given to residents of the State containing the least percentage of its Civil Service quota. The only difference is that the language suggested would give the personnel officer of a department a little greater discretion. He would have to give preference to eligibles from States having less than their quota, but would not be confined to the State having the least percentage, as the Senator's amendment provides.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from South Carolina if he believes that under that suggestion of his the Civil Service Commission would be compelled to give a preference to those States which are below their quota?

Mr. BYRNES. I have no doubt about that. The same requirement that is provided in the Senator's amendment would be made; but instead of appointments being confined to the State having the least percentage of its quota, the modified amendment would authorize the personnel officers to make appointments in such a way as to give preference to States with less than their quota. I think the Senator will agree that his language would require the appointments to be made from the State having the least percentage of its quota.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I may state that I called up the Civil Service Commission and asked one in authority, not officially, if my amendment would require the preference stated, and I was told that it would absolutely require it. I do not want to agree to any modification which would leave the Civil Service Commission with the discretion to appoint from States already having their quota.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator, and the language of his amendment would remain, that preference and selection in appointment shall be given to those eligible persons who are residents of States having less than their quotas.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, as I understand, the only difference is that the Senator from Alabama would compel the Civil Service Commission to make the selection from the State being furtherest below its quota, while the modification suggested by the Senator from South Carolina is that they may select from any State that is below its quota.

Mr. BYRNES. That is a correct statement.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct. If the Senator will accept the amendment, and it is satisfactory to the committee in that form——

Mr. BYRNES. It is certainly satisfactory to me.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to state that what I wanted to avoid was the continual employing of people from States which already have their quota, to the disadvantage of States which do not have their quota. I shall be willing to modify my amendment to that extent.

Mr. BYRNES. I have no objection to the amendment as modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama modifies his amendment, and the clerk will report the modified amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. As modified, the amendment is as follows:

But when new appointments are made hereafter under Civil Service regulations, and there are persons on the eligible list who are residents of States which at the time are below the quota of Civil Service appointments allotted such States by law, preference in selection and appointment shall be given to those eligible persons who are residents of States having less than their Civil Service quota.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I would like to propound a question to the Senator from South Carolina, as well as the Senator from Alabama, whether they have looked into the possibility that persons on the eligible list from States which might be below their quota might not wish to be transferred to Washington at low salaries, whether that feature has been looked into?

Mr. BYRNES. Suppose a list of three eligibles is forwarded to the personnel officials, and one of the eligibles is from a State over quota and two are from a State below quota. One of those from the State below quota would have to be selected. If in the case cited by the Senator from Ohio a person on the eligible list did not desire to be appointed, and made known that desire, of course he would not be called.

Mr. FESS. That relieves it. I was under the impression that we might very greatly embarrass the departments here by requiring them, under the law, to bring someone from a distant point who might not want to come.

Mr. BYRNES. It would not have that effect.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, the Civil Service Commission, under date of April 1 of this year, prepared figures showing the condition of the apportionments, which I think ought to be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent that the table may be printed in connection with this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Figures based on United States Civil Service Commission's report on condition of the apportionment Apr. 1, 1933

States	Entitled to—	Received	In excess appointments
Quotas in excess:
District of Columbia	132	10,778	10,644
Virginia	659	2,273	1,614
Maryland	444	2,112	1,668
Iowa	672	745	73
Vermont	98	125	27
Quotas entirely filled:
Delaware	74	74
New Hampshire	145	145

PAST HISTORY LEADING UP TO PRESENT CONDITIONS

In the 9 years from 1919 to 1928, when employees were being dropped from the Civil Service roll, the States lost 21,496, while the District of Columbia, Maryland, and Virginia (already having an excess of 10,440) added an additional 6,975, making an excess of 17,515 in apportionment in 1928.

	District of Columbia	Maryland	Virginia	Total	All other States
On roll in 1928	12,620	2,318	2,477	17,415	18,226
On roll in 1919	7,823	1,978	2,029	11,830	39,722
District of Columbia, Maryland, and Virginia gained				5,585	[1] 21,496

[1] Lost.

It is earnestly requested that in the event of the proposed furloughs or dismissals that the States' quotas be taken into consideration, as it would manifestly be unjust to reduce, furlough, or dismiss employees whose States have been deprived of their rightful representation, while whole families, from 3 to 9, are kept on the Federal pay roll. Many were blanketed in without having to take any examination.

Every employee should be required to reply to the enclosed questionnaire in order that Members of Congress may learn how many persons in one family (and their salaries) are actually employed.

By the furlough of employees in all cases where two or more persons in one family are employed where one of them is earning $2,500 per annum, together with optional retirement after 25 or 30 years of service, there would be no necessity of any other furlough or cut in Government salaries.

The present efficiency rating system should be abolished, as it is unfair to employees and disrupts the service. The old system should be restored, i.e.:

Elements	Averages
Initiative	Below 70, poor.
Adaptability	From 70 to 80, fair.
Quality	From 80 to 90, good.
Quantity	From 90 to 100, excellent.
Punctuality.
Neatness.

Employees were rated by their immediate chief who was responsible and not able to shift the blame on someone else entirely unfamiliar with the work of the employee whom he rates as is done under the present system.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, by direction of the committee I ask consideration of an amendment which is on the desk, to be inserted on page 61, after line 6.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 61, after line 6, the Senator from South Carolina proposes to insert the following:

SEC. 15. (a) There shall be in the Department of Justice an Assistant Solicitor General to assist the Solicitor General in the performance of his duties, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Said Assistant Solicitor General shall be allocated to the same classification grade and be paid the same rate of compensation as apply to Assistant Attorneys General and shall perform such additional duties as may be required of him by the Attorney General. (b) One of the existing positions of Assistant Attorney General is hereby abolished.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, in explanation of the amendment, I may say that one of the positions as Assistant Attorney General is abolished. A position is created for the appointment of someone as Assistant to the Solicitor General. The result of the transfer will be a saving of a thousand dollars a year, the salary of the Assistant to the Solicitor General being fixed at $8,000, instead of the $9,000 salary now paid to an Assistant Attorney General. In the reorganization of the Department the Attorney General requested that this amendment be submitted; and, by direction of the committee, I offer it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I offer another amendment, on page 48, after line 24.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 48, after line 24, the Senator from South Carolina proposes to insert the following:

That the Attorney General of the United States is hereby authorized to agree to a judgment to be rendered by the presiding judge of the United States court having jurisdiction of the case, pursuant to compromise approved by the Attorney General upon the recommendation of the United States attorney charged with the defense, upon such terms and for such sums within the amount claimed to be payable, in any suit pending on March 20, 1933, and on the date of the enactment of this act, brought under the provisions of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, on a contract of yearly renewable term insurance, and the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to make payments in accordance with any such judgment: Provided, That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of disbursing officers of the Veterans' Administration for all payments of insurance made in accordance with any such judgment: Provided further, That all such judgment shall constitute final settlement of the claim and no appeal therefrom shall be authorized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I offer another amendment, on page 49, after line 19.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from South Carolina proposes an amendment, on page 49, after line 19, to insert the following:

The unexpended balance of the appropriation "Fourteenth Annual Convention of French Veterans of the World War, Washington, D.C., 1933" is hereby made available for reimbursement to the Veterans' Administration for all expenses (including transportation to bona fide residence) incurred in connection with indigent veterans in attendance at the convention of the rank and file organization of World War veterans held in Washington, D.C., during the month of May 1933, and the decision of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in connection with such expenditures shall be final and conclusive.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, by direction of the committee, I submit one more amendment, on page 61, to add a new section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 61, after line 6, the Senator from South Carolina proposes to insert the following:

SEC. 16. That section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 28, 1928, entitled "An act to amend the salary rates contained in the compensation schedules of the act of March 4, 1923, entitled 'An act to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services'", as amended by the act of July 3, 1930, be further amended by adding thereto the following: "Provided, That in all cases where, since December 6, 1924, in such adjustment the position occupied by an employee has been or shall be allocated to a grade with a maximum salary below the salary received by the incumbent, the rate of pay fixed for such position prior to such allocation may be continued so long as the position is held by the incumbent occupying it at the time of such allocation."

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, it seems to me we ought to have a little explanation of some of these amendments proposing new legislation.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I have offered the amendment by direction of the committee. If the Senator from Ohio wishes to have a statement as to its purpose, I would request the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], who offered the amendment in the committee, to explain the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this amendment was passed as a bill before the 4th of March.

Mr. FESS. What does it do?

Mr. COPELAND. There are 116 employees in the Customs Service in the field who were given the same pay intended by the act to be given to those who are employed here in the District of Columbia. They were paid for several months, and then the Comptroller General ruled that those in the field must be treated in a way different from the way those in the District are treated, and he made a demand upon the employees to return the money, and this is to rectify that injustice.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, what I had in mind was that there has been considerable agitation about abolishing certain customs offices, and I was not sure whether this amendment had to do with that matter.

Mr. COPELAND. In connection with this amendment I should like to have printed in the RECORD a letter I have received regarding this matter.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 24, 1933.

Hon. ERNEST W. GIBSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: On March 4, 1923, an act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services" was signed by the President. In accordance with the terms of that act and its amendments a Personnel Classification Board was set up which classified civilian positions in the District of Columbia.

After the positions in the District of Columbia had been graded it was found that there were many employees drawing salaries at rates in excess of the top salaries of the grades to which such employees had been allocated. In order to assure these employees that their salaries would not be reduced, an amendment to the Classification Act of March 4, 1923, was adopted on July 3, 1930, by adding to section 4 the following:

"* * * Provided further, That in all cases wehre the Board shall change the allocation of a position to a lower grade the rate of pay fixed for such position prior to such change may be continued so long as the position is held by the incumbent then occupying it."

A further amendment to the Classification Act approved May 28, 1928, directed that the compensation of civilian positions in the field be adjusted to correspond so far as may be practicable to the rates established in the departmental service in the District of Columbia. Such adjustments were made in the customs field service. The adjustments resulted, as they did in the District of Columbia, in certain employees being allocated to grades in which the pay they were receiving was in excess of the maximum pay of the grades to which these employees were assigned. The Treasury Department believing that it was justified by the amendment to section 4 made in the act of Congress approved July 3, 1930, continued to pay these men in the field service at the rates of pay they were receiving at the time their positions were adjusted.

Recently the Comptroller General ruled that the amendment to section 4, above referred to, applied only to positions within the District of Columbia, and not to the field service. In his final decision, A-44245, approved January 6, 1933, he states that he will approve no such excess salary payments in the field service after March 31, 1932. This decision results in treating employees in the field service of the Government in a different way from those employed in the service within the District of Columbia and works an injustice to such employees in the field service. Practically all the employees affected are those drawing small salaries, such as messengers and minor clerks.

To remove this injustice Senator COPELAND has introduced into the Senate a bill (S. 5475), and I understand that a similar bill will be introduced into the House providing for an amendment to section 3 of the act of Congress approved May 28, 1928, which amendment is similar to the amendment to the act of March 4, 1923, as contained in section 4 of the act of July 3, 1930, exempting civilian employees in the District of Columbia from such salary reductions.

I am making this statement so that you will have before you the facts in connection with this bill when it comes up for consideration by your committee.

A copy of the bill, as introduced by Senator COPELAND, is enclosed herewith.

Very truly yours,

PHILIP ELTING, Collector.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 61, after the amendments heretofore agreed to, the Senator from California proposes to insert the following:

SEC. —. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to effect a modification of the contract for the construction of the Long Beach, Calif., post office, so as to afford such relief as he deems to be proper for losses caused the contractor for restoration of damages to the building occasioned by the earthquake of March 10, 1933, and to make such structural and other changes in the building as may be necessary to minimize a recurrence of earthquake damage to the building: Provided, That the present appropriation for the Long Beach project shall be available for the purposes named, and that any additional cost incurred by reason of the above shall not exceed the present limit of cost.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from California that I know that that estimate has been submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, and, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I submit an amendment, and ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Arkansas offers the following amendment: Add a new section at the end of the bill to read as follows:

SEC. 36. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans as hereinafter provided, in an aggregate amount not exceeding $50,000,000 to or for the benefit of drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation districts, and similar districts duly organized under the laws of any State, and to or for the benefit of political subdivisions of States, which prior to the date of enactment of this act have completed projects devoted chiefly to the improvement of lands for agricultural purposes. Such loans shall be made for the purpose of enabling any such district or political subdivision (hereafter referred to as the "borrower") to reduce and refinance its outstanding indebtedness incurred in connection with any such projects, and shall be subject to the same terms and conditions as loans made under section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended; except that (1) the term of any such loan shall not exceed 40 years; (2) each such loan shall be secured by bonds, notes, or other obligations which are a lien on the real property within the project or on the assessments, taxes, or other charges imposed by the borrower pursuant to State law, or by such other collateral as may be acceptable to the Corporation; (3) the borrower shall agree not to issue during the term of the loan any other bonds so secured except with the consent of the Corporation; (4) the borrower shall agree, insofar as it lawfully may, to pay to the Corporation, until all bonds or other obligations of the borrower acquired by the Corporation are retired, an amount equal to the amount by which the assessments, taxes, and other charges collected by the borrower exceed the cost of operation and maintenance of the project and maturities of interest and principal on its outstanding obligations, and (5) the borrower shall agree, to the satisfaction of the Corporation, to reduce, insofar as it lawfully may, the annual taxes, assessments, and other charges imposed by it for or on account of the project by an amount proportional to the reduction in the corresponding annual requirements for principal and interest of its outstanding indebtedness by reason of the operation of this section. No loan shall be made under this section until the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (A) has caused an appraisal to be made of the property securing and/or underlying the outstanding bonds of the applicant, (B) has determined that the project of the applicant is economically sound, and (C) has been satisfied that an agreement has been entered into between the applicant and holders of its outstanding bonds or other obligations under which the applicant will be able to purchase or refund all or a major portion of such bonds or other obligations at a price determined by the Corporation to be reasonable after taking into consideration the average market price of such bonds over the 6 months' period ending March 1, 1933, and under which a substantial reduction will be brought about in the amount of the outstanding indebtedness of the applicant.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator give us a brief explanation of the changes which the amendment proposes to make in existing law?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. President, when this amendment was submitted on the 15th of May a brief statement was made indicating the purposes of the provision. In a general sense, the object is to comply with criticisms of the existing law which the counsel for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which body is charged with the administration of the act, asserts tend to make the provision unworkable or difficult of application. There are 14 textual changes in the language, most of which are of relative unimportance. Perhaps time may be conserved by stating, in a brief way, just what these changes are.

First, in line 3, page 20, of the act the words "or for the benefit of" have been inserted between the words "to" and "drainage." The purpose of this change is to permit refinancing in cases where the districts may not have the necessary statutory authority to enter directly into all desirable arrangements for the carrying out of the refinancing. In such cases the refinancing might be accomplished through trustees or other agents. The benefit of the refinancing will, of course, go to the district in any case.

The second change is in line 5, of page 20, of the pamphlet containing the act referred to, where the words "or for the benefit of" have been inserted between the words "to" and "political"; and the object of that change is the same as that just stated.

In line 7, page 21, the words "refunding bonds" have been replaced in this draft by the words "bonds, notes, or other obligations." In explanation, it may be said that in many cases it may become necessary to acquire outstanding bonds or other obligations of the applicant rather than refunding bonds. No reason suggests itself for restricting the security to refunding bonds when the loan may be just as adequately secured by the bonds originally issued or by other obligations.

The next change is in lines 7 and 8 of page 21, where the following language, "issued to the Corporation by the borrower" is stricken out. To effect the financing it may be necessary in some cases for the Corporation to purchase or make loans on the security of outstanding bonds which will not be issued directly to the Corporation by the borrower.

The fifth change is in lines 9 and 10, page 21, where it is proposed to substitute for the words "or on the amount of the assessments levied on such property", the words "or on the assessments, taxes, or other charges imposed." In explanation of that change, let me say that in some districts the projects are supported by ad valorem taxation or other charges rather than by assessments, and no reason exists for making the distinction which the language of the original act seems to make.

The sixth change is in line 12, page 21, where there is inserted, after the word "any", the word "other." This is to make it clear that the bonds referred to are bonds other than those acquired by the Corporation. This is not a change in the intent of the existing statute.

The seventh modification is as follows: In line 14, page 21, there is to be inserted between the words "shall" and "pay" the words "agree insofar as it lawfully may to." The effect of the provision contained in the act is to require the payment of some of the bonds acquired by the Corporation prior to their maturities in the event the amount collected by the district is more than sufficient to pay the other required annual charges. This may be prohibited by the laws under which some districts are organized, and the words inserted merely constitute a saving clause in situations of this kind.

The next change is in line 15, page 21, where it is proposed to insert for the word "held" the word "acquired." I think the change referred to implies so clearly the effect of the change that I will not discuss that further.

The ninth modification is in lines 16 and 17, page 21, where the words "assessments against the real property within the project" are changed to "assessments, taxes, and other charges collected by the borrower." The reason for this change has already been explained.

Another change is found in line 18, page 21, where there is substituted for the word "interest" the words "maturities of interest and principal", which appears to be an essential change.

In lines 19 to 24, inclusive, there is a proposed change of the words:

The borrower shall agree, to the satisfaction of the Corporation, to reduce the outstanding indebtedness to the borrower of the landowners within such project by an amount corresponding to that by which the indebtedness of the borrower is reduced by reason of the operation of this section, to distribute the amount of such reduction among such landowners on a pro rata basis.

The language to be substituted is as follows:

The borrower shall agree, to the satisfaction of the Corporation, to reduce, insofar as it lawfully may, the annual taxes, assessments, and other charges imposed by it for or on account of the project by an amount proportional to the reduction in the corresponding annual requirements for principal or interest of its outstanding indebtedness by reason of the operation of this section.

The change is patently in the interest of clarity, and also takes care of those instances in which ad valorem taxes or other charges, rather than assessments, are levied.

The last portion of subsection 5, beginning with the words "to cancel", in line 24, page 21, has been stricken. The meaning of the language stricken is not clear; its purpose apparently is to prevent nonassenting bondholders from securing any advantage in the refinancing over assenting bondholders. It is not thought that this is a practicable plan or that any practicable plan can be devised which will deprive the bondholder of the right to receive payment fixed by a contract with the district in a statute under which the bond is issued. This is a substantial and important amendment.

In lines 37 and 38, page 21, after the word "bonds", appearing in each of such lines, there have been inserted the words "or other obligations." This change suggests the reason for the modification of the language.

In line 37, page 21, the word "the" has been stricken, appearing between the words "and" and "holders", and in line 38 there have been inserted between the word "refund" and the word "such" the words "all or a major portion of." The purpose of this is to make clear that the applicant is not required to make arrangements with the holders of 100 percent of its outstanding indebtedness, but only with such number as may result in a substantial reduction in the applicant's indebtedness.

In view of the considerable number of changes in the language, it has been deemed best and most effective to rewrite the entire section. I think I have nothing further to add.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment if that is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada offers an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, may I be permitted to read it and offer it from the floor, as it is short, and I have not prepared it in written form?

After the figure "(2)", in line 10, page 2 of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, I move to insert the following:

To irrigation districts organized under the laws of any State and operating under contract with the United States, to aid in the payment of their operation and maintenance charges, and to provide funds for the installation and operation of necessary works, and to protect the rights of the United States in the project.

May I say in this respect, Mr. President, that this amendment was adopted by the Senate to the farm relief bill as it passed this body, but was omitted when the bill came from conference. It is simply designed to protect the rights of the Federal Government in Federal projects. In some of these projects the locators, the farmers, have been unable, by reason of existing conditions, to raise the money with which to pay their maintenance and operation charges, which charges have to be paid under the rules of the Reclamation Bureau to the Government for the protection of the Government's property. It is just another class of projects that is not included in the amendment.

I move the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am sorry not to be able to accept the amendment of the Senator from Nevada. I feel impelled to observe that his amendment proposes to provide funds for the operation of the districts. This amendment as drafted and as it was adopted in the original act is confined to the refinancing of obligations that already exist, and is intended to lighten the tax burden on the land embraced within the districts, so as to enable them to avail of the refinancing provisions under the farm-mortgage arrangement carried in the Farm Relief Act.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Arkansas fails to grasp the full significance of my amendment. I think he misconstrues its application. All that these project farmers desire to do is just what is set out in the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas and clarified in the Senator's amendment, which would permit them to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on bonds issued by themselves and secured by the property of the project. They do not ask for any relief save and except the privilege of borrowing so that they may pay the charges of maintenance and operation that are imposed against them by the law under which they are operating.

It may be explained a little further that the districts have taken over and relieved the Government of the expense of maintaining the districts, but nevertheless are compelled by contract and by the law to maintain their canals and laterals and their overhead charges. They desire to borrow temporarily for the purpose of paying those expenses back to the Government.

Mr. President, I ask for a roll call on my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas if the proposal here is identical with a proposal that might be made to assist a city in its temporary troubles over taxation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. "Is identical with a proposal that might be made"?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I could not tell whether this proposal is identical with any proposal that has not been made. I do not know how to make a comparison between this proposal and one that might be made.

Mr. COPELAND. The purpose of this is to lighten the present tax burden of drainage districts and irrigation districts by permitting them to borrow pending the receipt of assets which they have in the way of outstanding applications, and so forth.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I will make a further explanation of the amendment. In many areas heavy improvement-district taxes were imposed under local statutes. The districts issued bonds in order to finance their projects. In numerous cases, with the decline that has occurred in the prices of agricultural lands and the fall also in agricultural commodity prices, the present charges have not been met, many of the districts are in default, foreclosures are imminent, and land owners are being deprived of their homes. In numerous cases no refinancing arrangement as to existing farm mortgages may be effected within these areas for the reason that the taxes constitute a first charge on the land, and have either matured or are approaching maturity.

One of the primary objects of the amendment is to place agricultural home owners within these improvement districts in a situation under which they may be able to refinance their mortgages. As already stated, under present conditions they cannot do that. In my conception of it, it is an entirely distinct problem in its fundamental aspects from the financing of obligations or operations of municipalities or other governmental subdivisions. This is essentially a farm-relief measure touching some of the most productive lands in the United States. Without it, the refinancing arrangement to which I have referred respecting farm mortgages cannot be effected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCARRAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2 of the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, line 1, after the word "projects", insert "or projects, a major portion of which has been completed."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, in the general farm-relief bill which passed the Senate there was a provision substantially the same as this, but it was stricken out in conference. My reason for offering the amendment is that there are many drainage projects in the country that may not be entirely completed, but a major portion of which has been completed. These districts have bonded obligations and they are certainly as much in need of some financial assistance as a district that has been entirely completed. They need assistance toward refinancing, toward reducing their indebtedness, in order that the assessment which has been made by the taxpayers up to the present time may not be a total loss. Their position, in my opinion, is equally meritorious as the position of a district that may be said to be completed. If they do not get assistance, looking at it from the question of the value of the land and the contribution to agriculture, the entire project may fail.

I am in hopes we can adopt my amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas so that a district so situated may have access to the privilege of obtaining a loan. I have worded it "a major portion of which has been completed."

My State, so far as reclamation by drainage is concerned, has practically pioneered in that respect. We have some completed districts. We have some that are equally as worthy, and the lands equally as desirable, which are not completed. The people living in those sections have contributed large sums of money to bring the projects up to something like near completion, and a great deal of the land is being used at the present time. The entire project or the entire district is not yet in a finished state. I am in hopes we can make available to those districts the privileges and the benefits that are authorized by the bill for what may be called the completed districts.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it seems to me exactly the same argument that can be used with reference to this matter, which I have no doubt is a very worthy cause, could be made with reference to school districts. We have any number of school districts in this country which are unable to function because of the poverty of the taxpayers. I should like to see the matter given a broader interpretation to include other activities rather than simply a particular class. That is the reason why I ventured to ask the question a moment ago of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] if the same argument would not apply to municipalities.

We had here the other day a petition signed by 97 mayors of cities in the United States calling attention to their inability to collect taxes and the consequent interference with municipal activities such as health, fire, and police departments. There is no doubt that we have, not alone as regards irrigation districts but as regards every other activity of municipal government, the same burden that is brought out by this particular proposal. I have no disposition to oppose the proposal, but my plea is, if we are going to do something for this particular group, for this particular division of Government, that we ought to do it for other divisions of Government. That is the way I feel about it and I dare say other Senators will have the same feeling if they give the matter careful consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I realize there is much force in what has been said by the Senator from New York, but I again call attention to the fact that the object of the pending amendment is so to reform an existing statute as to make it workable in the opinion of those who have to enforce it. No one can state the approximate cost of financing schools and municipalities.

With respect to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], it would open up a new field. The pending amendment and the existing statute limit their application to projects that have been completed. The object is not to promote reclamation but it is to prevent foreclosures through a readjustment of the existing indebtedness which has matured or is about to mature and under which refinancing arrangements cannot be effected.

I am, therefore, unable to accept the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. DILL. I was not in the Chamber all the time the Senator was speaking, but I want to be clear about this matter. This is the provision that is in the farm bill providing for loans to drainage and irrigation districts which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation officials say is unworkable in its present form?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. DILL. And the purpose of this amendment is to correct that language?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is exactly right. I had made that statement before the Senator came in.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Arkansas why it would not be advisable to let this amendment go to the Finance Committee, which is now considering the bill which amends the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, the public works bill? It seems to me to be out of order to put an amendment like this on an appropriation bill, and I am surprised that those in charge of the bill do not raise a question of practice and procedure.

I am not hostile to the purposes of the amendment, but this matter ought to have some mature consideration. I merely wish to know why it would not be much better to let the matter go to the Finance Committee, which today is considering the public works bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have repeatedly explained, by implication, why I cannot concur in the proposal suggested by the Senator from Georgia.

In the first place, this is not a public construction bill, as I have already said. This is a part of the refinancing program that has already been adopted by the Congress. This amendment would not be here except that those who administer the act already in existence find that because of certain language in the law the act is not easily workable.

The original provision was presented by myself and sent to the Committee on Banking and Currency. That provision was studied, and an amendment in the nature of a substitute was reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency, and the provision was incorporated in the farm-mortgage-refinancing part of the bill, which carried three titles and is commonly known as the "Farm Relief Act." The subject has been studied at very great length, and, in all probability, it would be impossible to proceed to a complete revision of the measure during the present session if entirely new legislation should be undertaken. We are approaching, as we hope, the end of the session. I am very much disappointed, in view of the circumstances, that the Senator from Georgia should make the suggestion that he has made.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I have just had a moment to read the amendment hastily, but it seems to me this language was contained in the farm relief bill, or very similar language.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. McNARY. And was passed by the Senate, but went out in conference.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; that is not correct, if the Senator will pardon me. As I have already explained while the Senator was out of the Chamber, this is a provision that was incorporated in the Farm Relief Act; but the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, through its counsel, making a study of the act with a view to giving it application, and having already proceeded as far as it may, reached the conclusion that certain changes in the language are necessary in order to enable the Corporation to do what Congress intended it should do. I think I might say that there is a difference of opinion as to the necessity for these changes; but the argument seemed to me impressive with respect to some of them, and I have gone through every change that this language makes in the existing statute. Many of the changes are mere verbal ones, while others have relationship to the practicability of the methods of refinancing. The amendment does not alter the principle of the measure that passed Congress some weeks ago. It is merely a corrective amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to make a statement.

The public buildings bill, or the industrial recovery bill as it may be called, is before the Finance Committee at this moment. That bill expressly amends the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act in more than one particular; and this amendment would be germane and proper if it were offered to that bill. I know—every Senator here knows—that if matters of this kind are to be tacked on to appropriation bills, we will get into trouble, and a lot of trouble. I shall feel no restraint whatever in voting to suspend the rules of the Senate in order to put anything which seems desirable on an appropriation bill if we are going to permit matters of this character to be injected into an appropriation bill; and I desire to make another statement. I do not know that there are very many members of the Banking and Currency Committee present, but I desire to make it.

The Banking and Currency Committee has not hesitated to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act in any way to serve particular purposes and to grant loans to particular interests, legitimate interests; but they have been strangely deaf and cold to many other worthy suggestions and many other worthy amendments that have been presented to the Banking and Currency Committee. Personally, I should like to have the opportunity to put into some amendment of this kind the authority to grant loans to many other worthy projects and many worthy enterprises not now eligible for loans. It seems to me that if we are to continue to extend the activities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation we have very nearly reached the point where we cannot deny to any citizen who has adequate, ample, satisfactory security, and who will put more people to work, the privilege of going to that Corporation and getting a loan.

I do not want to make a point of order on the amendment, but during this session only those proposals with special friends at court, apparently, at least have received favorable consideration by the committee. I am stating what every Senator here knows who has undertaken to expand the activities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation so as to afford more work for unemployed people. It is always objected that we cannot extend loans to private enterprise, and we are met with the other objection, that we cannot set the precedent of extending loans based wholly or in part upon the power of taxation; yet in this very amendment taxes, or tax levies, may constitute the security that may be offered to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. President, what I want to do, not in hostility to this amendment, is to see whether the Senate and the Congress are to continue to make fish of one and fowl of another, when one of the purposes of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is to give more people work, to put more people into some sort of constructive enterprise. I think that this amendment should not be offered, but those in charge of the bill may well be advised that if it is adopted no Senator will feel the slightest restraint in voting to suspend the rules of the Senate in order to offer anything on an appropriation bill, either this appropriation bill or any other appropriation bill that may be brought in.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Georgia takes a mistaken view of this matter, because in effect this becomes a sort of bankruptcy proposition for these drainage and irrigation districts. It is not a case of loaning them money to go ahead with their work, but it is a kind of bankruptcy proposition whereby they can be put on their feet by loans from the Government, and continue to go forward.

I think it is highly important that the amendment should be adopted as quickly as possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas refers to levee districts. I should like to ascertain from him whether he thinks that its provisions cover a situation like this:

In the execution of the flood-control project on the lower Mississippi River and its tributaries the local authorities—namely, the levee boards—are required to make local contributions in the form of rights of way. They have been doing that; but they have reached the point where they cannot very well finance that obligation any further, and they require aid from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which is about the only place where they can obtain funds with which to go on with this work. In order to furnish those rights of way for the construction of the levees by the Federal Government it is necessary that the levee boards should refinance their present outstanding obligations for those rights of way; and I was wondering whether the Senator from Arkansas would accede to an amendment that would carry out that thought.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, for the very reason that I found myself unable to accept the amendments proposed by the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] and the able Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], I am unable to agree to an arrangement which will expand the purposes of this amendment so as to provide for new construction, or to do anything more than to save from bankruptcy these various districts, and save the farmers owning lands within them the ruin that must follow from the sale of their lands if some such arrangement as this is not made.

I am sorry not to be able to accede to the request of the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, exactly the same thing applies to school districts. There are lots of small school districts in my State which are unable to function because of the inability of the taxpayers to pay their taxes; and those taxpayers likewise are likely to lose their possessions because they cannot pay their taxes.

It seems to me that if we are to do something of this sort, it ought to be made general enough so that every part and section of the country would be benefited by it. This amendment is very restricted in its operation; and $50,000,000, a tremendous sum, is involved in it. I am not disposed to raise the point of order; but I am sure the amendment is subject to a point of order because it is legislation, and, as the Senator from Georgia has suggested, is entirely aside from the purposes of the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have two other amendments to offer. One of them I am offering at the request of the President.

Some weeks ago the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations authorized the report of a resolution making available $48,500 for the expenses of participation by the United States in the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome. There are rigid limitations imposed in the bill on the expense and salary items.

Yesterday there was published on the first page of the RECORD a letter from the President of the United States, addressed to the Vice President, a similar letter having been sent to me, and also, I believe, to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], urging the participation of the United States in the conference, and asking the adoption of this amendment. If it is desired, the letter might be read, but it is available for the study of Senators, and I will not ask that it be read unless some Senator demands it.

I submit the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 50, after line 25, it is proposed to insert the following:

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE

The sum of $48,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the expenses of participation by the United States in the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, Italy, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State in the following manner:

(1) Not to exceed the equivalent in United States currency of 192,000 gold francs for the payment of the quota of the United States for the support of the Institute, including the shares of the Territory of Hawaii, and of the dependencies of the Philippine Islands, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

(2) Not to exceed $5,000 for the salary of a United States member of the Permanent Committee of the International Institute of Agriculture.

(3) Not to exceed $5,500 for rent of living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (46 Stat. 818); compensation of subordinate employees without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended; actual and neccssary traveling expenses; and other contingent expenses incident to the maintenance of an office at Rome, Italy, for a United States member of the Permanent Committee of the International Institute of Agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have one further amendment, which I send to the clerk's desk and ask that it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add at the proper place the following:

The Botanic Garden, together with all records, property, and personnel pertaining thereto, is transferred to the Department of Agriculture, effective the 1st day of the second month following the enactment of this act, and the appropriations for the support thereof are hereby made available to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I simply want to suggest that this is a change of law, is it not?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think it is. Will the Senator withhold his statement for a moment?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Botanic Garden is now under the jurisdiction of the Joint Committee on the Library. It has seemed to a number of citizens who have studied the subject that the present arrangement is rather an inconsistent one, and that the best interests of the service to which the Botanic Garden is devoted may be advanced by transferring it to the Department of Agriculture and consolidating it with other similar activities.

Frankly, I have been prompted to submit this amendment by a distinguished lady, who has given thorough study to the subject and who finds it of great interest and importance. She has submitted a statement, which, I believe, gives the Senate important information. I quote from the statement made by Mrs. Frank Noyes, who for many years was chairman of the committee of the Garden Club of America having subjects similar to that now under discussion in their jurisdiction. I quote from the statement of Mrs. Noyes:

The transfer of the Botanic Garden to the Agriculture Department recommended recently by the Budget is of such outstanding importance that we wish to endorse it for many reasons.

Under the direction of the scientific men in the Agriculture Department already engaged in the importation and propagation of tropical and semitropical trees and shrubs (who for years have had no proper place to display their rare and ever-increasing specimens) this recently constructed conservatory of the Botanic Garden could be maintained at a much lower cost than the present proposed appropriation by Congress for this purpose, as the salaries of these experts are already provided for.

A truly magnificent display of national importance could be produced in time for those seeking such information at the Capital.

As a confirmation of this statement I wish to quote from a recent message received from the eminent scientist, Dr. David Fairchild, now residing in Florida. (He must be familiar to you all as he has been engaged for years in searching the world for material as a member of the Agricultural Department staff.)

"If what is proposed now had taken place 20 years ago we might have built something of national importance out of the then so-called 'Botanic Gardens' and, through its glass houses, introduced in the general house cultured new plants of beauty and importance."

The exhibitions of amaryllis and chrysanthemums which are being held in cramped quarters that may soon be razed could also be displayed on the grounds at the Botanic Garden and thus consolidate all such interests to the public.

It has never seemed to us that these expensive buildings for which an appropriation of $800,000 was recently made, could properly serve their purpose unless some such reformation could be effected. We have been told that much of the present stock is diseased and should be renewed and, of course, the cost of purchasing new material would be almost prohibitive. The maintenance would, of course, be greatly reduced by having stock which is constantly being renewed in the Agriculture Department and which would be available at all times for such purposes.

I submit also a statement by A. F. Woods, director of scientific work, and ask that it be incorporated in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOTANIC GARDENS, CONGRESSIONAL CONSERVATORY

1. The Department of Agriculture maintained for many years a large conservatory of decorative and economic plants similar in nature and purpose to the Botanic Garden Conservatory. This was removed about 1905 to make way for the west wing of the new Agricultural Building. The plants were sent to various botanic gardens that possessed facilities to care for them. Some went to the Botanic Garden here.

It did not seem to us wise to rebuild that type of structure in view of the fact that the Congressional Botanic Garden occupied the field.

Such collections are valuable and useful for educational purposes and they are usual in educational centers, such as Washington. The Shaw Gardens, of St. Louis, the New York Botanic Garden at the Bronx, New York, are good examples of the more extensive efforts of this kind maintained largely by endowments. The horticultural departments of most universities maintain such collections for educational purposes.

In developing the National Arboretum, which has been authorized by Congress, and part of the land for which has already been purchased, there will eventually be need for greenhouse equipment similar to what has been constructed for the Botanic Garden. If these projects are combined now, duplication of effort can be prevented and the new development in both fields can take place in a unified way, both as to administration and planning.

Our plant explorers are bringing in from time to time tropical and subtropical plants that could be cared for and studied in such a place.

The gradual building up of such collections would be more economical than attempting to duplicate the usual type of educational collections and would be in the end probably of more educational and practical value.

In the development of such collections of plants great care has to be taken to see that they are free from dangerous or potentially dangerous insects, pests, and diseases. Only such plants of the present collections could be used as could be freed from such pests.

All new material brought in must be kept in quarantine for a sufficient time to assure freedom from such pests. Our Plant Introduction Service is the only agency now equipped or authorized to do this for plants introduced from foreign countries. While we have made no recommendations in this matter, and it has not come before the Department until Dr. Taylor was called before the House Committee on Appropriations, I may say that it is in line with the general plan to consolidate on a functional basis wherever such consolidation would lead to economy and efficiency.

A. F. WOODS.
Director of Scientific Work.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this amendment was suggested by the Director of the Budget. The statement of Mrs. Noyes which I have read fairly and briefly presents the argument in favor of the amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I doubt whether any Member of this body is more interested in flowers and plants than am I. I give practical evidence of that feeling every day.

The Botanic Garden to be the place where the amaryllis or Easter lilies are to be displayed! Does that appeal to us in these days?

The Botanic Garden has a fundamental scientific purpose to serve. It has been used by the scientific world for more than a hundred years, since 1820. It is a place where botanical specimens are displayed, to assist the teachers and teaching institutions. It is a place where there is given knowledge of the real appearance of the plants and flowers gathered from all parts of the earth, plants which are studied in the schools of America.

More than that, Mr. President, the materia medica, useful to the human family, and to all of the lower animals as well, is founded largely upon the use of medicinal plants. In this institution have been exhibits of such plants, and here it has been possible to find plants which have been used in making many of the remedies which have to do with the healing of the Nation.

Mr. President, I feel so strongly on the matter that I must raise a point of order against this amendment, since it is legislation seeking to do away with a law now in existence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order seems to be well taken, and the Chair holds the amendment not in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York whether he is going to persist in his objection under the rule?

Mr. COPELAND. I understand the Chair has already ruled that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. McNARY. I hope the Senator will withdraw his point of order.

Mr. BARKLEY. I may say to the Senator that if he does withdraw it I will renew it.

Mr. FESS. I also will renew it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk, which I wish to offer.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is my intention, Mr. President, to prepare and introduce for reference to the appropriate committee a bill which will provide for a transfer of the Botanic Garden to the Department of Agriculture, so as to assure that the matter may be disposed of on its merits whenever the Congress is in a position to act on it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment which I have sent forward be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend section 6 by adding the following:

SEC. 4. That after the enactment of this act the Postmaster General is directed to suspend payments upon any air mail or ocean mail contract, to any individuals, companies, or corporations, which singly or in combination with other individuals, companies, or corporations receiving a subsidy, pay any salary or salary combined with bonus, to any officer, agent, or employee in excess of a salary of $17,500. If such individual, companies, or corporations employ any officer, agent, or employee on a part-time basis, such salary, or salary combined with bonus, shall be reduced in proportion to such part-time employment.

Mr. BLACK obtained the floor.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I do not yield for that purpose at the present time; but I have no doubt that the amendment is in order, and I shall explain it now.

I am sure no point of order can be sustained. If there is any question of germaneness raised, it would have to be presented to the Senate for a vote, and for that reason I desire to make a few remarks on the proposed amendment before the Senate might be called upon to vote on it.

I might state that this amendment now offered is taken from a bill reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads a few days ago. I have used the exact language which was reported by the committee.

There is in this bill now—and I am adding this amendment to that particular section—a provision which gives the President the right to cancel these contracts if he desires to do so. Therefore, we have before us, in connection with this matter, the question of the ocean air mail contracts. No one can say that this is not germane to that point.

Mr. President, when I offered the bill originally, which went to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, I provided for a lower limitation on the salaries. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, however, saw fit to raise it to $17,500. That was done largely by reason of the fact that the Senate had adopted, a few weeks ago, a similar limitation of $17,500 as applied to those institutions borrowing money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

I want to give the Senate one example of what is going on with the money of the people of America in connection with the payment of salaries to officers of these companies. I have before me a report of salaries paid to the officers of one steamship company. The steamship company happens to be owned by one man, except that 2 or 3 others own a nominal amount of shares in order to be directors.

In 1928 the grand total drawn by the president of the company for salary, dividends, and personal expenses was $77,480; in 1929 it was $183,936.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. What part was salary and what part was dividends? I ask that question because we do not know how much stock the president of the company held.

Mr. BLACK. He owned all the stock.

Mr. TYDINGS. But we do not know what the investment was and whether the dividend was large or small, or how much of the payment was salary.

Mr. BLACK. I shall be glad to let the Senator from Maryland see the complete report. I will state that this man is really the owner of the business. I have not figured it out, but I think it will be found that he owns about 99.75 percent of the stock.

Mr. TYDINGS. How much was it worth?

Mr. BLACK. I shall be glad to give that figure. The salary of the president——

Mr. TYDINGS. That is it.

Mr. BLACK. I will have to get it for the Senator. I will state, however, that he draws salary from 2 or 3 different subsidiaries of the same company, all of them receiving a subsidy and all of them being supported by the subsidy.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator is going to mention the excessively high salaries, which I presume are the premise for his argument, if he includes dividends in the total amount, it is impossible for us to tell whether or not the salary is high or low. My interrogatory was asked merely in order that we might have a clear understanding of what the Senator is presenting.

Mr. BLACK. I will give that. His salary from one company for 1929 was $50,000; his personal expenses drawn were $34,000; his dividends for that year were $74,000. Of course in this case the dividends amount to a salary, because, as I have said, this man is the owner of the company.

The sum total for 1930 was $121,366; for 1931 it was $110,064; for 1932 the salary was $70,305. It might be interesting to note that in 1932 the company was drawing a subsidy of $1,200,000. It has had that increased to a little more than $2,000,000. At the same time they were borrowing money from the Government of the United States, and we find that on December 31, 1932, there was either an extension or a new loan of $1,638,750 at three eighths of 1-percent interest, while the Government at that time was paying about 4-percent interest or a little more than 4-percent interest, as the Senator from Maryland will remember. We find, however, that on the last day of last December—the last of the year—there is shown a loan of $1,638,750 from the Government at three eighths of 1-percent interest. During the 5 years from 1928 to 1933 this one individual drew out in salaries, expenses, and dividends $563,151, or almost enough to pay one half of the money which was borrowed at three eighths of 1-percent interest.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to divert the Senator from his line of argument, because I realize the force of what he is saying; but this situation often occurs in connection with our shipping projects: Down at Solomons Island, Md., there are 7 or 8 large ocean liners tied up. They have been tied up ever since the World War. We have a watchman or two on them to keep the machinery in shape. No visitors are allowed upon them, and the ships appear to be in excellent condition. I am wondering just what a sound Government policy should be in connection with those ships. Should we sink them; should we sell them for whatever we can get for them; or should we allow them to remain tied up, when they are worth hundreds of thousands of dollars and have been idle all these years tied up alongside the river bank? I do not want to divert the Senator from the course of his argument, but I know he has spent much time on the shipping phase of our governmental activities, and in connection with his remarks I should like to get his opinion upon that situation.

Mr. BLACK. I will say to the Senator that I should not, as the Senator suggests, want now to be diverted into a discussion of that situation. I will say that a committee of the Senate is making a study of the entire situation affecting mail contracts, air and ocean, and the question suggested by the Senator may come incidentally into the investigation, and probably will if the committee reports on what should be the policy of the Government.

Mr. TYDINGS. Is the Senator a member of the committee?

Mr. BLACK. I am chairman of that committee.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will yield for just a moment further, I shall not interrupt him again. I hope, as chairman of the committee, he will take into consideration the situation which I have outlined, and will make some recommendation in accordance with the facts. Those ships, I think, have been there now for about 10 or 12 years; they are worth hundreds of thousands of dollars; and to keep them there tied up, with only a watchman on board, when they are in splendid condition, seems to me to indicate that we lack a policy. We either ought to dispose of them or sink them or do something else with them.

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator, with reference to that at this time, although I do not desire to discuss it, that from the investigation I have made thus far I am satisfied we could sink them cheaper than we could turn them over to the so-called "merchant marine."

Mr. TYDINGS. Or sell them for junk.

Mr. BLACK. Or we could hire all kinds of watchmen at high salaries and make money simply to keep them there with watchmen looking after them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand the Senator's amendment, it prohibits the lending of money by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to any shipping company drawing a subsidy from the Government which pays an annual salary to any officer in excess of $17,500?

Mr. BLACK. The amendment does not provide that. It provides that the Postmaster General shall cancel subsidy contracts if the ocean and air mail companies pay annual salaries in excess of $17,500.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it seems to me the amendment of the Senator from Alabama ought certainly to be adopted. We have cut down the salaries and wages of all the employees of the Government; we have cut down, by 15 percent, the salaries of Representatives in Congress and Senators; we have cut down inordinately, and probably without justice, the compensation of all the ex-service men of the country; and surely, after making these great reductions to these others, we ought to insist upon reductions in the case of those who are receiving subsidies from our Government.

Take the shipping companies; take the aircraft companies; they are drawing altogether more than $50,000,000 a year, purely as subsidies; and certainly we ought to cut down those subsidies; they ought to have been among the first reductions made; and I am heartily and strongly for the Senator's amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, before the Senator from Maryland leaves the floor—I am not going through all these figures—I should like to invite his attention to the list of salaries of another subsidized company. In 1929 the president of this subsidized company—and, by the way, before I state the salary I will say that in this particular company there are 200,000 shares, as I recall, and 193,936 of them are held in trust by the Chase National Bank of New York—was paid $75,000. I am not going through all the list; I am just giving a few of the items. In 1930, he received $35,000 from one company, $10,000 from another, and $20,000 from another. All those companies were receiving subsidies. In 1931 he received $14,375 from one, $14,375 from another, and $28,750 from another. In 1932, last year, at the time when we proceeded to cut salaries throughout the country, the president of that company drew $52,000. These salaries that I have given are just indications of what is going on with Government money.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am interested in learning whether this particular line is engaged in intercoastal trade or trade with Central or South America or trade with Europe and the Orient.

Mr. BLACK. This particular line to which I have referred is the New York & Cuban Mail Steamship Co.

Mr. TYDINGS. I imagine it plies between the port of New York and Habana.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct, and it has various other lines.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understand that they cannot draw subsidies unless they carry the mail outside the territorial limits of the United States?

Mr. BLACK. That is the supposition.

Mr. TYDINGS. And the Senator is referring only to those lines that are going to outside ports?

Mr. BLACK. Those only that draw subsidies.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. I wish to say to the Senator from Alabama that since this amendment has been offered—and I have had an opportunity to read it—I readily agree that it is not subject to a point of order. The only question at all is as to its germaneness. I do not intend to make the point as to its germaneness, and am entirely willing to have the Senate vote on the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. To have the Senate vote on it now?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he takes his seat?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I was challenged by a figure which the Senator used a moment ago respecting loans. Did I hear him correctly when I understood him to say that a loan was made in 1932 at the rate of three eighths of 1 percent per annum?

Mr. BLACK. I have before me a report, submitted in answer to a questionnaire sent out by the committee of which I am chairman, which shows the loans obtained from the United States Shipping Board construction loan fund. The figures appear in this way regarding one of those loans:

$1,638,750; three eighths of 1 percent: 8/—

Which is August—

4/32—12/31/32.

Which would be December 31, 1932.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator interpret that as indicating that the loan was made at that time?

Mr. BLACK. I interpret it as indicating either that the loan was made or renewed on December 31, 1932.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course, that date is subsequent to the passage of the law, which I sponsored, which prohibited any of these loans at a lower rate than 3 percent per annum; and I am challenged by the possibility that loans are still being made at three eighths of 1 percent when the law now clearly puts the floor at 3 percent.

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator that we intend to go into all these matters fully and completely; but that in this instance, in my judgment, according to the way in which the notation is made, there is indicated a renewal on December 31, 1932, at three eighths of 1 percent.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I suggest to the Senator in connection with the survey that he compare these contracts with the law to which I have referred, which was enacted by the Congress 2 years ago.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I should like to say, while I am discussing the proposal, that we have a committee investigating the matter, and the committee has an appropriation of $5,000. We want to make a thorough and complete investigation. I believe we can save the Government of the United States $20,000,000 next year by a thorough and complete investigation. That thorough and complete investigation, of course, can only be held if all of the figures can be analyzed as obtained from the various companies. Some of them have not yet reported. Whether they will report voluntarily or not, I do not know. Before the Senate adjourns it is my intention to ask for a sufficient appropriation to really and thoroughly, and for one time at least, make a complete investigation of every ocean and air mail subsidy that has been granted by the United States Government. I think we can guarantee that the Government will be repaid manyfold for the cost of the investigation when we shall have finished it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the appropriate place in the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. —. Enforcement of the black-bass law: To enable the Secretary of Commerce to carry into effect the act entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to regulate interstate transportation of black bass, and for other purposes,' approved May 20, 1926" (U.S.C., supp. V, title 16, secs. 851–856), approved July 2, 1930 (46 Stat., pp. 845–847), $13,950, of which not to exceed $1,800 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement about the amendment. The item was included in the Budget. It came from the Director of the Budget in exactly these words. It was approved by the Senate committee. I am authorized to say that the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Roper, and the recently appointed Director of the Bureau of Fisheries, Mr. Frank Bell, are heartily in favor of this very small appropriation of $13,950.

The importance of it is that the Federal Government a few years ago spent about $25,000 in erecting a plant for cultural work on black bass. This is for continuation annually of the cultural work and the protection of the black bass. It is exceedingly important for the purpose of saving our black bass, which is perhaps our first game fish and is found in 41 or 42 of the 48 States. There is a large distribution, and it affords a great deal of sport and a large food value. As we have in the Department now a great expert on the culture of the black bass, it is very important that he be retained. This item will not only pay his small salary but will carry on the defensive and cultural work as it relates to black bass.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane. In this bill there is no appropriation for the Department of Commerce, under which Department the proposed appropriation would have to be expended.

I know of the interest of the Senator from Connecticut in the matter, but the facts are that at this session, or when the Department of Commerce appropriation bill was considered, the House refused to make an appropriation for this purpose. The Senate Committee on Appropriations inserted the item, which was adopted by the Senate and went to conference, and thus had its day in court. The House insisted that it should not be retained in the bill and the item was lost.

On the merits of the appropriation I do not care to have anything to say. The amendment is not germane to the bill and I think if it is to be offered and to have a second trial at this session, it should be offered to the deficiency appropriation bill and we should not be asked to make an appropriation for the Department of Commerce in the independent offices appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question of germaneness does not seem to be involved. The amendment is offered to carry out existing law. In the opinion of the Chair the question of germaneness is not involved.

Mr. BYRNES. Then I make the point of order that the item was not estimated for.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. McNARY. I concur in the ruling of the Chair and inasmuch as the ruling was made overruling the point of order I have nothing further to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I send to the desk another amendment which I offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Alabama proposes, on page 49, line 7, to strike out "$1,000,000" and insert "$2,000,000"; and on page 49, line 8, strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided, That one half of $2,000,000 so appropriated shall be used for supplying hospital treatment for veterans, without regard to whether their disability was service connected or not."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to suggest the absence of a quorum before he proceeds? Several Senators desire to be present when the amendment is considered.

Mr. BLACK. Very well.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Alabama permit us to dispose of several other amendments which are pending before this one is taken up?

Mr. BLACK. Very well; I will withdraw it temporarily in order that other amendments may first be disposed of.

Mr. McNARY. Then I withdraw the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, there are several amendments on the desk as to which notice was given, and it is to those amendments I refer in expressing the hope that we may dispose of other amendments first. However, the Senators who offered those amendments are not here, and I have no further reason to ask the Senator from Alabama to withhold his amendment at this time.

Mr. BLACK. Very well. Then I renew the offer of my amendment.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.
Ashurst	Couzens	King	Russell
Austin	Cutting	La Follette	Schall

Mr. LEWIS. Let me announce that my colleague [Mr. DIETERICH] is temporarily detained. He will return to the Chamber later in the day.

I beg to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], he being on an international commission having to do with important affairs of the Government. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

I also announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H.R. 4494) authorizing a per capita payment of $100 to the members of the Menominee Tribe of Indians of Wisconsin from funds on deposit to their credit in the Treasury of the United States, and it was signed by the Vice President.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

On May 20, 1933:

S. 1410. An act to amend section 207 of the Bank Conservation Act with respect to bank reorganizations;

S. 1415. An act to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, to remove the limitations on national banks in certain cases; and

S.J.Res. 50. Joint resolution designating May 22 as National Maritime Day.

On May 25, 1933:

S. 753. An act to confer the degree of bachelor of science upon graduates of the Naval, the Military, and the Coast Guard Academies.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief explanation of the amendment which I have offered, and the object of it.

When the economy bill, for which measure I voted, was up in the Senate, a question arose as to whether or not all veterans would be eligible for hospital treatment. I offered an amendment to the bill when it was in the Senate. As the bill came to the Senate, the President would have had no right and no discretion to utilize the beds in the hospitals for veterans whose disabilities were non-service-connected. I offered an amendment to the bill, which would leave in the President the discretion to utilize our Government hospitals for the use of all veterans, whether their disabilities were service-connected or non-service-connected. After some discussion, that amendment was unanimously adopted.

During the discussion, the statement was made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], who now occupies the chair, that the administration estimated that some five to six thousand beds would be released, and those beds would be commanded by service-connected cases. The Senator from Georgia was a member of the Finance Committee, and, as I understand, a member of the subcommittee of that committee which particularly hears legislation with reference to veterans. In other words, those favoring the measure believed that the beds in the hospitals were needed for the service-connected cases, and therefore that if the law limited the use of the hospitals to service-connected cases, those whose cases were non-service-connected would be removed from the hospitals, and their beds would be filled by service-connected cases.

In presenting my amendment I took the viewpoint—and the Senate agreed with it—that the Government hospitals should be utilized to the fullest extent, particularly during these times of distress throughout the Nation; in other words, that if a sick soldier should be removed from a veterans' hospital, and he was an object of charity, it meant nothing but transferring the obligation from the Federal Government to the local community that had a free hospital. That is inevitable, because in this country there has grown up a system—not so broad and extensive as I hope it will be in the future—of providing hospital and medical treatment for every citizen of the Nation who is unable to provide it for himself.

I believed then—and I believe now—that the Government has a duty in this vast program of medical and hospital treatment. I believed then—and I believe now—that it is the Government's duty to take as its share of the national load those men who have served in its Army.

We had an experience at the beginning of the World War as to what good health means in our citizenship.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BLACK. I do.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, the Senator's amendment increases the appropriation a million dollars.

Mr. BLACK. It does.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has devoted a great deal of thought to this matter. Does he think that will meet the situation as it is now presented to us?

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator that according to information coming to me since I drew the amendment, the appropriation which is now carried would be adequate to fill every veterans' hospital in the Nation. If we desire to utilize the Government hospitals that are not veterans' hospitals, such as the naval or military hospitals, then I am not sure that the million dollars would be adequate to fill those hospitals. Not having information, I simply desire to raise the question here in this bill, and frankly get an expression from the Senate as to whether or not they believe that there should be 15,000 empty beds in Government hospitals in America while there are 15,000 sick American soldiers who need hospital treatment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Does not that mean also that in all probability thousands of those soldiers are so poor that they will be taken care of by the locality or the county or the town at public expense?

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is absolutely correct. As I stated in the beginning, it is merely a transfer of the load of the soldiers who are ill from the Federal Government to some local charitable hospital. It does not amount to any saving to the Nation. It amounts to a saving to the Federal Government of the expense to which it would be put in caring for a sick soldier; but it transfers that obligation to the county or the municipality or the State which does provide hospital treatment for its sick and indigent people.

Mr. COPELAND. That means that the cost of the care is on the taxpayer?

Mr. BLACK. The taxpayer, of course, will have to pay it in the end.

Mr. COPELAND. And the soldier is subjected to the loss of self-respect through being made an object of charity instead of being taken care of properly by the Government.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct. I will give the Senate an illustration of what I mean, and why I am interested in this amendment.

Several years ago a soldier who had fought honorably in the World War went to a local charitable hospital in a city that I know very well. They were filled then, as most of them are filled now. That soldier had been to a number of places seeking relief. He froze to death in front of a local charitable hospital into which he could not enter. When his body was picked up, an honorable discharge from the American Army was found in his inside coat pocket.

I believe that so long as there is a single bed in a single Government hospital capable of being used by American soldiers it should be so used.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator's amendment would underwrite better care and greater protection for the soldiers, would it not?

Mr. BLACK. That is my intention. I believe it would.

Mr. HATFIELD. I am quite sure it would.

Mr. BLACK. I believe it would.

In other words, Mr. President, the issue is very simple, and I desire to repeat here what I said a few days ago: If I am not mistaken as to the political philosophy of the President of the United States, he would be the last man in this Nation to stand against using 15,000 beds in American hospitals for American sick soldiers if he knew the facts.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I certainly have no desire to question the Senator's conception of the President's humanitarian philosophy, but he has certainly been unfortunate in the selection of some of his agents in the administration of the Economy Act.

Mr. BLACK. I am perfectly willing to agree with the Senator 100 percent in that statement.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BYRNES. I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama if he would be willing to modify his amendment in a way that I think would appeal to him, by adding the words "not less than", so as to read:

Provided, That not less than one half of $2,000,000 so appropriated shall be used—

And so forth; the purpose being——

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator now that I am perfectly willing to accept that amendment, by reason of the fact that I have been informed by those in the Veterans' Bureau that there is sufficient appropriation to take care of these soldiers.

Mr. BYRNES. If the Senator would do that, we would make it plain, as I know it is the object of the Senator, that non-service-connected but permanently and totally disabled soldiers shall be cared for in the hospitals. As the amendment is written, it might be construed as a limitation; but if the Senator will put in a provision that not less than one half of the amount shall be used for supplying hospital treatment for veterans, I shall be glad to accept the amendment.

Mr. BLACK. May I get clear on that? I do not want it to be understood that I would favor removing service-connected cases from the hospitals in order to replace them with non-service-connected cases. I am of the opinion, as most of us are, that the man who had his leg shot off in the Army or was otherwise seriously wounded, is the first, primary obligation of the Nation.

Mr. BYRNES. I think the Senator and I will agree that the inclusion of the words "not less than" will make it possible for the administration to do what he wants to have done.

Mr. BLACK. And the Senator believes that with that amendment there would be enough money to take care of all the service-connected cases?

Mr. BYRNES. Absolutely. That is my understanding.

Mr. BLACK. And that that would be the expression of the Senate that it wants these 15,000 beds filled up with soldiers?

Mr. BYRNES. The Senate, of course, would have to express its sentiments; but my information is that this would be adequate, and would carry out the Senator's purpose.

Mr. BLACK. Will the Senator accept the amendment?

Mr. BYRNES. I accept the amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD and Mr. TRAMMELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BLACK. I yield first to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, if the Senator's amendment is adopted, that, of course, would make it possible to spend a million dollars for non-service-connected hospitalization, would it not?

Mr. BLACK. In the manner in which the amendment is to be rewritten, it would provide both for the service-connected and for the non-service-connected cases.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; but the money to be spent for non-service-connected cases would be limited to a million dollars, as I understand.

Mr. BLACK. No; not under the amendment as suggested by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What was the amendment?

Mr. BYRNES. That not less than one half should be spent for veterans, without regard to whether their disability was service connected or not; but, as a matter of fact, under the operation of it, since, of course, service-connected disabilities are hospitalized now, the amendment would make it possible for the officials to pay more than one half if it were necessary to take care of the total number.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. One half of what—$2,000,000?

Mr. BYRNES. One half of the total amount.

Mr. BLACK. In other words, may I state to the Senator, that since I drew this amendment I have found out that it contains enough appropriation to take care of both classes of cases.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The $2,000,000?

Mr. BLACK. No; the total appropriation for hospital purposes.

The amendment suggested by the Senator from South Carolina simply brings within its scope both service-connected and non-service-connected cases, with an adequate appropriation; and it would be an expression on the part of the Senate that we do not want to continue 15,000 empty beds in hospitals throughout the Nation.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Under that provision, does the Senator think it would be possible to take care of all the non-service-connected cases?

Mr. BLACK. I may state to the Senator from Minnesota that I doubt if all the non-service-connected cases could be taken care of with the facilities which we have. What I am trying to get is the use of the hospital facilities, as far as we have them, for soldiers.

Mr. BYRNES. That is the purpose of the Senator from Alabama. If there is a lawyer who wants to rest up in Walter Reed Hospital, he might not be cared for under this amendment; but every case that demands hospitalization would have a much better opportunity for hospitalization.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. He cannot come in until the service-connected cases are taken care of.

Mr. BYRNES. Yes; under all the appropriations.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. There will be some who will not be taken care of, undoubtedly.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct. We could not take care of them with our present hospital facilities. It is a question for the future, of course, as to how far we will go in extending hospital facilities. I wish to put myself on record now, insofar as I am individually concerned, as believing that the Federal Government should adopt as its part of the national care of those who need medical and hospital treatment the supplying of hospital and medical treatment for the men who have served in its Army.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I wish to state again that I was opposed to the economy bill because of certain features of it, and I think my suspicions as to how it would work out have been verified. I think it is a monstrosity, so far as the veterans are concerned, the way rules and regulations have been put into practice.

Mr. BLACK. May I state before I take my seat—and I do not want to prolong the discussion, since the Senator has accepted the amendment—that I think there were many abuses of the system which ought to have been corrected. I think there were some that were outrageous. I think there were people drawing compensation who should not have had a dime.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If that is the fact, that is the fault of the administration of the law, and not of the law. If men got on the pay roll of the Government who were not entitled to be put on the pay roll, they certainly did not get there under a correct administration of the law. It was not necessary to have rules and regulations, if that is correct, to eliminate fraudulent cases from the Government pay roll.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, I am not going back into a discussion of the original economy measure. We were faced with a most difficult situation at the time that measure was under consideration, and there was room for honest difference of opinion on the part of those who had the same objective. I myself think there are a number of these regulations which are going to be modified.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I hope so.

Mr. BLACK. I have every confidence that the President of the United States, when the facts come to his attention, will make those modifications.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator referred to an honest difference of opinion. I want to assure the Senator that I did not intend to cast any reflection on him at all.

Mr. BLACK. I understand that thoroughly, and the Senator would be the last person here who would ever do a thing like that.

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have been surprised to hear the Senator from Alabama inform us that there are 15,000 empty beds under the control of the Government which could be used for needy soldiers, and that there are 15,000 individual suffering soldiers somewhere who could occupy those beds. I ask the able Senator from Alabama from what source come the figures by which the Senator relies upon the theory that there are 15,000 beds and 15,000 individuals, soldiers of America, without treatment, waiting the consolation of a charitable bed in some State hospital?

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator that my information with reference to the number of beds, in round numbers, not with reference to the exact number, comes from the Veterans' Administration. It is impossible for me to have the exact number of soldiers who are occupying beds in charitable hospitals, but I do know, as does every other Senator, that there are thousands and thousands of soldiers all over this Nation who need and desire hospital treatment, and we do know that before the economy bill went into effect this 15,000 beds were fully occupied by sick soldiers. Conditions have certainly not grown appreciably better since the bill was passed with reference to the poverty-stricken condition of the people of this Nation. These beds having become empty, not through the voluntary action of the soldiers but by reason of the fact that they have been excluded from the hospitals by the regulations, I think one can naturally reach the assumption, and legitimately so, that if this regulation is modified the beds will immediately be filled up by sick soldiers.

Mr. LEWIS. Where these soldiers, in their condition, deserve places in these hospitals, what is the excuse, if any, offered by the Government for declining them these empty beds which belong to the Government, and which are being maintained and sustained today by the taxpayers?

Mr. BLACK. The regulations prohibit the use of those beds now for any cases except those that are service-connected, and the cases of those who are suffering from permanent incapacity. The hospitals, under the regulations, will not today receive veterans unless they are suffering in that manner.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator feel that by enlarging the regulations, omitting the limitations, and prescribing only that the cases shall have been connected with the war we would remedy the present condition?

Mr. BLACK. I am frank to state to the Senator that, in addition to this amendment, a modification of the regulations will probably be required, and I am confident that our President will modify those regulations. I believe, as has been stated, that his entire conception of social justice is such that as soon as he becomes aware of this situation he will direct a change in the regulations.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator believe that with the change automatically will operate the opportunity of those who are without the hospital treatment to enjoy these empty beds in the Government hospitals?

Mr. BLACK. There is no sort of doubt about that. As I stated awhile ago, I offered an amendment to the original economy bill, which was accepted, which left the discretion in the President to permit these soldiers to come in by regulation, but when the regulations were drawn, unfortunately, from what I believe to be a misconception of the necessity of the service-connected cases, the regulations prohibited the use of the beds by the non-service-connected cases that were not permanent.

I might state to the Senator, in order that the record may be clear, that I believe a mistake was made on this assumption. The administration reported to the committee, when the original economy bill was before the committee, that a great many service-connected cases were deprived of present hospital facilities because the beds were filled by non-service-connected cases, and it was believed by the administration at that time that if we would prohibit the use of the beds by non-service-connected cases which were not permanent, the beds would immediately be filled up by service-connected cases of a necessitous character. But experience has shown that that did not develop. Experience has demonstrated that our hospital facilities are more than adequate to take care of the service-connected cases, and, therefore, today there are 15,000 empty beds in Government hospitals, while there are these soldiers who need hospital treatment who cannot receive it. I am absolutely sure, myself, that this amendment is not out of line with the administration's desire, or with the administration's conception of social justice and social right.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am glad to have the explanation of the Senator but I deplore the situation, and I learn for the first time that such a condition of injustice to the soldier, where it is so apparent that there was relief at hand, has been allowed by this Government.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Alabama a question?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am thoroughly in agreement with the position taken by the Senator from Alabama, and I may say that I never dreamed that there was any intention to wholesale the sick soldiers out of these homes upon the enactment of the economy bill, as was done. The first I read of it was that about 360 sick soldiers were being put out of the hospital at Dayton, Ohio. The next I read was that they were discharging sixty-odd a day at the hospital at Leavenworth, Kans. The article which contained the latter information said that they were turning them out of the hospital without furnishing them transportation home. I do not think any Senator or any Representative ever contemplated that such a condition would ever exist.

The point I wish to raise is this: I want to remedy the situation, and remedy it effectively, just as does the Senator from Alabama, but can the Senator be sure that by adopting his amendment we would remedy the situation? We would still leave the law with the provision in it making it optional with the President and the Veterans' Administration as to whether or not they would give any accommodations to non-service-connected cases at the Government hospitals. If we could I would like to have put into this amendment a provision that hospitalization shall be given to both service-connected and non-service-connected cases, the service-connected cases being given preference where there are limited facilities.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I desire to state to the Senator from Florida that the Senator from Georgia has now pending before the committee an amendment to the Economy Act which would make it mandatory to utilize the hospital facilities to the utmost. My judgment is that if we attempted to put that on this bill, it would be subject, justly, to a point of order. My judgment is, further, may I state to the Senator, that I have the fullest confidence that the President of the United States will within the next few days remedy an intolerable and an unjust situation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suggested this because a number of amendments have been allowed to go through which were clearly out of order, under our rules, and I know of no one I should prefer waiving the rule for quicker than these soldiers who have been mistreated, and mistreated through a wrong construction of the law, as I look at it. That is why I had hoped that we could make a closed issue of the matter at this particular time by writing into this amendment a provision that the soldiers should be entitled to this hospitalization, instead of allowing it to be in the discretion of the administration and the President.

I have every respect for the President. I had every respect for the President when I voted for the economy bill. But, as stated by the Senator from Idaho, in his selection of agents, the President has selected agents in many instances who have grossly and inhumanly treated the veterans of this country, and I do not care to intrust too much to those agents in the future, I am frank to say.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, let me add this one statement to the Senator. I thoroughly agree with him. It is my idea that every Government hospital ought to be used to the limit of its facilities. If the unexpected should occur, and the rules should not be changed, I think the Senator may rest assured that we have enough votes to change them before the end of this session of Congress.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I will be very much opposed to the Congress adjourning before the matter is absolutely and specifically settled, not leaving it to discretion, which may be vested, of course, in the President, but the President, we all know, cannot go over all these details. This matter has been entrusted to certain people in the Veterans' Administration and to the Director of the Budget, and in every possible instance they have construed the law against the soldier. They have not only construed it against the nonservice-connected case, but they have construed it against the service-connected case.

I have a letter here, just a form letter, which I think does not correctly state the law. This is addressed to me in regard to claims and states:

> In reply to your letter of date May 24, 1933, the Seventy-third Congress, in an act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved on March 20, 1933, directed that all awarded claims be immediately reviewed.

Mr. President, I have read the law time and time again and I find no such provision in it. This matter of attempting to review cases where the claims have already been established and are in the record, and reduce the amount of the compensation before they even obtain any further evidence, is not in accordance with the law, but it is a misconstruction of the law, and it is violative of the spirit of the law. So, when we have a law administered by people like that, I think the quicker we make the provision very specific and definite on these vital points the better it is, and it is our duty to do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am very heartily in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. The Federal Government has built these hospitals throughout the country at enormous expense. Not to use them now would be wholly uneconomical. These men have got to be cared for somewhere, somehow, by someone. They were soldiers under the flag of our Government, and the first duty, in my judgment, of the Federal Government is to provide adequate care for them. I believe that all these hospitals should be utilized and that all the beds in them should be made use of so long as there are soldiers who need the services of the hospitals and need the beds.

I believe that this amendment will cure the situation. I think our President as soon as there shall be provided, as there will be provided under this amendment, the money with which to conduct these hospitals and permit the use of the vacant beds, will have the regulations so changed that these hospital facilities may be advantageously employed.

Mr. President, I want to say further that while we may have made errors in the past in reference to granting compensation in some cases and providing hospitalization in some cases where it was not right and proper to do it, still we owe such a duty to our soldiers that, in my judgment, we should take care of them, and I believe it can be done more economically, more efficiently, by the use of the facilities already in existence, including the beds already available, than in any other way. I also believe that the President will carry out the provisions of this amendment if the Senate shall adopt it, and I hope there will be no votes against it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has expressed confidence if the money shall be provided that the regulations will be adequate. How does the Senator explain the fact as brought out by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] yesterday that the existing appropriations are far in excess of the money necessary to administer the regulations as they now stand? In other words, phrasing the question differently, after the appropriations themselves were reduced those who drew the rules and regulations did not expend the appropriations allowed, but cut still further under them to the extent of another 50 percent.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know what the facts are about that, but I imagine those in charge of the administration of this relief felt that they were using all the appropriations that were allowed.

The Senator from Oregon very forcefully put the other side of the question; I cannot say, of my own knowledge, which is right; but I think that by adopting this amendment we shall so impress those who are now administering the act that they will change the regulations and make provision so that the beds in the various hospitals of the country may be utilized by the soldiers.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am simply suggesting to the Senator, agreeing as I do with his fundamental philosophy, that it will take more amendments than this one in order to realize the minimum expectations of Congress when we passed the Economy Act.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Michigan may be right; but I say that this is a forward step, and in the right direction; and, if this step shall not be sufficient, I believe that this body will take the other necessary steps to bring about the end desired.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, we have now reached upon this bill the first of the amendments relating to the veterans of the World War, and because we have thus reached the first of these amendments and others are to follow which are equally as important as that presented by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], I want to indulge in a few observations concerning the act in question and concerning what I conceive to be the duty of the Congress of the United States at this particular time.

At the outset of what I say, may I iterate and reiterate, so that hereafter I may not have to express it again, my very great admiration for the President of the United States, and my unstinted and unbounded confidence in what ultimately he may do; but I recognize, sir, that in the multiplicity of his duties, in all of that which now comes to him, it is an utter impossibility that every detail of every law shall be by him administered. He is dependent, of course, upon his ministers in order to do that which may be necessary respecting the statutes the Congress passes. The administration of the Economy Act he cannot himself in every aspect attend to; he has been dependent upon others; and the question of the administration of that act is what presents itself to us today in the amendments that have been offered and upon which I trust there will be votes in this body during the afternoon. I listened with interest and approbation to the greater part of the excellent speech of the Senator from Oregon and with the utmost sympathy to what has been said of the Spanish War veterans.

I recall the amendment, I think, which the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] has presented and the one which the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] has presented, both of like character but both dealing with a particular class of veterans. Each of them if I am accurate in my statement seeks now to do tardy justice to those who went "over the top," those who have been shot to pieces, those who have lost their legs and their arms and their eyes, and who, either because of ignorance or for some other reason which we are unable to fathom have been treated with a harshness, aye, with a cruelty under the Economy Act that no man upon this floor contemplated when that act was passed.

Every one of us, all those who are interested in the Economy Act, from the members of the Economy League itself to the least and lowest and the smallest of us in this body, had one thought and one only. It was impressed upon the country again and again and again and again that these men who had been injured directly in the service, who had received wounds and who had been permanently or semipermanently disabled, would be treated, to use the language that was used upon this floor and used all over this country, not only justly but generously. Quite the reverse has been the fact under the economy law. I voted for that law, and I have no apologies to make for it. I will shortly read what transpired upon the Walsh amendment, not in justification of that vote but only in mitigation of it. Then it was asserted upon this floor that these men, constituting the class of those who had been injured, who were disabled, and who were suffering, were to be treated absolutely with the generosity with which we thought we had treated them in the past, and that there was to be no change by reason of what we were doing respecting their status.

I have before me the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 14, 1933. It was a day of hysteria with us all, a time when we had not yet become numbed by reason of the celerity with which we were working and adopting a new philosophy of government; a time when the revolution that has occurred in this country—a revolution that we little understand at the present moment, and which we did not then understand at all, a revolution that we did not foresee and of which today we have no adequate comprehension—was only in the making and had not reached the consummation that it is now reaching in the last few days of the session.

There is an old trite expression of inability to see the forest for the trees; and we, sitting here engrossed with our duties, with measure after measure shot at us in bewildering fashion, with little understanding of much that we did but ready to do what ought to be done, so far as we could see the light, had little conception of the economic revolution that has occurred in the United States of America. Ye who believe in individual initiative and in the old slogans that have been a part of the game with the conservatives of both parties in the years gone by will never again witness in the United States the old system. The old system has passed with the economic revolution that has occurred during these short 3 months; it has passed into oblivion, and never again will be resuscitated or revived in this land.

At that time, when we were beginning our work and had little conception of what was in store and what was intended, there came to us the economy bill. Everyone of us sought to aid the President in his arduous and his difficult task; everyone of us here was anxious—and no partisanship was in it to the slightest degree—to lend him a helping hand in the perilous crisis that confronted the Nation. All of us did it, and so the economy bill was passed here overwhelmingly, and passed with the idea concerning the veterans of this land that there were certain things that would not, under any circumstances, be disturbed by that economy bill.

On the 14th day of March, when the Walsh amendment came before the Senate, certain things occurred. Now, follow me, Senators, if you will. I grant you, in fairness, that the Walsh amendment contained a clause or a phrase or two words which might have perverted it to a different use; but, as we adopted it, as we understood it, as every man so stated upon this floor, its design was to protect the men who had been shot to pieces in the defense of this Nation, to permit no authority to interfere with those who had been incapacitated in defense of the old Stars and Stripes, whose disability arose directly from their service. Here is what transpired on that day:

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, this amendment I discussed this afternoon. Briefly stated, it obviates the possibility of removal from the compensation rolls of all veterans whose disabilities are actually traceable to direct service. It does give the President discretion in regard to readjusting rates in particular cases, and also discretion in regard to fixing the time of war service, and the beginning and the end of the World War for the purpose of these rates.

After consultation with the Senator in charge of the bill and discussing the matter at length, he has accepted the amendment, and is of the opinion that the amendment has merit and that we should lift out of this bill any possibility of removal from the compensation rolls of any veteran whose disability is directly connected with service.

I ought to add—

Said the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts—that this amendment still leaves to the discretion of the President the power and right to deal differently with that class of service-connected cases that have been established through presumptive laws adopted by Congress. It does assure—the directly disabled veteran who incurred disease or injury in line of duty that his compensation shall be secure.

Upon that promise, upon that declaration, acquiesced in by the committee which presented the economy bill, on that promise, on that declaration of the Senator who presented the amendment, and who stands today, I think, in the same position in which I stand in reference to the pending amendment, we adopted the Walsh amendment. Then proceeded a colloquy that makes it even plainer just exactly what was the purpose of the Senate and just what was our purpose in adopting that amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. This was one of the propositions that were advanced by the Senator from Oklahoma in the Committee on Finance, that those who were injured in actual combat should not be excluded. Some of us did not believe that the President, after the passage of this law, would ever exclude that group of soldiers.

Mr. WALSH. I am of the same opinion.

Mr. HARRISON. So, personally, I shall be very glad to accept the amendment and get this controversial proposition out of the way.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield? The amendment does not confine its provisions, as I understand the Senator, to one injured in actual combat, but to service origin.

Mr. WALSH. That is true.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I would like to know what the estimated saving is.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, there has been practically no estimate made of the saving in connection with this item. It has been assumed that the President would make no cut and no reduction of any appreciable amount in connection with the veteran whose compensation is based upon disability as the result of direct service. Therefore, what we are doing is merely to remove any possibility of discretionary action by the President. If he had it, he has practically said he would not disturb the rates, anyway. We are simply incorporating in the bill the provision that this group of veterans shall not be removed from the rolls.

Mr. DICKINSON. It is my understanding that there was a certain rating table made and a certain percentage of the reductions shown in that table was taken for disability allowances. What reason has the Senator for assuming that in making up the estimate of $101,000,000 of saving there would not be some of the savings in the very item of $100,000,000 that he says is being taken out from under the provisions of the bill?

Mr. WALSH. I have the assurance of representatives of the President that he never intended to disturb this group of veterans.

Thereupon the Walsh amendment was adopted. Upon that record I rest. I do not believe the President ever had any intention of disturbing the man whose leg had been shot off, the man whose arm had been shot away, the man who had been blinded in battle, or the man whose body was filled with shrapnel. I do not believe that he ever had any intention whatever of dealing with those men otherwise than as was stated at that time, justly and generously, and I am sure that whatever the fault has been, it has been in the bureaucracy, a bureaucracy that has endeavored to do what it deemed appropriate in the premises but which has done some things that reek with cruelty which never before have I seen exemplified in this Government of ours.

So it is that I speak concerning the amendments that do not touch the economy bill in its essence at all, but after all do something of mercy and of kindness and of generosity to those who may require it. Oh, yes; a statute is of so many words and so many sentences. A law consists of phrases and clauses that one may read coldly if he will, but back of every statute that deals with human beings there should be a human heart. The trouble with this situation is that the men who administer this law are back of it reading the words of the law and there is no heart in either the reading or their administration of the law.

Now, sir, I have on my desk, but I do not intend to bore the Senate or take its time in reading them, some letters out of some hundreds or thousands that have come to me upon this subject. In all my life I never want again to receive communications such as I have received in the last month and a half. I never want to read the appeals of misery and of want, of anticipation of hardship and horror, that I have read in letters of good people, people just as good as you and I, just as good as the Director of the Budget, people whose appealing words not only get under one's skin, but get into the heart. I never want to read in all my life again stories such as have been written to me during this period.

All I can say to the writers of those letters is that I was wrong when I voted for a bill that permitted such things. I voted for it with a definite understanding, it is true; but, as I said a moment ago, that is not in justification of what I did; it is only in mitigation. I take the responsibility that comes from my action upon a measure of this sort, and I make no excuse so far as that is concerned; but these tales that have come to me, just as they have come to other Senators in this Chamber, these appeals that will rock any man to his very core who has not lost every sense of sympathy and who has not forgotten that he is still a human being with a heart beating in his body like other human beings—these stories make it necessary, if we can, to do what can be done and what ought to be done in behalf of those who are suffering and those who are hurt and those who are injured. The amendments that have been presented by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], and, I believe, by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] as well, take out of the injuries that might be inflicted under the economy bill the particular class of those injured in combat and disabled in actual service. There may be a deduction, and the deduction, in my opinion, ought to be only the deduction that is made for civil employees, 15 percent at the outside; but whatever it may be, and I would not make any if I had my way—whatever it is, for the love of humanity and with the full sympathy that man should have for his brother because a wrong has been done to these men, as you know, from your letters, just as I have the proof here from my letters, let us undo if we can the wrong we have done and let us undo it without delay.

We have only 8 or 9 days more of this session. There are only 8 or 9 days more remaining, and we have to act now or we cannot act at all. In addition to that these people who have been treated thus harshly, on the 1st day of July 1933 are utterly and absolutely remediless. There is no way in which they can appeal thereafter; no way in which the wrong done them can be righted; no way in which we can pick them off the street after that time and pump blood into them and give them the breath of life again. After the 1st of July we simply want the people that need it to have the sum that was given them because they were injured in our defense and fought our battles, and we have got to correct that if we have the feeling we ought to have. The President cannot object to it, and will not, I am sure. He does not understand and he does not know, and he has to deal through those who are subordinate and those who represented him in the administration of the law.

I hold in my hand an excerpt from a very powerful Scripps-Howard paper of the city of San Francisco, describing some of the scenes that occurred when they began to make the new ratings in that city. I have taken these from a paper which, like myself, is strongly administration and believes in the President of the United States. But these descriptions of what transpired in San Francisco are the descriptions of what transpired in other parts of our country. They beg relief. They are beyond anything of which we have ever read in our lives, and they must be, and will be, corrected, for if we do not correct them here, they will be corrected in some other fashion. Men, women, and children cannot be dealt with in the fashion that these people who are a part of the veterans of the World War and were injured and disabled in it have been treated for the last couple of months.

From this article I read as follows:

Somewhere between the White House and the man who sacrificed health and limb for his country the new deal has been perverted into a cruel and ruthless drive on the rights of veterans disabled in active service by gunshot, shell, and gas.

Eighty-four hundred veterans in central and northern California, disabled in active service, face total loss or drastic reduction in their compensation on top of the blanket 20-percent cut already decreed.

Four boards are at work at the Veterans' Bureau headquarters, 814 Mission Street, reviewing and rerating wounded veterans according to a ruthless cut-and-dried table that requires arbitrary reductions in practically 99 cases in 100.

Tidings that mean despair and pauperization for hundreds of wounded veterans began going into the San Francisco mails last week, to the number of 400. This week they are going out at the rate of 125 a day.

Off the record, Veterans' Bureau officials in San Francisco are appalled and sickened as they helplessly carry out orders that originated, not at the White House, but with some unnamed group at the Veterans' Administration in Washington that has carried the day for a policy as extreme in the direction of economy as earlier policies were extreme in liberality and extravagance.

Then follow descriptions of conditions, and I ask leave that I may insert in the RECORD these excerpts concerning the scenes in San Francisco.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEIWER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The excerpts are as follows:

CRIPPLED VETS LEFT HELPLESS BY PAY SLASHES—NEW DEAL HAS BEEN PERVERTED INTO CRUEL DRIVE ON RIGHTS OF MEN INJURED IN FIGHTING OVERSEAS

By George West

Somewhere between the White House and the man who sacrificed health and limb for his country the new deal has been perverted into a cruel and ruthless drive on the rights of veterans disabled in active service by gunshot, shell, and gas.

Eighty-four hundred veterans in central and northern California, disabled in active service, face total loss or drastic reduction in their compensation on top of the blanket 20-percent cut already decreed.

Four boards are at work at Veterans' Bureau headquarters, 814 Mission Street, reviewing and rerating wounded veterans according to a ruthless cut-and-dried table that requires arbitrary reductions in practically 99 cases in 100.

Tidings that mean despair and pauperization for hundreds of wounded veterans began going into the San Francisco mails last week to the number of 400. This week they are going out at the rate of 125 a day.

Off the record, Veterans' Bureau officials in San Francisco are appalled and sickened as they helplessly carry out orders that originated, not at the White House, but with some unnamed group at the Veterans' Administration in Washington that has carried the day for a policy as extreme in the direction of economy as earlier policies were extreme in liberality and extravagance.

WRECK OF PLAN SEEN

Thoughtful officials see the whole economy program wrecked unless the facts can be brought speedily to President Roosevelt's attention before public indignation creates a reaction that will scrap even those economies that justice and common sense demand.

Consider the case of a man so ruined by a gunshot wound in the groin that not only his occupation and livelihood are gone but also his ability to function as a husband and father, reduced without reexamination or hearing from $125 a month to $60.

Consider the case of a gifted professional man in San Francisco, his lungs burned out by gas, so that life or death is a chance of the moment, just out of hospital again after 5 months on his back, arbitrarily reduced from a rating of 100 percent total and permanent disability to a rating of 50 percent and cut from $100 to $40 a month.

ADDITIONAL CUT

He not only loses $60 in deserved compensation, but is automatically deprived of an additional monthly payment of $57.50 on his $10,000 soldier's insurance policy, paid for by himself, but allowed only to veterans with a rating of 100-percent disability.

At the Veterans' Bureau on Mission Street they can relate these individual cases of tragedy and injustice by the score.

Of the first 120 cases of service-connected disability reviewed by a local board, 65 were removed from the rolls entirely on the ground that the service connection was presumptive. And of the 55 who stayed on, not one escaped a reduction of from 40 to 65 percent. Not one had a hearing or reexamination.

A veteran totally and permanently disabled, by a gunshot wound in the head that produced epilepsy, is arbitrarily reduced without hearing or examination from $100 to $40 a month. Another, a manual laborer with one leg off and suffering from ulcerations in the stump, was cut from $93 to $40.

NOT THE NEW DEAL

This is not the new deal, say spokesmen for the veterans. It is contrary to the promises and assurances made by every spokesman for economy from the President down that elimination of unearned benefits would result in even better and more generous care for those disabled in active service.

Suffering among veterans caused by justified economies are serious enough, they point out, without extending it to those who are entitled to Government care.

For instance:

Six thousand veterans in central and northern California drawing monthly allowances for non-service-connected disabilities will be cut off the rolls entirely. Only 875 of this class will remain on the rolls. These are men permanently and totally disabled and they will be cut from $40 to $20 a month.

BEDS ARE CLOSED

Nine hundred beds in the bay district that have been filled with sick veterans have been closed to them. These are the contract facilities provided by Letterman General Hospital, 400 beds; the Marine Hospital in San Francisco, 50 beds; and the Mare Island Navy Hospital, 450 beds.

Veterans ill of non-service-connected diseases will get no aid whatever, unless they are totally and permanently disabled. These include about 500 out-patients in San Francisco, as well as those who have been hospitalized.

Veterans ill of wounds or service-connected disease must take their chances in the already crowded hospitals at Livermore, Palo Alto, San Fernando, or West Los Angeles. Insane patients at Palo Alto, whose mental condition is not the result of war service, must be transferred to State hospitals.

San Francisco's public-health facilities will be swamped, and a heavy additional load will be thrown on the city relief organization.

Even veterans disabled in active service must hereafter apply direct to the bureau hospitals and prove their cases with medical evidence. Physicians' statements are proving inadequate under the rigid new regulations and this means frustration and delay. A veteran with a bursted appendix can no longer get prompt aid through the bureau. He must take his chances.

SYMPATHY ONLY

For veterans deprived of allowances and medical care because their ills are not service-connected, there will be sympathy plus a demand for a more gradual and humane transition to their new status. But nothing more.

For men actually disabled in service who, with their families, are being pauperized and rendered helpless, there will be much more. A wave of anger is swelling and will break on the bureaucrats at Washington who have perverted the legitimate and necessary economy program of the kindly President.

There remains to be told the hardships inflicted on scores of older men who have been deprived of pensions won in the Spanish-American War. In many instances their health was wrecked by yellow fever or typhoid, but unlike World War veterans they were slow in demanding pensions and have no records to prove the service-connected character of their disability.

This and other facts about the veterans' situation will be told in another article.

ORDERS FROM UNITED STATES

Agent for the American Legion at the Veterans' Bureau, a sort of liaison man, is June W. Valiant, field secretary in this area for the Legion's rehabilitation committee. Mr. Valiant says that no criticism can be justly made against the officials and personnel of the local Veterans' Bureau, who are carrying out orders from Washington about which they have no choice and little or no discretion.

Each review board consists of 1 surgeon, 1 examiner, and 1 vocational expert. But their decisions are guided by a hard-and-fast book of tables and rules issued from Washington. These rules and tables have not been published and were not included in the President's order.

RUTHLESS CUTS IN PAY OF VETS ARE PROTESTED—PROMISED REVISION OF CUT-AND-DRIED RULES TO SLASH COMPENSATION MAY PROTECT MEN INJURED IN WAR

By George P. West

Released by the News publication of the facts Thursday, a wave of indignation and protest swept San Francisco today against the drastic and ruthless cutting of compensation for veterans disabled in active service. Cheered by a White House statement promising a revision of the cut-and-dried rules requiring arbitrary reductions without examination or hearing, veterans hoped for an Executive order that would cancel cuts already ordered and protect men whose disabilities are the direct result of war service.

"The Veterans' Administration has violated a promise made to us by the President and congressional spokesmen for economy", said John A. Sinclair, San Francisco lawyer and vice chairman of the national rehabilitation committee of the American Legion.

CUTS TERMED UNFAIR

"Men injured in active service have already taken a blanket cut of 20 percent, as against a 15-percent cut for civilian employees of the Federal Government. In all conscience, that is enough. To reduce them by another 40 or 50 percent, without hearing or reexamination is unfair on the face of it, and I do not believe that the President or the people will stand for it when they know the facts."

Those war-disabled veterans who have already received notification of their cuts, effective July 1, are stunned and incredulous. Many will not believe it until they get a reduced check or no check at all on August 1. As the rerating proceeds by four boards working at San Francisco headquarters of the Veterans' Bureau, the News' estimate of cuts for 99 percent of veterans disabled in active service is being confirmed, and the percentage is running even higher than that.

No discretion is left to local boards under the rigid rules sent out from Washington and which President Roosevelt now promises to modify.

Veterans' organizations continued to cite cases of men incapacitated from earning a livelihood by battle wounds who have been cut from a bare minimum subsistence to $40, and even as low as $8 a month.

PREFERS JOB TO PITTANCE

One veteran, suffering from a gunshot wound, arthritis, arteriosclerosis, and heart trouble, and reduced from $50 to $8 a month without hearing or examination, wrote that if he was that well he was entitled to earn a living, and ironically demanded a job in which his disabilities would not count against him.

"Give me that", he said, "and I shall proudly surrender my $8, and with no thanks to the Veterans' Administration."

A San Franciscan with five children, a manual worker, with his left leg amputated high above the knee, has been cut from $79 a month to $60. Another, suffering from multiple gunshot wounds in the abdomen, thigh, and leg, with injury to the bladder and stiffened joints and an index finger amputated, was cut from $90 a month to $40. He is married and has two children. Wounded on the Marne front in July 1918, he was in a hospital in France until May 1919 and has never recovered.

A sergeant of marines, in the service for 15 years, had a foot shot off at Chateau Thierry. He has been supporting his family on $102 a month received in compensation. He has now been cut to $60. These are only a few among thousands of cases.

Dr. J. C. Geiger and Charles M. Wollenberg, city health officer and city relief director, respectively, announced special preparations to care for the hundreds of helpless veterans expected to be thrown on public charity and hospital rolls.

Even sponsors of Federal economy seemed aghast at the unexpected extremes to which their policy had been carried.

"It was never our intention that the rightful compensation of actually deserving veterans should be cut", local headquarters of the National Economy League said.

CITY FORCED TO AID

"We don't think a program of that kind has been authorized. We doubt whether the Veterans' Administration yet knows where it stands. We're waiting for the results of survey by our headquarters at Washington."

Dr. Geiger revealed that the local veterans' council, anticipating the situation, conferred with him and Chief Administrator Alfred J. Cleary last week. As a result $120,000 of the $300,000 contingent emergency fund in the city budget was tentatively set aside for care of disabled veterans expected to be diverted to city hospitals.

Meanwhile disabled veterans purchasing homes on the installment plan through the State Veterans' Welfare Board declared they faced ruin.

Statements of veterans' leaders and city officials, with executive interest in the situation, follow:

Charles M. Wollenberg, relief director: "Undoubtedly many disabled veterans, hitherto able to care for their families with their small pensions, will be added to the city relief rolls. I will conduct a special survey in June to determine the probable number. Because of the many families that have gone off relief in the last few months, I am sure we'll have adequate funds for the newcomers."

Dr. J. C. Geiger, health director: "This will add to the city hospital burden. Even disabled veterans—except emergency cases—will have to answer the social-service requirements demanded of all our patients. There can be no discrimination. I would point out that clearing of Government hospitals will leave many unoccupied beds, many unemployed physicians and nurses. Conditions may be chaotic for a while before we readjust ourselves."

RATINGS HELD UNJUST

A. L. McCormick, secretary, Disabled American Veterans of the World War: "Every day we see flesh-and-blood evidence of the injustice caused by the economy revisions in veterans' compensation. Many of the evils are traceable to the elimination of the so-called 'intermediate ratings.' Formerly veterans were paid on a flexible disability scale ranging anywhere from 1 to 100 percent. Now there are arbitrary ratings of 10, 25, 50, and 75 percent. Thus, if a man rates 48 percent disability he gets not 50 percent rating, but 25 percent, or $20 a month. Many men, desperate, are writing daily to Mrs. Roosevelt to intercede with the President. I don't think even the National Economy League expected such results. If this keeps up $650,000,000 will be lopped off disability expenditures instead of the $400,000,000 aimed at."

EXPECTS F. R. TO ACT

Ralph J. A. Stern, county commander, American Legion: "I believe firmly that President Roosevelt never intended his economy program should result in these terrible hardships, many of which verge on downright cruelty. And I also believe that as soon as he becomes conversant with the facts he will move to remedy the evils according to his humanitarian principles."

Richard A. Barry, national rehabilitation officer, Disabled American Veterans: "This program, first conceived as an attempt at reasonable economy, has run wild. Even its sponsors will be astounded by its far-reaching effects, especially among disabled veterans who are paying for small homes with little income other than their pensions.

DELAYS ARE FEARED

"It is a return to the old short-sighted centralization. The area boards of appeal, which formerly heard cases of veterans wishing to have their ratings revised, have been abolished. The sick veteran appealing his case will now have to communicate with Washington. From experience we know that this will occasion a delay of from 6 months to 2 years. About 25 percent of appeals formerly were confirmed. What is to become of these deserving veterans and their families while their cases drag through the overworked bureau at Washington?"

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask as well—and I shall not read it—that I may place in the RECORD the views of the San Diego County Board of Supervisors in relation to these veterans.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SAN DIEGO, CALIF., May 11, 1933.

The Honorable HIRAM JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: The board of supervisors and the people of San Diego County do not believe that you are acquainted with our particular situation with reference to the veteran population in this part of the country, and the effect that the recently enacted legislation known as "Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress", is having on our community.

A request was made by the executive secretary of the San Diego County Welfare Commission to the regional manager of the Veterans' Administration in Los Angeles for statistical data that might be used as a basis in preparing our budget for the coming fiscal year, but was informed that the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs has forbidden the releasing of such data. Therefore we are forced to make an approximate estimate as to the increased burden this will throw on the local taxpayers and our resources.

This estimate is based on the report issued by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs showing the number of beneficiaries under his jurisdiction residing in California, which totals some 113,000, and a further check shows that 60 percent of this veteran population resides in southern California, principally under the jurisdiction of the Los Angeles regional office, or an approximate total of some 68,000 veterans and their families. It is further shown that of this load San Diego County has 25 percent of the aforementioned figure, or approximately 17,000, and from the number of cases reported through our veterans' claims office as having received notification of the effect of the automatic review called for under this legislation, that one third are being removed from the Federal rolls entirely, the remaining two thirds being reduced in the amount of pension by more than 60 percent. Also please bear in mind that this group was considered under the preexisting laws to have received their injury or disability in line of duty, or directly service connected. If such is the action on this type of case, it is quite easy to see what will happen to remaining classifications as set up under this automatic review. Using this group as a basis, it is estimated that approximately 8,000 additional families will become public charges at an average monthly budget of $20 per family, or a total of $1,920,000 will be needed in addition to our already tremendous relief budget.

As a further comparison we call your attention to the fact that San Diego County carries 25 percent of the veteran population for southern California, while Los Angeles County, which is approximately 10 times its size, carries but 50 percent of the veteran population, with the other 25 percent being distributed over nine other counties coming under the jurisdiction of the Los Angeles regional office.

This additional $1,920,000 does not include provisions which must be made for increased cost of operating our county medical institutions, due primarily to the loss of use of the class A United States naval hospital situated in San Diego, with its up-to-date equipment and adequate room to care for veteran patients. Since Federal orders were issued to no longer use this facility, our county hospital load has increased an average of 10 percent daily.

While it is realized that strict economy must be effected throughout all Government departments and agencies, we feel that such drastic and sudden change without warning is throwing an undue burden and hardship on the local communities and taxpayers as well as the veterans, and unless immediate liberalization and amendments are enacted it will be necessary for San Diego County to make further and increased demands upon the Federal Government for assistance to carry us through this period of readjustment.

Feeling assured that you realize the gravity of the situation, we urge your immediate attention to this problem which confronts us, and ask that you do everything in your power to remove this burden, which we honestly feel to be a Federal obligation.

Yours very sincerely,

SAN DIEGO COUNTY BOARD OF SUPERVISORS,
By TOM HURLEY, Chairman.

Mr. JOHNSON. I present communications from two Legion posts presided over by men whom I happen to know, men whose word I can accept, and accept wholly. Here is one from the little city of Chico, in northern California:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
CHICO POST, No. 17, INC.,
Chico, Calif., May 27, 1933.

Senator HIRAM JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

Hon. HIRAM JOHNSON: Something must be done to stop the drastic cuts in compensation for service-connected disabilities. We believe in economy but not this kind of economy. Surely the President had no intention of cutting veterans with service-connected disabilities beyond the meaning of the new schedule of ratings which is part of the act "to maintain the credit of the United States Government." And it is not the will of the general public that those veterans with disabilities due to war service should be affected.

Many, many veterans with service-connected disabilities come to my office daily complaining of drastic cuts received in compensation. The average cut here is approximately 65 percent.

To date I have had the pleasure of being instrumental in the settlement of more than 1,000 claims for veterans. In the name of these worthy veterans with service-connected disabilities, we beg of you, as our United States Senator, to give us your wholehearted support. We heartily support the new deal. We only ask in return a fair deal.

Thanking you for your kindness, I remain,

Yours very sincerely,

JOSEPH FOLLETTIE, Service Officer.

Another one of like character comes from the commander of the American Legion in Glendale, which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

GLENDALE POST, No. 127,
AMERICAN LEGION, LTD.,
Glendale, Calif., May 26, 1933.

Hon. HIRAM H. JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR JOHNSON: I would like to call your attention to a very serious matter, a condition arising from the application of the Economy Act as it will apply to disabled veterans. In the first place, there is a far greater percentage of disabled veterans in this locality than the average throughout the United States. In Glendale it is estimated that approximately one third of all World War veterans come under this classification. This, of course, is due to the fact that so many disabled men, particularly those with pulmonary diseases, have come to this section for the sake of their health.

I will confine myself to a discussion of service-connected cases only, of which it is estimated there are approximately 750 in Glendale. The percentage of cut in the compensation of these service-connected cases, as shown by the result of the application of the law to the first 2,100 cases in the county, show an average cut in compensation of 66 percent.

These 750 cases formerly received about $51,000 a month. Under the changed regulations they will receive one third of that. Needless to say these men did not receive any more than was necessary for them to support themselves and their families, and the proposed cut will throw a large majority of them directly on the community and county welfare agencies for support. Of course, undoubtedly some of these men received compensation who had other means of income, but those men in the final analysis comprise a comparatively small percentage of the total. Practically all the total and permanently disabled men relied solely upon their Government compensation. Under the new regulations and reratings, many of these men, formerly rated as service-connected, will now be entirely cut off, which means that the city and county will have to support them.

After the 1st of July, when this law takes effect, it will be our duty to our disabled men to submit these cases to the charitable institutions of the city of Glendale for that care which they are certainly entitled to if any citizen is. This means a direct shift of the burden to the local taxpayer, and there is no question in my mind but that when this occurs all over the country the public will realize that this certainly is a false economy measure.

Many of these men require special medical attention and specialized treatment, particularly for the pulmonary and psychoneurosis cases. The local work-providing agencies such as afforded by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation fund, require certain physical examinations before the work orders are issued. Of course, the majority of these men cannot pass any such examination, therefore cannot receive this type of employment which brings them under the classification of purely relief cases. Bear in mind I am referring to service-connected cases only, and I think when those men have to subsist on public charity that it is time something were done.

We are not necessarily criticizing the action of President Roosevelt in the Economy Act as it relates to veterans, but do certainly criticize the application of the law as put into effect by the Director of the Veterans' Administration which is unduly harsh and far more severe than the Executive order ever indicated. We think that when the taxpaying public realizes that the directly service-connected disabled veterans are being treated in a most unjust and heartless way, and that this burden will fall directly on the local taxpayer, that perhaps a change in those regulations may be effected. We will furnish you details regarding the individual cases at a later date when they are available.

We would appreciate your attention to this matter. I think that the subject, if brought up and openly aired, will bring a change quicker than by any other manner.

Yours very truly,

D. G. COWLIN, Commander.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the question is, What do we want to do? We have been told in the name of economy by certain understrappers in various departments that they will cut the men who have been shot to pieces in the war. I deny that it was ever the intention of Congress or that it is the intention of the President, or anybody else who has a heart in his body, to do any such thing.

You know, we have 8 days more only of a session such as this. Within that period, if the Congress does not act, it cannot act at all. You know that the 1st day of July is the last time that these men, bewildered by the wrong that is done them, have to appeal, and that their appeal is fruitless at best. So it is up to us.

We have made a blunder, perhaps, in dealing with certain classes of these veterans. I am appealing, for the moment now, for just one class—the class that everybody sympathizes with and everybody loves. I do not want to go back to my home and see the legless man, the man without sight in his eyes, compelled to become an object of charity upon my city or upon my friends. It is wrong, wrong, cruel, cruel, and we ought not to do it; and if the opportunity is presented in amendments here today we ought to pass them—pass them not alone in recognition of the services of the men who bore the wounds and stood in the front of battle, pass them not alone for the glory of the flag and the generosity that we all owe to those who thus suffered, but pass them so that we may hold our heads high and feel that our hearts are right, not made of stone, and that we are dealing with our fellow beings and our fellow creatures, the men who fought at the front for us, and that we are doing them now, finally, simply tardy justice.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I have refrained from saying much upon the floor of the Senate. I have the feeling that as a new Member I should like to say little and be instructed by what I hear upon this floor; and I have been instructed and informed by the discussions here, notwithstanding the fact that we have had to conduct them under great pressure—the insistent pressure of the needs of emergency legislation to deal with a grave crisis in the history of our country.

I cannot refrain, however, from expressing my hearty commendation of and my cordial agreement with my distinguished colleague from California [Mr. JOHNSON] in what he has just said about the pending amendments to the bill concerning the veterans, particularly those who have been disabled in the service of their country.

The administration of the economy bill, as my distinguished colleague has said, is perpetrating wrongs that are cruel and heartless in the extreme upon men who have suffered for their country, and I may say that if I had not myself had assurances that in the administration of that law the very kind of injustices that have already been decreed would not be decreed I would not have supported the measure.

The able senior Senator from California has referred to those who have service-connected disabilities, and who under the new regulations and the new ratings will suffer cruel and indefensible hardships; but there is still another class, not so large a class, the Spanish War veterans, who have been treated by the new regulations and ratings with such disregard that grave injustices and cruelties will result. Unjustified reductions in the compensation which they are now receiving and which, in my humble opinion, they should continue to receive are in contemplation.

The Spanish War veterans, 35 years after that great conflict, have no means whatever by which they can establish service-connected disabilities. They went into that war at the munificent compensation of $15 per month. They endured all the trials of "embalmed" beef and of diseases in the camps, which resulted in more deaths than were actually incurred upon the battlefield. The compensation which they received today will be cut, under the new regulations, by 66⅔ percent or more, and the appeals which I have received are as numerous, perhaps, as those that my colleague from California has received. Men and women alike are threatened with the destruction of their only means of living. The cold fact faces them that employment cannot be had in any possible line, because they are all beyond the age limit. No one could be deaf to these appeals without being recreant to every instinct of humanity and to his trust as a Senator of the United States.

I feel strongly about this matter. Corrective legislation must be enacted immediately if we are to prevent the grave wrongs and injustices which will be inflicted upon these men and women on the 1st day of July next.

For my part, I am willing to stay here until corrective legislation is enacted; and I think it can be enacted in such a way that we may at least mitigate in large measure, if we do not correct altogether, the wrongs with which these people are threatened.

Mr. President, one of the reasons why I voted for the amendment presented by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] to pay the soldiers' bonus by an issue of Treasury notes, was in some measure to correct the injustices which I thought might be perpetrated under the Economy Act. I felt that if the payment of the adjusted-service certificates was anticipated by 12 years through an issue of Treasury notes, which would not bear interest, and with a sinking-fund provision adequate to retire them within a reasonable time, so that undue inflation would not occur, we would, in part, compensate for the injury that might be done to the veterans under the Economy Act, and give them necessary assistance at a time when they would sorely need it. For my part, I believe that one of the best things we could do now would be to get this adjusted-compensation question behind us forever, so that it will not continue to be a political football.

I am not afraid to issue Treasury notes for this purpose. They would be just as sound as the bonds of the United States. The only difference between them and United States bonds or certificates of indebtedness is that the notes would have a circulating quality and bear no interest. By the provision of a sinking fund of not more than 3 percent per annum they could all be retired in 33 years. In that way we would get the question behind us.

I should like to see something of that sort done; but I suppose it is useless to argue in that behalf at this time. The fundamental thing is, however, as the senior Senator from California has said, that this is a question of humanity. We cannot deal with it in cold terms of concrete and steel and mortar. Here are human beings who are threatened with a great catastrophe—a catastrophe with which I am sure our great President of the United States is not in sympathy.

I earnestly hope that the Congress will remain in session until the necessary corrective measures have been enacted to save that great class of our fellow citizens who have jeopardized their lives in defense of their country from the irremediable injustices with which they are now threatened.

Mr. VANDENBERG and Mr. TRAMMELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not care to yield for a moment. I shall speak only briefly.

Mr. President, I desire to associate myself with the observations that have been submitted by the senior and the junior Senators from California, and I want to bulwark the thesis they have presented.

On yesterday, when the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], rightly or wrongly, identified the Director of the Bureau of the Budget as the primary author of these new rules and regulations and the chief source of this injustice, the able senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] with his usual fine sportsmanship and fidelity to a fellow Arizonian, undertook to say that the responsibility should not be placed at the door of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, but that it should be accepted by Congress itself; that it should be accepted by every Senator who voted for the power that now is being used with such inhumane result that even the Economy League has protested a portion of it.

Mr. President, I think the senior Senator from Arizona, from one point of view, was entirely and completely justified in what he said. I mean that any time the Senate votes away its own powers and its own prerogatives and sublets its own responsibilities to somebody else to administer for it the Senate must take all the responsibility for anything that happens, no matter how malignant, as a result of its own surrender of its own powers. On that basis I agree with the Senator from Arizona that every Senator who voted for the economy bill must take his full share of any responsibility for any untoward results. It is a bitter warning against these easy trends which are too frequently permitting bureaucracy to supersede representative democracy.

From another point of view, however—and it is the point of view to which the Senators from California have alluded—I most emphatically dissent from the philosophy submitted by the Senator from Arizona, because I insist that our votes were procured upon that measure under false pretenses. I insist that my vote was procured under promises that have not been fulfilled—on the contrary, under promises that have been specifically violated and nullified. I still stand for the economy program, in the presence of dire fiscal exigency, as that program was understood by Congress and the country and as it was specifically interpreted by administration leaders on the floor. But I believe that the country, as well as Congress, will repudiate some of the cruel excesses which have been perpetrated upon veterans of admittedly deserving status under the bureaucracy which administers the presidential powers.

There were two classes of veterans for whom I had to see some reasonable protection before I would entertain the economy bill, even under the dire pressure of that early moment in this administration when it seemed to be absolutely imperative that we should sustain the hands of the President of the United States in the first economy appeal that he made to us in behalf of his Budget and the credit of the Republic. In spite of the pressure of that crisis, there were two classes of veterans who, it seemed to me, were entitled to a particular insurance before this legislation should take this far-flung power out of the hands of Congress and transfer it to the White House to rule or ruin the lives of four or five million ex-soldiers of the United States. One class was the Spanish-American War veteran who is 35 years removed from the scene of his conflict and the time of it, and who cannot possibly go back to the original scene to relate himself specifically and in technical detail to the particular injury or disease which may have been there rooted; and we were given to understand that when we adopted the Dill amendment, submitted by the senior Senator from Washington, we were putting a fundamental and legitimate protection under the status of those particular veterans.

Then came the service-connected disability cases of the World War. The able senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has submitted the factual proof out of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that we were given the specific understanding—why, you can almost interpret it as having been a warranty—that the service-connected disability allowances would not be seriously reduced, if they were touched at all. At any rate, we certainly were given the assurance—we were given the direct promise and pledge—that no veteran with a direct service-connected disability—no battle-front casualty—would be entirely eliminated from the rolls; and yet here are case after case upon my desk of direct service-connected-disability cases that are entirely removed from the rolls; and others that are ruthlessly cut to a point beyond sufferance.

I do not propose to supplement what has been said by way of specific exhibit and detail in this behalf. I gave the Senate one case yesterday—the case of a soldier with four admitted service-connected disabilities, admitted this moment by the Veterans' Bureau to be service-connected, who is desperately incapacitated, to whom this Government has paid $90 a month for a long time by way of liquidation of the debt—who, under these new rules and regulations and brutal calculations that nullify every promise that was made to us, is now reduced to $8 a month! I beg to believe that no citizen asks, expects, or condones any such tragic economy. It is a plague upon the word.

Here is case after case—and every Senator can produce a kindred file—of veterans with direct service-connected disabilities, with records that run straight down to the front line of battle, who are reduced 50 or 75 or 80 percent in their allowances, absolutely contrary—and this is the point I insist upon making—absolutely contrary to every assurance and guaranty that was presented to the Senate when our votes were sought to clothe the President with this power against the exercise of which we now complain.

We will take our share of the responsibility, Mr. President, as the senior Senator from Arizona proposes, but we will have a share of further responsibility to answer for which by no possible rhetorical trick can be shifted to anybody else's shoulders, whether those of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, or those of the President, or anybody else, if we allow today's session to pass without affirmative, definitive legislative action which recaptures for ourselves at least one phase of the administration of justice to these veterans, as we were promised and as we intended justice should have been administered in the first place.

Mr. President, it is a poor contribution to economy to go to extremes in economy, just as, on the other hand, it was a poor contribution to the best welfare of the veterans in the heydey of things to go to extremes at that end of the equation by way of seeking extraordinary veterans' allowances. Extremes beget reciprocal extremes. The pendulum swings back. The worst service that could be rendered to permanent, sound, rational economy in behalf of the Treasury of the United States at this moment would be to allow contemporary indefensible outrages to stand without correction, because if we do not correct them we will find an outraged public opinion in this country which will sweep all the economy program off the statute books the next time the issue arises. I plead for a rule of reason, in the name of real and permanent economy, in the name of social and patriotic justice.

I want to associate myself also with the observation of the junior Senator from California respecting the present status of adjusted-service-compensation certificates. I was not one of those who believed in putting this country upon a basis of inflated paper money. I was not one of those, and I am not now, who believe inherently in returning to the greenback law of 1862, but I submit that if we are going back to the greenback basis to the extent of $3,000,000,000 for the purpose of paying obligations of this Government, if we are committed to that course, then there is every logic in this world for choosing the adjusted-service-compensation certificates as the particular obligations to be retired, regardless of their maturity.

First, because there is a more direct advantage to the Public Treasury in retiring them, inasmuch as the 4 percent sinking fund provided in the greenback law is less per annum than the annual contribution to the bonus maturity fund.

Second, because the use of the greenbacks for that particular retirement of maturities will take every veteran off every welfare relief roll in the United States, and thus carry relief and assistance to all the harassed communities of this land where they are now struggling with the relief problem.

There are other cogent reasons. I will not take the time to enlarge upon them. But they persuade me that if the question of greenbacks to pay Government obligations is settled, there is largest advantage for all concerned in paying the bonus obligation first.

I associate myself with the proposition that if we are to retire Government obligations, $3,000,000,000 worth of them, with greenbacks, it is of primary advantage to the Government itself, as a matter of simple mathematics, to retire adjusted-service-compensation certificates first.

The primary thing at this moment in this matter, however, is the other problem, related to the crimes which have been committed in the name of Presidential authority and in the name of rules and regulations under the United States Veterans' Administration supplemental to the legislation passed in the Congress.

I submit, in conclusion, as I began, Mr. President, that, so far as I am concerned, my vote upon the economy bill was procured under false pretenses if the rules and regulations are to stand as they now stand in respect to unquestionably deserving cases, and, so far as I am concerned, I want Congress to reclaim enough of its power in respect to this proposition this afternoon at least to legislate a modicum of justice in respect to these cases which every man, woman, and child under the flag wants handled with fair play.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to send to the desk an amendment, and I give notice that I shall ask for a suspension of the rules that I may offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). An amendment is pending.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I understood there was no amendment pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending, an amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan a question. It is my understanding that 68 or 70 American soldiers lost the sight of both eyes in the World War. Is it the Senator's understanding that the compensation of those men will be lessened, will be cut down?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am unable to answer the Senator, because I would not undertake to prophesy what will happen under the administration of the rules and regulations as now administered. I have seen things just as horrible happen, and I would not undertake to assure the Senator that such a thing will not happen in the case even of the blind.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make an observation at that point?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. REED. This morning, within an hour of this moment, I saw at this center door of the Senate a veteran from my State who had had one leg shot off in the Argonne and the other so badly hurt that he has permanently lost the use of it. He has been classified since his discharge from the Army as permanently totally disabled. There is no room for discretion in the Veterans' Administration; the buck cannot be passed to them, because the service connection is as plain as can be. It was an enemy shell that took his leg off. The degree of the injury is plain for anyone to see, so that what happened cannot be blamed on the discretion of the Veterans' Administration. Yet that man, under the regulations recently issued, has been reduced from $100 a month to $40 a month, and he has a letter in his pocket to prove it.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, I may say, for the information of the Senate, that I have in my correspondence two letters from totally blind soldiers in my own State, in which the information is given me that their compensation is reduced, and that they were among the few members of the United States Army who suffered the loss of the sight of both eyes in the World War.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I may say, in that connection, that I have two communications from war veterans who are totally blind, and the records show their service connection, but their compensation has been reduced from $90 a month to $20 a month.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this morning the Senator from California, with his usual eloquence, tried to fasten the blame for all this condition solely upon the Veterans' Administration. I think it is important to remember that in cases such as the one I mentioned a little while ago, or in cases such as those mentioned by the Senator from Florida, the Veterans' Administration used no discretion whatever. It was the regulations promulgated by President Roosevelt which forced those reductions. When we are looking for responsibility it is well to remember that the Veterans' Administration cannot be blamed for all that has been done under the Economy Act.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, on March 14 last, when this matter was before the Senate, I made what was for me a rather lengthy speech criticizing the legislation. I was pretty severely criticized by some Members of the Senate for voting in favor of it upon its final passage. In order that I may have the Senate understand my position and my prediction at the time, I desire to read briefly from a portion of that speech, appearing on pages 326 and 327 of the RECORD, where I stated:

> With this criticism of this legislation, I appreciate that my vote in favor of it will not be particularly welcomed by those sponsoring it, and I want to say that I am supporting it solely because the administration is demanding it as an essential part of a successful program. I have endeavored to make clear that as I understand the position of the President, notwithstanding the fact that he has an overwhelming majority of his party in the House and an overwhelming majority of his party in the Senate, his hands are tied. He is absolutely powerless, if not hopeless, unless this dictatorial power shall be given to him, and given to him promptly. It is difficult for me to understand, if he be the leader that his partisans believe him to be and if his party in the House and in the Senate has the efficient leaders that we know it to have, why he should not be able to put through any such important legislation promptly and effectively, without depriving the Congress of its power and relieving them of any of their responsibilities. But it is not for me to undertake to find the reasons that motivate his request. My loyalty to my country demands that I take him at his word and trust that his judgment in administrating this law will be equal to his sense of justice. If his judgment and his sense of justice both be accurate, my prediction is that the saving will not amount to more than 50 percent of that which he has estimated, and I am afraid that the time will not be far distant when I shall regret that I supported this bill at all; indeed, I am wondering as I am about to cast my vote whether I am influenced by patriotism or whether, after all, I am influenced by cowardice.

Mr. President, I heard yesterday the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] state that no Member of the Congress ought to complain about the present situation because he acted within his own powers, he joined in giving these powers to the President, and, having given them to the President, he has no right to complain.

I respectfully submit that that is not an accurate statement of what many of us believe. It is true that I doubted whether or not the President might act with that justice which the Members of the Congress believed to be justice, but we did act with the assurance of the President that it was necessary, in order for him to balance the Budget, that he be given this specific authority, and we were assured at the time that if given this authority he would see that no injustice was done to any of the veterans of the World War.

While I cast my vote in favor of the bill, I did it with a great deal of doubt, realizing that it was the Congress itself which ought to decide what was justice and what was an injustice, and that we ought not to leave that to any Veterans' Administration, or to the President himself. But, being assured by the President that it was necessary for him to have this power in order to carry out his program, with the greatest reluctance I voted for the measure, saying at the same time that, in my judgment, if the President did justice, he would not save more than 50 percent of that which he estimated he would be able to save.

I repeat now that if he does justice to the soldiers, he will be able to save not more than 50 percent of that which he estimated, through the committees which were approached upon the subject, and listening to the testimony given by the Director of the Budget. I say now that not more than 50 percent could he save and do justice to these soldiers. I do not know what ought to be done; I think, as many other Senators think, that we probably made a mistake in giving this authority to any single individual. We ought to have kept it within our own power; we ought to have held the authority where it was, and we ought to have had courage enough to have cut these appropriations where they ought to have been cut; but it is a good deal better to trust a majority of the Congress, that has the responsibility of raising the taxes to meet these various obligations as they become due, to do justice than it is to trust it to a single individual.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have listened to this discussion with much interest. It has been most instructive. It recalls incidents of my boyhood days down in southern Illinois. We used to have each year what was called a revival meeting. It was a season of deep and moving repentance. At such revival meetings there was a "mourners' bench." To that place people came regularly from all quarters and confessed their sins, their mistakes, and promised their God that they would do better in the future. My observation led me to note that the professions seem to carry them along for about 3 or 4 months and that then many were back at the same practices. I have little doubt that, notwithstanding the confessions this day, notwithstanding the deep contrition, it will not be long until we are back at our old practices of granting power to others when our clear duty is to assume responsibility ourselves.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I could not distinctly hear the Senator from Idaho. Did he say "professions" or "confessions"?

Mr. BORAH. I said "confessions."

Mr. President, there can be little doubt that great injustices have been done under the economy law, due to the rules and regulations which were established; but it seems to me that we must admit that we authorized those things to be done. We were told that there would be a saving under the proposed law of some $400,000,000, and we must have known that there was no possible way to accomplish that except through the drastic methods which have been employed. They seem to me to have been entirely too severe. I know in some instances they have resulted in what has literally been cruelty. The only clear-cut remedy I can see for this situation is to modify or change the terms of the law. If we are not willing to recall this power, after we have observed the manner in which it operates, it will be a second confession upon our part that we are perfectly willing for someone else to assume the responsibility.

I myself am in favor, Mr. President, of radical changes in the Economy Act, and I doubt if we shall be able to accomplish anything in the way of real relief where it ought to be had unless we take hold of the law itself and remodel it and remedy it. I know that there are some proposals now pending or which will be pending in a short time with that end in view, and I trust, Mr. President, instead of leaving this power where it may be misused and abused, we shall assume the responsibility which is ours and which was reposed in us by those who sent us here. If there shall be abuses in the future, it will be because of the fact that we are unwilling to change the measure. The supreme question here is whether we are willing to retrace our steps and rewrite the measure and assume the responsibility which is ours. I see no other way, Mr. President, to correct the evil of which we complain; I myself am ready to make the change, and I trust that the measures which are to be proposed will be effectual to that end. We should assume our full responsibility, do our duty, and do it in full; cease granting powers we ought not to grant, and then complain because these powers are not exercised according to our views. All this trouble arises out of our failure to meet our obligations as legislators.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the addresses delivered today in the Senate will compare favorably with those of any day's proceedings in the history of the Senate. I repeat what I said yesterday, as follows:

> I assume my share of the blame, if any. I hide behind no President. I hide behind no Budget Director. I take the blame for any wrong that was done and shall employ my time in trying to correct the injustice, if any, rather than in finding someone to blame for my own acts.
> The excuse of blaming someone else for our wrongs, if any, is so stale that it avails nothing.

Mr. President, I believe there is sufficient statesmanship in this Senate frankly to admit an error and then to try vigorously to correct the same. As a boy, I was amazed to learn that many of the men who were Members of Congress in 1873 when silver was demonetized, spent some years thereafter complaining that they "did not know what they were doing" when they voted to demonetize silver. Many men who were in Congress in 1873, when asked to explain their votes for demonetization, said to their constituents, "I did not know what I was doing." Others said, "John Sherman tricked me. I did not know that we were demonetizing silver." Still others said, "I did not know the effect of the bill."

Such excuses do not impress me.

Therefore, Mr. President, I agree with the speeches of the Senators from California [Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. MCADOO] and I practically always agree with the speeches of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I am gratified to perceive that Senators are willing to assume the blame for injustices on the economy bill. Senators, one by one, are beginning to see that the manly, frank, upstanding thing to do is to say that the Congress was to blame for the wrongs committed.

Mr. President, it may sometime occur to us that it is of doubtful wisdom to grant to others powers which the Constitution reposed in us. I recall in my early days of service here the Secretary of the Interior had the power, under Presidential order, to create reservations, and that vast tracts of public land were being withdrawn from the people into unnecessary preserves. Time after time Senators would say, "Yes; I voted to give the Secretary of the Interior the power to create reserves, but I never imagined that he would withdraw such vast tracts of land." Senators have read history upside down or have not read history at all who fail to perceive that whenever power is granted to another you may anticipate that such power may, at times, be employed differently from your views.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I hope the sound doctrine which the Senator is now announcing will be recalled by all Senators when they come to study and consider and pass upon the industrial control bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I have not studied that bill sufficiently to know just what I ought to do, but I will lay a wager that if I do vote for the bill and it then turns out to be unsatisfactory I shall not blame the President.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does not the Senator think that the Members of the Senate were entitled to rely upon the assurances of the President that if we gave him this power he would deal justly with the soldiers? Is it not true that Senators at the time they gave the authority had a right to assume that after the authority was given the President would not do differently from that which he had promised the Senate to do?

Mr. ASHURST. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. The question I ask is whether or not the Members of the Senate were not entitled, partially at least, to rely upon the President's assurance that if we gave him this authority he would act justly with the soldiers?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. May I say that I have not any doubt that the President thinks he is acting justly? Has the Senator from Delaware such doubt?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; I have.

Mr. BORAH. I cannot conceive that the President, however mistaken he may be in judgment, is conscious of acting unjustly in this matter.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think that he must be conscious of it if he is as intelligent as I know him to be. He must be conscious, if these matters have been brought to his attention, that a great injustice has been done the soldiers.

Mr. BORAH. He is doing exactly what we knew he would do. We know perfectly well when we delegate these innumerable powers that the President of the United States cannot personally execute them. We know perfectly well that he is going to delegate them to others, and that is exactly what the President has done, and will continue to do; and if the Congress shall continue to grant powers, so multitudinous that no single individual in the world can encompass them and utilize them, we know that we are not going to have the judgment of the President, and cannot have. That is the reason why we ought not to grant them.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, because of the statement made by several Members of the Senate as to the action of the President and the statement that the rates of compensation fixed would on July 1 go into effect, I assume that they did not know of the statement I made yesterday to the Senate, and I ask permission to repeat it.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BYRNES. The President of the United States, having had called to his attention by many ex-service men the effect of the regulations, has called the officials of the administration into conference, and has stated that the regulations, insofar as they provide the rates of compensation originally announced, will not be put into effect on July 1, but that certainly, on the contrary, as to men suffering disabilities of service origin, those rates of compensation are to be increased. A final determination as to the increase has not been reached so that it could be published today, but within the next few days it will be published, and the rates which have aroused the antagonism of Senators will never be put into effect insofar as the ex-service men suffering service-connected disabilities are concerned.

The President has appointed a committee, several members of which have been selected, which committee is to visit every hospital in the country and to investigate such charges as have been made today upon the floor of the Senate as to the treatment of men and as to the facilities available in the hospitals of the country. His instructions to the committee will be to report to him so that if any injustice is done to any man by any of those who are in charge of the hospitals of the Nation, that injustice will be remedied and the facilities of the hospitals will be made available and used.

Furthermore, by direction of the President, a review is now being made of all those cases wherein the Veterans' Administration has held that the cases came within the class of presumptively service-connected, in order that no injustice may be done to any man who was removed from the rolls because he was only service-connected by presumption.

In addition to that, in this appropriation bill there is carried sufficient money to pay for the increased compensation that will be paid as the result of the action of the President, and when the Congress meets in January next any deficiency that is necessary in order to pay the expenses of the Veterans' Administration for the balance of the fiscal year can be provided. Until there has been a review of these presumptive cases, until there has been an investigation of the hospital facilities and of conditions prevailing in those hospitals, it would be idle and futile for us to seek to provide any amount of money in this bill.

If any man wants to say that he was deceived by any statements made on the floor of the Senate and if the Economy Act should be modified or repealed, it should be done by a proper legislative commitee and it should not be attempted here as a rider to an appropriation bill. We cannot possibly give the proper consideration to amendments offered here upon the floor of the Senate for such a purpose. Whenever we have attempted any such thing the result has been disastrous. We cannot possibly do justice when an amendment is offered to provide that there shall be no cut exceeding 25 percent for service-origin cases, because under the rates tentatively agreed upon service-origin cases will be reduced not more than 18 or 20 percent on the average, which is less than the prevailing rate. That ought to afford ample opportunity for doing justice.

There has been a rearrangement of the basis of these cases. Under the old law if a man lost a leg, for instance, he was paid in accordance with his ability to earn an income prior to his entrance into the World War, and one man who had lost a leg would receive more for that injury than his neighbor would receive. Under the existing regulations an effort has been made to put all men on the same basis and treat them alike, just as the Federal Employees' Compensation Act does. There will be not more than an 18 to 20 percent cut, according to the information I have, in the service-origin cases upon the average.

I make this statement only because some Members of the Senate are under the impression evidently that the rates heretofore published by the Veterans' Administration are to go into effect on July 1.

May I say further, and I think it should be said, that reference has been made to men who are disabled by reason of wounds received in battle. If I understood the statement upon the floor of the Senate, such a man has been removed from the rolls. If so, it was directly in contradiction of regulations and of the law, and could occur only by the misconduct of some man in the Veterans' Administration. Such a case certainly ought to be reported and the Veterans' Administration given an opportunity to correct it. No one for a moment would agree that there was any excuse for such action.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina if his understanding is that the order heretofore made reducing the amount paid in compensation in service-connected cases is going to be revoked?

Mr. BYRNES. That is exactly correct.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have communications from probably 30 or 40 service-connected cases where as a rule the reduction has been from $90 to $20 a month.

Mr. BYRNES. May I say to the Senator that since the passage of the Economy Act there is a different basis in that the effort has been made, and the regulations provide, that all men be placed on an equality in the case, for instance, of the loss of a leg. Prior to that time there was a difference. We will find many cases where a man whose ability to earn money was greater than that of his neighbor received as a result of that fact a larger amount of money for the same loss. Some men would receive more as a result of the regulations and some less, but the compensation for injury to the ex-service man will be placed on an equality.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. BONE. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina with reference to the matter he has just mentioned. On page 43 of the bill there is a reference to the expense for maintenance and operation, medical, hospital, and domiciliary services, Veterans' Administration, for which an appropriation of $85,000,000 is provided. On page 48 is a general appropriation of $231,730,000 for pensions, gratuities, and allowances now authorized under any act of Congress.

What objection could there be to an increase in the appropriations in line with what the Senator has stated, if the Government is going to undertake a greater measure of justice? The Senator has said it can be made up by deficiency appropriations. I do not want to leave here with this thing hanging fire and haunting us like Banquo's ghost. In my State are hundreds of veterans who suffered most grievous wounds, and I do not want to be compelled to say to them that we will have to rely first upon some generous impulse of somebody in some department and, secondly, upon some deficiency appropriation which I shall be compelled to vote for later. I want to be very, very certain that we now do justice.

Yesterday I adverted to ship subsidies, none of which we are touching, under which millions and millions of dollars are being paid for hauling a few pounds of mail. But it seems that those things are sacrosanct, and we are assured upon the most respectable authority that we do not dare touch them because they involve some sacred contract. But this contract, sacred or otherwise, privileged or otherwise, that we have made with these soldiers, it seems we do not hesitate to touch.

Mr. BYRNES. I agree with the Senator in his position with reference to the subsidies and have voted that way. As to the first question he asks, the only reason is that until there is a definite revision of the schedules it is impossible to estimate the amount of money that would be needed. It would not be wise for a committee to act before we have the certain knowledge that we will have to provide sufficient amounts of money to take care of all the disbursements that will be made. Whenever an estimate is sent up in regular form, estimating the amount necessary for us to appropriate, I know there will be no hesitation on the part of Congress to make the appropriation.

Mr. BONE. I do not want to prolong the discussion unduly or occupy the floor to the disadvantage of the Senator from Arizona, but I was very much interested yesterday in the statement of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] who said that, in his judgment, the cut for Spanish War veterans would amount to 67 percent, for World War veterans 72 percent, for Civil War veterans 10 percent, and for peace-time injuries, and so on, 15 percent. If that is true, it becomes vitally important before we leave here that we make at least some honest effort to correct that condition.

I recognize the force of what the Senator from South Carolina has said, but on the other hand the Veterans' Administration is now making these drastic cuts. Certainly the charges made on the floor of the Senate cannot all be untrue and false, and I do not want to leave here while this is hanging over us.

Mr. BYRNES. The information furnished the committee is that these cuts were based upon regulations that were adopted to go into effect July 1. They were presented to the President and he has undertaken to revise them in the manner I have stated. He has stated, and with authority from him I can state, that they have been revised and those cuts will not go into effect.

Mr. BONE. I find myself in harmony with the position taken by both Senators from California, who have very largely expressed my own views.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that my amendment has not yet been voted upon and I would not want the Senate to be left under the impression, and I am sure the Senator did not intend to have it so left, that it is necessary for us to wait until the hospitals have been visited in order to begin to use the facilities of the hospitals. I received my information directly from the Veterans' Bureau that there are 15,000 beds not being used.

Mr. BYRNES. There are 9,000 in veterans' hospitals and 6,000 in Army and Navy hospitals. I am in favor of the Senator's amendment and should like to have that one amendment voted upon and see if we cannot make a little headway. There is no opposition to it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I, for one, am willing and anxious to vote to remain in session as long as may be necessary to correct the evils and injustices of the Economy Act.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I want to ask a question of the Senator from South Carolina, but before doing so I want to invite attention to one fact, and that is that while the rerating of veterans is now going on, to become effective, of course, on the date fixed in the act, to wit, July 1, and not before, the veterans are actually being turned away from the hospitals—that is, those veterans who, under Executive order, are not entitled to enter.

There are other features of the Economy Act as expressed in the Executive order that are also presently effective. It is true that where compensation has been awarded or allowed, the veteran is now rerated and is merely notified that under the rerating he is entitled to a lesser amount or is taken off the roll, but that order does not become effective until July 1. That is not true in the case of veterans, however, who have been discharged from the hospital or who were refused admittance into the hospital; nor is it true with respect to other benefits which the veterans, it seems to me, are entitled to receive.

For instance, under the Executive order an award granted before the passage of the Economy Act but not paid is actually being withheld from the veteran and he cannot receive it. What I wanted to ask of the Senator from South Carolina, however, is whether the President proposes to amend his Executive order only with respect to the cuts made in the compensation paid in the direct service-connected disability cases, or does he also propose to amend it and is an investigation to be pursued for the purpose of ascertaining other injustices that may be made apparent in the administration of his Executive order?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, my understanding is that the latter statement is correct; that as to Veterans' Regulation No. 1, with reference to the treatment of ex-service men in hospitals, which, according to the information I have, has caused the complaint of which the Senator has heard and all of us have heard, an investigation is to be made, and is to be made according to my information by a committee outside of the Veterans' Administration—certainly some members are to serve on that committee who are not within the Administration—to do what the Senator has in mind, ascertain whether or not these injustices have been done, and if so, to remedy them. In response to the rest of the Senator's questions, as to other benefits under the act, an investigation is to be made as to such compensation, not confined solely to those ex-service men suffering from disability.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask if I correctly understood the Senator to say that the President would extend the period in which his Executive order should go into effect until further investigation could be made?

Mr. BYRNES. I do not know that. If that is true, I have not so understood. The only information I had from the President was as to the statement I have heretofore made as to the ex-service men suffering from disabilities of service origin, having been already determined tentatively, and that a further investigation will be made as to all other features of the act, and a committee appointed from without the Veterans' Administration to investigate the charges that have been made, referred to by the Senator, as to the hospital situation.

Mr. GEORGE. I thank the Senator, and desire to say that I agree that it is not wise to undertake to rewrite the veterans' act in a bill of this character. There may be some things and there are some things like hospitalization benefits, or some specific matter with which Senators are entirely familiar, that may be corrected in the consideration of an appropriation bill, but we probably will get into difficulties if we undertake to write the entire legislation over. If, however, there is to be a further study of veterans' legislation by the President, I desire to take this occasion to suggest that not only is the cut too severe in the case of all veterans suffering from a direct service-connected disability or the dependents of such veterans, but it seems to me also that in that class of cases in which most of the widows of veterans of the World War find themselves—that is to say, where the veteran himself has established service connection for his disability by the presumptions that were allowed under the law prior to the passage of the Economy Act—the widows and dependents of such veterans should be permitted to continue to receive the pension or allowance or award that heretofore has been payable to such widows and such dependents.

In other words, the Economy Act and the Executive orders thereunder having taken away the benefits of all presumptions as written into the law prior to the passage of the Economy Act, the widow whose husband had established his right to compensation by virtue of the presumptions existing in the law now finds that she is deprived, or will be deprived after July 1, of all pension or of all award for herself and her children, if she have dependents. That certainly is a feature of the law that ought to be modified.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. There are cases, likewise, where if a veteran had been alive it might not have been necessary to depend upon the presumptions, where he could have furnished the actual proof.

Mr. GEORGE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WHEELER. Now, when the veteran has passed away, the widow is absolutely unable to furnish the necessary proof and must depend upon the record that has already been made.

Mr. GEORGE. I was about to make the observation that at the time the veteran filed his claim for compensation it was suggested to him—indeed, the law invited him—to make out his case under existing law. He was content to establish his right to receive compensation under the law as then written, with all of the presumptions that we had seen fit to put into the law. Now, since he is dead, and since his compensation was awarded on the presumption of service connection, his widow finds herself stripped of the small pension that she was entitled to receive and is yet entitled to receive, under existing law, up until July 1. That certainly is a feature of the Executive order and the Economy Act that ought to be dealt with by the President in his amendments to his Executive order.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to say to the Senator from Georgia that having occasion to go to the White House this morning in connection with another matter, the question of veterans' legislation was brought up by the President. He told me, and authorized me to say, that he realized there were many injustices in the regulations as written; that he had been in contact with many of the outstanding men in the American Legion, and that he was proposing to select some of the outstanding men of the Legion to go about the country—probably in the vicinity in which they were located, perhaps on a wider scale—and to ascertain these injustices as rapidly as possible; and as rapidly as they came to his desk, where there were cases of injustice, he would immediately promulgate the necessary regulations to offset them.

He brought up particularly the Spanish-American War veterans, who in most cases have reached an age where compensation has more basis than perhaps for younger men. He expressed his solicitude and desire to deal with these men as fairly as it could be done. I feel myself, at least after having had that talk, that these regulations are in no wise final; that the President is aware of the fact that they bristle with injustices; and that as rapidly as these injustices are called to his attention they will be corrected, insofar as they can be corrected by regulation.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Maryland what in the meantime will happen to these veterans who have already been deprived of their compensation by previous regulations?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say to the Senator from New Mexico that I have not any doubt that there will be some injustices done no matter how diligent the President is; and may I say that if we were to stay here for 6 months and devote each and every hour to the rewriting of the veterans' provisions, even after we had spent 6 months on the matter, we would find that there would still be injustices.

The way I see the matter is that we should have made these corrections in Congress. I for one tried to have a bill of that character written in the last Congress, but Congress would not do it. There were certain injustices done to the Government, and in an attempt to get rid of those injustices we perhaps gave more authority than was wise. I am convinced, nevertheless, that as fast as injustices are brought to light, the President will correct them; and certainly I see nothing more that anybody can do in the circumstances which confront us at this time.

I should like to add that I believe, though I am speaking without any authority on this point, that where an injustice has been done a veteran, in correcting it the correction will be made retroactive, so that even though there would be a period of time elapsing before the injustice could be corrected, certainly the policy has been heretofore, and no doubt will be in the future, to make it retroactive in that respect.

Mr. CUTTING. That will do a great deal of good to the veteran when he is already dead.

Mr. LONG. Yes; that will help him some—to give him a tombstone!

Mr. TYDINGS. What would the Senator from New Mexico suggest as a better way to do it than the policy we now have?

Mr. CUTTING. By passing legislation this afternoon we can save hundreds of thousands of cases of hardship and injustice to veterans. We may not make the Economy Act into a perfect bill; I do not pretend that we can; but we can enormously improve it.

Mr. TYDINGS. What legislation, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. CUTTING. I have an amendment myself, which I propose, limiting the President to 25 percent reduction on direct combat-connected cases.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not denying that there can be some amendments made here on the floor that may be sound and just; but after having been through at least two Congresses where an attempt was made to cut off those who were not rightly on the rolls, and having seen nothing come of it, I somewhat despair of any sound action being taken by Congress at this time.

Mr. CUTTING. Well, let us do the best we can this afternoon; and if there is something that we fail to do, let the President's committee attend to it later on.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the utterances of Senators this afternoon make it entirely clear to everybody that the regulations which have been promulgated by the Veterans' Bureau are about to work very harsh and cruel injustices upon many thousands of veterans.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], in his statement, says that when individual injustices appear, and they are ascertained by this committee which is to be appointed, of course, the President will rectify them when they come to his desk. Well, Mr. President, we all know—and we knew when we passed the act—that it is a physical impossibility for the President of the United States to pass upon individual cases of injustice.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. In just a moment. Why, the head of the Veterans' Bureau himself, General Hines, can not do that. He never has done it. He has had a board which passes upon individual cases, and they reach him only by a process of appeal; and even when they get to him very, very few of them ever come under his personal supervision.

I now yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I just wanted to make more explicit a statement upon which the Senator has assumed my position.

The President said that he was asking several men—one of the men he named was the former president of the American Legion, Mr. Owsley, from the Senator's own State—to go around to these various veterans' centers or hospitals, and there ascertain, in the application of the new regulations, where injustices would occur, and advise him, so that he could act immediately upon them. I did use the expression "individual cases"; but I used it in an illustrative sense rather than in the sense of the actual treating of one individual case.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, what the Senator from Maryland now says illustrates exactly what I was undertaking to say. The fault is not with individual cases, but the chief fault is in the regulations which, by their universality of application, cannot help but work injustices in thousands of cases.

I know that the President is a kind-hearted, generous man. I know that the distinguished board of legionnaires which may be appointed, according to the statements of the Senator from Maryland, is a good one. But the generality of the rule cannot be determined by one or two isolated cases. These regulations are fundamentally so drastic in their changes that they are going to operate upon thousands of deserving war-scarred and war-torn veterans, and we do not need to visit any hospital to find that out. We can read the regulations, and compare them with the law theretofore in effect, in the office of the Veterans' Administration, or in our own offices, and we can find out that they are too drastic and too harsh, and were never intended by the Congress when it passed the Economy Act.

Mr. President, I happen to be a member of the Committee on Finance of the Senate. When the economy bill came before the Finance Committee it was brought in hurriedly; it was acted upon under pressure, and I voted against reporting the bill at that time because it had not had and did not receive proper consideration in the Committee on Finance. We could not, within the time which the committee gave to the bill, anticipate, we could not even survey, the consequences which were apt to flow from a drastic and arbitrary promulgation of rules not by the President in person but by those of his subordinates who necessarily had to be entrusted with the details of drafting these regulations.

When the bill reached the floor of the Senate some 25 or 30 amendments were adopted, as Senators will recall. On the final passage of the measure I voted for it. I voted for it, as other Senators did, on the solemn assurance of those high in authority that it would be administered in a liberal and in a generous spirit.

If the President could physically pass upon all these cases, if he could pass upon all these regulations in detail, in the light of the experience of the Veterans' Administration, that would be one thing; but it is wholly another thing for some subordinate to undertake to cut the compensation not according to the necessities of the veterans, nor in accordance with justice, but to cut the compensation according to some arbitrary rule of apportioning a lump-sum amount of money which is proposed to be appropriated.

I understand, Mr. President, that in some cases these cuts were made—upon what basis I do not know—simply by allocating a lump sum of so many million dollars for a certain kind of disability, and then going down the list and figuring up the number of men eligible, and reducing their compensation according to the dollar standard, rather than apportioning the appropriation according to the necessity of the cases.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I think the Senator has put his finger directly on the point of error. I was one who voted for the economy bill, and I would vote against its repeal now. I want to have an opportunity to have it worked out. But evidently there was a mistake in estimating the amount of reduction, and then going ahead and reducing the compensation of veterans without taking into account whether it would affect injuriously and unfairly certain individuals or not. I think the error is in our effort to reduce, rather than to correct errors. I think that is the source of the difficulty. On the other hand, I think it can be adjusted. It will not be an easy problem, but I think it can be adjusted by leaving the power with the President to handle it. He can do it if he sees fit to, not under his regulations, but under the freedom we have given to him. I am inclined to leave the power where it is for the time being.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Ohio for his suggestion that we are now discussing the real point of weakness in what has been done. But let me suggest to the Senator from Ohio further that, in the matter of reducing the compensation of civilian employees of the Government, we did not undertake it by any such standard as was applied to the veterans. We said they should be reduced not more than a certain percentage. In the case of the veterans, I believe it is sound for us to adopt a statute, or an amendment to the pending bill, providing that compensation for service-connected disabilities should not be reduced more than a certain percentage. It would still be up to the President and the Veterans' Administration to determine whether or not a veteran's disabilities were service connected. It would still be within the power of the Administration to say whether or not his classification was proper. But when it is once established that the disability is service connected, when it is once shown that the veteran's compensation, according to the old rates of pay, is a just and fair one, I believe we ought to adopt the same rule and say that in that kind of case the compensation should not be reduced more than a certain percentage.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In connection with the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio, it is difficult for me to understand why Senators are now surprised to find that the regulations promulgated under the Economy Act are harsh, and are creating widespread injustice. We were told very frankly, when the bill was under consideration, that it was proposed that $400,000,000 be taken out of the hides of the veterans under the Economy Act, and how any Senator could figure at that time that $400,000,000 could be cut from the compensation and allowances and benefits paid to veterans and not produce injustices and widespread hardship I cannot understand.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin in his remarks agrees with what I was trying to express a little while ago, when I said that the only proper standard for the Congress to follow is, first, to find out the worthy and deserving cases, and then fix the amount of money that we shall spend, not in a lump sum, but in accordance with what we regard each classification of the cases is entitled to, taking into consideration a proper reduction in the former amount allowed. It is cruel and unjust simply to say we are going to save so many hundred million dollars, or so many million dollars, with respect to any particular activity, without considering the merits of the claims of those whom we are undertaking to relieve.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Wisconsin has said that we were told over and over that $400,000,000 would be saved. I do not think that impressed anybody in the Senate when that sort of talk was being indulged in at the time the economy bill was under consideration, because none of us could see where that amount of money could be saved. I take it for granted that every Member of the Senate who voted for the economy bill voted to give authority to the President to correct certain things which had crept into the legislation which we here were not able to correct. We confessed our inability to do it, and the argument yesterday and today demonstrates absolutely that there is no possibility of economizing on the floor of the Senate, for we are now ready to undo all that was done.

The Senator from Texas, the Senator from Ohio, and other Senators, who voted for the economy bill, voted with the purpose of correcting what ought to be corrected, and what obviously ought to be corrected without any particular regard to how much was going to be saved, but with the idea only that there would be certain savings. So far as the $400,000,000 goes, the talk about that saving never got anywhere with anyone here who was intelligent.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, allow me to say to the Senator from Ohio that I do not think any Senator has said that he wants to entirely undo everything that was done through the enactment of the Economy Act. No Senator here now is proposing to do that. What Senators are suggesting is that, under that act, on the 1st day of July the regulations which have already been promulgated will become effective in all cases, and many individual cases which have already been cut off the rolls will have been separated entirely from the Government rolls.

Can the Congress sit here without paying some attention to that situation? Can we ignore entirely the realities? Every one knows that between now and the 1st of July the President cannot physically correct this situation. It is physically impossible for him to do it. But the Senate may lay down a rule of action; it may prescribe certain standards by which the President can be guided, which will aid the President and not put upon him the tremendous responsibility of all features of the legislation and the administration of it.

Mr. President, when the economy bill was before the Senate, on the 15th of March, the Senator from Texas, who now has the floor, offered an amendment, as appears on page 449 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, substantially like that now offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING]. In the amendment which I proposed it was provided, let me say to the Senator from Ohio, that service-connected cases of the World War and Spanish-American War should not be cut more than 25 percent. It left the matter of the rating to the Veterans' Administration. It left the question of fact, the determination of whether or not the veterans' disabilities were service connected or not, to the Veterans' Administration, under the law, but it provided that service-connected cases, including those of Spanish-American War veterans, should not be cut more than 25 percent.

Just here let me suggest to the Senate that the cases of the Spanish-American War veterans, as was pointed out by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] a moment ago, present a particularly appealing aspect of this situation. The average age of the Spanish-American War veteran is 59 years, I understand, and yet, under the terms of the economy law, more than half of them will be cut entirely off the roll, with no compensation whatever. There is a provision in the economy law that a Spanish-American War veteran 62 years of age could not be cut entirely off, and what happened? The Director of the Budget, or the Veterans' Administration, or somebody, provided that those soldiers, while they should not be cut off the roll, should receive only $6 per month, though the statute required that they be allowed to stay on the roll, but that was all; they just left their names on the roll and cut off all compensation except $6.

Under the present regulations the disabilities of Spanish-American War veterans are presumed to be service-connected, and yet that is a myth, it is a mere pretext, because most of them applied after the act of 1920, and in the questionnaire which they filled out they were asked when they were first taken sick, when their disability first arose.

In practically all cases, of course, they state a date subsequent to the ending of the Spanish-American War. Their ailments may have had their seeds back in the Spanish-

American War, but they did not develop until after the war. Under rules and regulations all the Veterans' Bureau has to do is to pull out the application for pension, and when it discloses on its face that the disability arose after the Spanish-American War, that overcomes the presumption, and off that veteran goes from the rolls. So the regulations as promulgated have resulted in a wholesale slaughter of veterans of the Spanish-American War.

I presume the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] will bear witness to that fact. He is in touch, I know, with the situation.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I am interested in the remarks of the Senator from Texas, and I should like to say that, as he doubtless knows, despite the presumption in favor of the Spanish-American War veterans, which was agreed to by the proponents of the Economy Act, they are now being called upon to furnish evidence to establish that their disabilities were of service origin.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Georgia is eminently correct. In many cases they are now required to submit proof to show the connection of their disabilities with their service in the Spanish-American War. Everybody knows of the inadequate hospital facilities and of the poor medical facilities during the Spanish-American War. No records were kept in many cases. At the morning sick call at regimental headquarters when probably 50 men responded, it was simply registered in a little book that they came there. Those records, in many cases, have been destroyed, and in most cases of Spanish-American War veterans it is absolutely impossible to prove service connection of disabilities because of the lapse of years, the inadequacy of the records, and the poor quality of the hospital services.

The other day I received a letter from an old veteran of the Spanish-American War who happened to be a member of the same regiment in which I served. He asked me to send him an affidavit, and if I did not remember when he was sick in the hospital at Miami. Of course, I know that many of those soldiers were sick, but I could not make the affidavit he referred to because I had no personal recollection of that particular man's illness.

Mr. LEWIS rose.

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Illinois if he desires.

Mr. LEWIS. No; I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I will not disturb the Senator now.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Illinois cannot disturb the Senator from Texas except to arouse very pleasant emotions.

Mr. LEWIS. I am gratified at that gracious expression on the part of the Senator from Texas, but I shall not disturb the Senator, whose speech, cogent and powerful, addresses itself to my approval.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am very grateful to the distinguished Senator from Illinois, than whom there is in the Senate no more eminent judge of diction and delivery, of both of which he is a master.

Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to trust the President of the United States, when he has information, when it is physically possible for him to review these individual cases I should be willing to trust his judgment and his action in any individual case before the Veterans' Bureau, but I believe, in view of the situation that has arisen, that Congress is justified in placing some limitation upon the power of those who are to administer the Economy Act.

For myself I expect to support the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] which places a 25 percent limitation upon the reduction of compensation in service-connected cases.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, would the Senator from New York have any objection to disposing of the so-called "Black amendment", as to which there is no controversy, so that one of the other amendments to the bill may be offered?

Mr. COPELAND. I have no objection to that being done.

Mr. BYRNES. It would facilitate matters. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama has been pending for about 3 hours, and I ask for a vote on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. May I propose my amendment now so that it may be pending? Will the Senator from New York yield for that purpose?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I now offer the proposal for a suspension of the rule so that I may offer the amendment referred to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the notice and amendment of the Senator from Florida. The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] in the meantime will retain the floor.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Pursuant to the provisions of rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H.R. 5389), the independent offices appriation bill, the following amendment, viz:

On page 61, between lines 6 and 7, add a new section, as follows:

"That title I of Public, No. 2, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

"'SEC. 21. That regardless of any provisions embraced in title I, of an act to maintain the credit of the United States Government, being Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the compensation of those veterans who on March 20, 1933, were drawing compensation on account of service-connected disability shall not be reduced more than 10 percent. In any review of a veteran's case by the Veterans' Administration with a view to reducing the rating of or change the cause of his disability the burden of proof shall rest upon the Government.'"

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in theory, at least, the purpose of debate in this body is to elucidate and clarify the problems presented. So far as I am concerned, I confess I grow more and more confused regarding the status of the payment to the veterans. Yesterday we heard a very well-organized, logical, and convincing address by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER]. He stated repeatedly in his address and in reply to questions of Senators that the law is clear; that all our troubles come from the regulations which have been formulated to carry out the law.

It is our duty to find the truth. I think the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] intimated, if he did not say in so many words, that the trouble is with the law. He suggested facetiously that the "mourners' bench" is now very popular, and I confess that I am a candidate for a place on that bench.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I am speaking for two Senators on this side who voted against the Economy Act when I say that the application of the Senator from New York is accepted for a seat on that bench.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator. I have had many regrets about the way I voted, and I want to know now, as soon as I can, whether or not we were misled into voting for that law. I never thought when I voted as I did, in accord with the party caucus, that such cruelty would be perpetrated as has followed the operation of the law—or, at least, the manner of its application.

I referred yesterday to a Spanish War veteran who came to my office day before yesterday. He had served for years in the National Guard of my State, and at the beginning of the Spanish-American War enlisted. He was almost immediately commissioned a major in the Army and served throughout the war and in skirmishes after the war. He was wounded. From the time of discharge from the Army that man suffered from the effects of the fever he contracted during his service and from the wounds which he had received.

He is now an old man, past 70 years of age. He has a dilated heart and all the asthmatic symptoms that go with it. Actually, I was afraid he would die in my office. For professional reasons, as well as for humanitarian reasons, I did not want him to die there.

That man, who had received a pension of $50 a month, received notice from the Veterans' Bureau last Saturday, less than 1 week ago, that his pension had been reduced to $8. I saw the letter.

In his physically debilitated condition this gallant soldier, cited for bravery, was not prepared for such a shock. The emotional strain was too great for a weakened heart.

Mr. President, no one need tell me that I thought when I voted that such outrageous action as that could possibly be taken under the operation of the law. It is time that we found out the true facts. If the trouble is with the law, the law must be amended; if the trouble lies in the regulations, those regulations must be changed at once.

I have spoken about the Spanish-American War veteran. We tried to preserve, and by voting for various amendments offered thought we did preserve, the rights of those veterans. We did not dream of the cruelties which have since been perpetrated upon them.

We have to think also about the veterans of the World War. What is happening to them?

Let me say to Senators that when August rolls around there will not be a Member of the Congress who will have any doubt as to the wickedness of the course of action which we made possible by the enactment of this law—the cruel regulations that have resulted from the law.

Senators, we will need to give thought to the payment of the bonus. I voted against the bonus last year when the slender Treasury could not stand paying it. But now we do not hesitate to vote millions, hundreds of millions, and, indeed, billions of dollars to this, that, and the other thing. I cannot see that many of these appropriations have been such that there will be money placed in the hands of the people. Certainly there can be no relief of our economic distress until money shall be in circulation.

I am hoping that the public works bill which is pending may place several billion dollars in circulation. I know that the payment of the bonus, amounting to two and a quarter billion dollars, would put that much money into circulation, and might well be the means of stimulating business activity throughout the country so that the economic distress would be relieved.

Let it be borne in mind that in a dozen years from now we shall be obligated to pay that bonus. It is already the law. To anticipate its payment might save the country from disaster.

I think the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] was right this morning when he intimated that we were trapped into voting on the bill as we did. No just person would willfully and voluntarily participate in an act which could possibly result in such cruelties as we daily observed. It is time we found out the exact cause of the situation against which so much complaint is made. As I have said, if the law is at fault, it must be changed; if the regulations are at fault, the matter must be brought to the attention of the President so forcefully that there shall be no doubt of such changes in the regulations as will humanize the law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that one of the moving factors of this situation to me is the manner and the spirit in which the veterans have accepted this situation. We are not overwhelmed with tremendous political propaganda at all; we are not under pressure to repeal the Economy Act. In every instance, the appeals that are made to me are individual appeals, based upon the sheer justice of the situation; they are simple appeals for fair play. I think the spirit in which the veterans are asking for justice is particularly impressive.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is right about that. Every veteran with whom I have had contact has said, "I want to share with the Government, and I am willing to take a fair reduction." But when we learn of case after case of men who were wounded in the service, directly service connected, and find that they have been cut off the rolls or so radically reduced that they might as well be cut off the rolls, it is time for us to rise in our might and make the correction which is necessary. So far as I am concerned, I want to do all I can to correct the evils which confront us.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Many examples have been brought to the attention of individual Senators as to the cruelty of the regulations. I simply want to add another one from the many which have come to my attention, the case of a man in my own outfit who had 6 bayonet wounds and 2 bullet wounds and was totally disabled to the extent of requiring an attendant. He had been receiving $175 a month and this has been reduced to $20. I do not think there is any justification or defense for that kind of a regulation.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is certainly right about that. Does the Senator think it was ever intended by the Congress that a thing like that should happen?

Mr. CLARK. Of course, so far as I am concerned, I did not vote to tie my own hands and vote the power into the hands of an administrative officer and give him discretion to make such regulations.

Mr. COPELAND. But the Senator does not believe that the law itself was ever intended to treat that veteran in that way, does he?

Mr. CLARK. I am perfectly frank to say to the Senator that I do not believe the Senate of the United States or the House of Representatives, if they had dreamed of the kind of regulations that would be promulgated, could have mustered a corporal's guard to vote for such a measure.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator is 100 percent correct. The Congress never would have consented to the enactment of the law if there had been a realizing sense of such regulations as we are discussing.

In the debate last spring we all spoke about the kindheartedness of the man in the White House. We continue to have that feeling now. These things of which we complain do not come to his personal attention. He does not know, because of the multitude of his duties, just what is being done. But we cannot afford to adjourn, and the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] is right when he says we cannot afford to adjourn, until we have made certain that these cruelties shall be wiped out of existence and that justice shall be done to the veterans to whom we owe protection and tender care. We must deal generously with the widows and orphans of those who served us when our need was great.

To do anything less is to bring us shame. We must not fail those who are truly entitled to our most serious consideration.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it will be recalled that in closing the debate upon that act which has been defined as the Economy Act, when reaching that phase as it touched the soldier and what appeared to be the inevitable reduction of compensation and allowance, I made bold to say to the Senate that I was clearly of the conviction that the President of the United States, in the situation in which the country had found itself and to which he was addressing himself, only sought at the hands of the soldier that he would lend the Government for a while that particular portion of his allowance which was now being taken from him to be temporarily supplied to the debts of the Nation. I said that so soon as appropriate and expedient, and when the conditions of the country justified a change by which the soldier could be restored to the normal state of the law from which we were temporarily removing him, such would be done by the President and by those who would have charge of the administration of the measure. I said that were such assurance not given me, I would not give the measure my support on that feature.

Mr. President, there seems at times a disposition to assume that these soldiers who bring to the attention of the Nation the injustice which has been done them are intruding upon the privileges of the Government and are assuming to make complaint where they have no authority. My mind relates for the moment to recall the instance that after the battle of Platea, as reported by the Roman historian, the senate of Rome was in session. It was seeking to ascertain what could be done to meet demands for the soldier. There was much protest on the part of that eminence which we find all around us in government called the "business man" against paying soldiers. A man was seen approaching the gate of the session house.

The body was posted near the doorway when there were watchmen who approached him, asking why he was standing near the portal apparently in violation of some regulation. One of the officers wearing the insignia of a Roman guardsman approached this individual and said to him, "By what authority do you come here and who speaks for you?" The individual addressed was seen to turn and, presenting his right side, disclosed his arm off his body. Lifting what little quivering flesh that could be controlled in his moments of anguish, he—pointing to his armless sleeve—to the patrolman replied, "Will not this speak for me?"

I ask, Mr. President, may we not in this moment then summon those soldiers who are in such conditions of misfortune and whose maimed bodies, whose ceaseless miseries, draw the moan from their agonizing lips, and ask if these alone are not sufficient to speak for them?

Mr. President, let us ask what is the grievance to which these eminent Senators allude?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I want to state to the Senator, in begging his pardon for the audible conversation that occurred here a moment ago, that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL] was trying to find a carpenter in the Senate so that we might enlarge the mourners' bench. The applicants have exceeded its present capacity. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am rather unfortunate that I am unable to quite gather the purpose of my eminent friend nor to what particular point of my address his interruption is addressed. But if it is to indicate to me that something has arisen by which there are those who seek some penance to do some offering in the form, first, of confession in the hope that they may reform, I would have the eminent Senator understand that there is no manner in which they could reform so completely as to find these errors, wherever they have occurred, addressing themselves to correcting them wherever they might, and courageously standing to that correction, that they may see justice administered. I know the eminent Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] made an allusion, somewhat facetiously, calling attention to the earlier days of his life. He had detailed what we call the revival ceremonies in a church and had seen those depart from the mourners' bench and there give confession, but alas, as he said, and as no doubt my friend from Louisiana gathered and which is now puncturing the conscience of the eminent Senator from Louisiana, that was only for a little while, when it was seen the offender returned again to his offense and repeated it wherever he could, or was perfectly indifferent to his previous confession and reformation. I heard the able Senator from Louisiana inform the Senate a few days past upon a case that was appropriate, that there was in connection with the Christian ceremonies generally a line to be gathered from the ancient song which ran—

> As long as the lamp holds out to burn
> The vilest sinner may return.

I do not know to whom that might apply now, but I call my distinguished friend from Louisiana to behold the looking glass in order to see what particular sinner is now meant. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I trust I may now return to where I was diverted. I want to ask Senators, in a spirit more serious than the levity to which we have been incidentally reduced, what is the grievance the Senate is now expressing? What is the particular evil we have discovered? What is the thing we have noticed that requires a change? If there be those things acted on that produce some regret of conscience, what is that?

Are you seriously, Senators, confessing before the country a grievance and wrong which it is said you by inadvertence have committed or by any other person in the exercise of his legislative powers you gave them, and at the same time do you confess your unwillingness to correct it? Do you profess to the country that you are powerless to remedy it? Do you sit here hour after hour admitting a wrong to your fellow man through your actions, designating in detail where it has cut into his blood and robbed him of a portion of his life, leaving him hopeless through your own action, and do you confess your unwillingness or your inability to remedy it? Why sit you here at all? If there has been this wrong, as has been indicated, whether the wrong flows from the passage of the law or whether through the execution of the regulations becomes a purely administrative matter.

Time and time again since I have had the honor to sit here with my colleagues, either in this particular portion of the history of the Senate or in previous service during the Wilson administration when I was honored with a chair here, and in many cases I have seen Senators correct their own errors promptly by a resolution which is tendered to the floor and then, sir, to the Chair and a motion made to suspend the rules for the immediate consideration of the resolution that it might be passed and its effect promptly enjoyed. Where has that power been taken from you? Wherein does it not exist now? What has become of you and of the power in the United States Senate that you certify to the world at large, who hears your utterance, that a great wrong has been done your countrymen who were brave and gave their limbs and offered to give their lives for the salvation of their country, and that in the injuries they suffered, the bleeding of their wounds, you stand and behold, but confess you are palsied and paralyzed in its presence to remedy it, to give succor to the wounded and relief to the distressed soldier who sacrificed all for his country? This unhappy confession of your impotence will lose you the respect that heretofore has ever been vouchsafed to you as the great, powerful legislative body of the English-speaking realm.

Then, Senators, to the point:

Let there be at once framed such a proposition as will be appropriate, and tendered by the Senate now, which shall itself express what should be the regulation executing the law. If the law provides, sir, that it is to be executed through some form of regulation, keep ever in mind this body, the Senate, makes them. Are these regulations made by a body of gentlemen who are called a commission who have been appointed under your law? Then they take their life from you. They are enjoying power by your consent. They are acting under your directions. It is, after all, your service. It is altogether and wholly your deed.

This being true, let there be framed and shaped by the Senate such a measure as in itself is a regulation that defines the method of the execution of the law; and let it be passed as the action of Congress, and done at once. Otherwise a recommendation for change in regulation may meet such a busy life on the part of the officials who are to execute it, or be so obstructed by the encumbering matters that intrude themselves in the form of legislation, as never to be acted upon and never realized.

Therefore, if sincerity is the mark of your profession of interest, as you seek to relieve the distress, then, instead of by words, do it by deeds, and do it at once. Let the resolution from the appropriate committee be presented here. Let it recite specifically the wrongs. Let it then repair the wrongs by reciting what should be and what is the meaning of the law, and pass it, and defy those who have enswollen themselves into greatness by little authority and who have dared to violate your directions.

Therefore, Mr. President, I rose merely as one of those who had helped construe the law in speech, pointing out at the time that it would be remedied wherein a hardship would arise; and if I may be pardoned by those who have been eminent soldiers who sit around me, with splendid records of service, let me say that as one of those who served with them in the wars that have existed during my lifetime, I rejoice that these Senators have come to the point of that independence of action, that courage of conduct, that nobility of service, that will now commend them to the respect of their countrymen and to the thanks of these poor, hapless individuals who look upon the United States Senate as their legislators, and to them look for their refuge and their rescue. We will rise to duty and perform it nobly.

I thank the Senate.

CORRECT THE INJUSTICE DONE TO THE DISABLED

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois suggests that we take immediate legislative action to correct the injustice that has been done through the Economy Act.

It is beyond any question that many of the Senators here were misled. I was not one of those who were misled. I saw the consequences of this act at the time. There are only six Senators on this side of the Chamber who voted or were paired against it. There were 4 votes and 2 pairs against the bill; and it is very apparent to my mind that an overwhelming majority of those on this side of the Chamber wish to undo this injustice.

It is no particular source of pride to the few of us who stood against the bill that we have been vindicated in our judgment. That has happened so often in the past several months that we do not seek to make any claim about that. But, regardless of that point, Mr. President, the speeches that have been made here today, particularly from the distinguished whip on this side of the Chamber, express what I think is the unanimous thought, that this whole economy gesture was a big mistake. Out of the hides of the soldiers we cannot take $400,000,000 from veterans' compensation alone without throwing them out of the hospitals, and without taking away the compensation they are getting, and without throwing on the charity of the world the wives and children of these wounded and dead veterans.

It was the most horrible thing that was done through this act. I believe the President is kind-hearted. I believed so then. Fortunately, however, he was able to find an executioner who was willing to go to the limit of the law, and to stretch every syllable of authority to the ridiculous point, such as giving those whose names could not be dropped from the rolls insignificant pittances of 4 and 6 dollars a month, and call that a pension to men who were from 59 to 65 years old, who had served in the Spanish-American War!

Mr. President, in the few words that I undertook to impose on the Senate when the economy bill was passed, I said:

> I can see the disastrous consequences of the bill we are now about to pass.

I said that on the 13th day of March. We had had a caucus on this side of the Chamber, and it had been the decision of most of us to vote for the bill before we really had considered all its features. From that standpoint many of our friends on this side of the Chamber are to be to some extent understood—I do not say excused—in their position in having more or less received information upon which they relied before giving this bill the independent study that we usually give such bills. But now, Mr. President, it is up to us to remedy the injustices of this bill.

Now, I want to read what the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, the distinguished Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], said here yesterday. It is in line with what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said today, and it is in line with what the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] said this morning. Here is what the senior Senator from Arizona said. I am reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday:

> If we are subjected to odium and public criticism over the Economy Act, let us not be so cowardly as to blame the President. Let us not be so cowardly as to blame the Budget Director. We did it ourselves. Why be mice instead of men?
> If the Economy Act is cruel, we did it. How shameful to see Senators, if they do so, hide behind their desks and hide behind a screen, if they do so, and say, "The Budget Director did it! The President did it!"
>
> One Senator says, "I did not know what I was doing." "If I had known what was going to happen, I would not have done it", says another Senator.
> Such alibis will not avail us if condemnation falls upon Senators. Do not blame the President. Do not blame the Budget Director. Let us stand up and take it on the chin. Let us assume responsibility for our own acts. Why not, as men, take whatever blame there is and make effort to repair whatever damage there is?

Mr. President, that is my sentiment on this bill. Why not admit that we made this mistake right here in the United States Senate, and be men enough, like the upstanding Senators from Arizona and Illinois, to say, "We will stay here and correct what injustice we have done by this bill, through this hurried action that necessity seemed to require; and we will not be talking about going home on June 10, or July 10, if we are going to throw out upon charity hundreds of thousands of penniless orphans and widows and wounded, disabled soldiers, and people who are suffering, who volunteered their lives for the defense of this country"? We will stay here, as the Senator from Arizona says and as the Senator from Illinois says, and be men instead of mice; and we will enlarge the mourners' bench with all the carpenter's skill required to take in several Members to correct this injustice that was done here on the 13th day of March.

That is the action for us to take. Let us follow the example set by the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from Illinois. Let us remedy this thing here, and quit talking about going home, and sending these poor people the fine speeches that have been made here today. They were almost tearful; they are very encouraging; but let us not send them the fine speeches that have been made here today. Let us send them some grub. Let us send them some medicine. Let us put them back in the hospitals. Let us put the clothes on their backs. Let us let the little widow, whose husband lost his life in the defense of his country, know that in this hour we are going to be men, as the Senator from Arizona says we should, and that we will not take our mistakes out of their hides, but that we will stay here and rectify this thing in the speediest way possible.

I am sure that is the duty of the Senate; and that is what we ought to do here, as the Senator from Illinois says.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, what I have to say is not going to be a plea in confession and avoidance. I was one of the 13 who voted against the economy bill. I have never regretted that vote. I think it was right; and we are now suffering under the results of the first delegation of power by Congress to someone else. We are going, in my judgment, to suffer the same kind of reaction every time we shirk our responsibility, and turn around and ask someone else to assume it in our stead.

The reason why this readjustment of veterans' compensation is not practical is because at present it is a 1-man job; and no one man can get the reaction from over this country and feel the pulse of the people as the Representatives from the 435 districts and the Senators from the 48 States of the Union receive that reaction and feel that pulse.

In other words, when I opposed this bill at the time it was passed, I suggested the following:

> If the law is definite in its terms, there is nothing that the Bureau can do except make one decision; but the situation is different when an adjustment may be made according to some yardstick to be specified by rules and regulations promulgated by the President and imposed upon the Veterans' Bureau.
> Under those circumstances when a Senator goes down to the Veterans' Bureau he will say, "This man is being wrongfully deprived of some of his compensation." What will then happen? When the Veterans' Bureau replies, "Well, the rules and regulations promulgated by the President say so-and-so", that Senator will not lose more than the time necessary for him to get a taxicab and to go from the Veterans' Bureau to the White House in the effort to have those rules and regulations changed. So a thousand and one kinds of complications will grow out of this legislation if in its present form it is put through the Congress and becomes a law.

We are now suffering that very reaction. Why? Because in this law we say that a veterans' compensation can be placed anywhere between $6 and $275. Now, it is said that there was no suggestion that we might save $400,000,000. Why, it was discussed on the floor of the Senate here time and time again. The estimate was made by the committee having the bill in charge that it would save $450,000,000.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to invite the Senator's attention to the fact that when I offered an amendment to scale down all veterans' compensation a flat 25 percent, it was represented by the committee that that was not a sufficient reduction; that that saved only about $220,000,000, whereas it was the intention of the Veterans' Administration to save approximately $400,000,000.

Mr. DICKINSON. I remember that. That is correct.

Mr. CLARK. I also call the Senator's attention to the fact that I was not even able to get a roll call on the amendment which I offered.

Mr. DICKINSON. I had a similar experience.

I desire to make a suggestion. I came in here with four amendments that were prepared by the Economy Committee that saved about $200,000,000. I was not able to get a roll call on my amendments. They were all legislative corrections of abuses that everyone admitted had grown up, and the estimate there was not enough. The whole theory of the Senate was, "We want $400,000,000 saved"; and in order to show that that is what was in the mind of the administration, I remind Senators that at the time the bill was here I said, "What is going to be the estimate for the independent offices appropriation bill when you come up here and ask us to make appropriations for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1934?" They said, "We do not know what it will be"; but they had made their estimates, and what were they? Their estimates were that they were going to run the Veterans' Bureau with $506,000,000.

Let me read from the report of the Appropriations Committee of the House:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

The bill that failed carried a total of $966,836,634 for the Veterans' Administration, including $20,850,000 for the Civil Service retirement and disability fund. For the same purposes the revised estimates and the accompanying bill provide $506,838,000, which is a reduction of $460,000,634.

That is what they were going to save. Why should we say here that there was no intention that there were to be these drastic cuts in the compensation of the soldiers? As a matter of fact, the only way we can save $400,000,000 to $460,000,000 out of an item of $900,000,000 is by cutting everybody's compensation on an average 50 percent, and that is what the Senators are complaining about now; but it was in the minds of the Senate when they voted for the economy bill. It was what was in the minds of the administration when they sent that estimate to the Congress, and it is what was in their minds when they formulated the rules and regulations which have been prescribed whereby these various cuts are to be made.

On top of this the Senator from Indiana has had some suggestion to make with reference to hospitalization. The same report of the House committee says:

Administration, medical, hospital, and domiciliary services: The appropriation under this heading has been reduced from $111,273,634 to $77,273,000, a cut of $34,000,634.

The Senator from Indiana can see why it is necessary, in anticipation of these cuts, that some of these men are going to be compelled to leave the hospitals. That is one of the things which I think is regrettable in this whole administration.

The combined total for pensions and compensation carried in the bill that failed is $592,730,000, while, for the same purposes, the revised estimates and the accompanying bill provide $231,730,000. This is a cut of $361,000,000, attributable entirely to the reduction in rate of compensation and pensions effected by the President's Executive order.

Who can say that the responsibility is not fixed here?

I want to suggest two things. In the first place, this was the plan of the administration. This delegation of power was not initiated by the Senate. It was suggested by President Roosevelt when he made his inaugural address here in front of the Capitol. He said at that time that unless Congress did so and so he would ask for a delegation of power to deal with some of these questions, and he never asked the Congress for a revision of the pension law, but came to Congress and said, "Delegate to me this power and let me do this job"; and this is the job he has done. I am convinced that if we should have a vote on the floor of the Senate now a majority here would vote for the repeal of the economy law if they could vote their own consciences.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I invite the Senator's attention also to the fact that not only was it suggested by the President, but it was sent here with a false label, namely, "to maintain the credit of the United States." God save the mark, to balance the Budget! The Senator from Iowa knows, as, of course, we all know, that the credit of the United States was as sound then as it is now.

Mr. DICKINSON. It was sounder.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Even sounder; yes. Furthermore, that the Budget was not balanced by the Economy Act, that there never was a chance in the world of balancing the Budget by that act, even charging the $450,000,000 to the veterans. The Budget is not balanced now; it will not be balanced next year or the year after; and the Senator from Iowa knows that perfectly well, and I think everybody else knows it. So why resort to deceit, to suggest to this body and to the country that the Economy Act, which a cowardly Congress passed, was "to maintain the credit of the United States"?

Mr. DICKINSON. It has been suggested——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. A good deal of language has been employed, a good deal of denunciation has been resorted to, directed at the President, first, for asking the authority conferred in the Economy Act, and, second, for the manner of employing that authority.

Everyone here—everyone who has a reasonable measure of intelligence—knows that, with the revenues of the Government constantly shrinking, Congress was continuing to pile up additional expenditures and governmental costs, and that at the time the economy measure was presented to the Congress there was such a difference between the amount of the annual revenues received and the amount of the annual expenses of the Government as to seriously threaten the national credit. Everyone knows that Congress had failed to take steps for the reduction of governmental expenditures. Everyone knows that we were glad of an opportunity to have some plan devised by which Government costs would be reduced.

Before changes have gone into effect, Senators find peculiar gratification in condemning the President for a fearless discharge of his duty, for an attempt to perform the functions of his office consistently with the laws enacted by the Congress. The President is working now, doing his best sincerely and conscientiously, to give effect to the will of the Congress; and instead of wasting time in denouncing him, we who did not have the courage to perform the legislative functions necessary to bring the expenses of the Government within the revenues ought to stand by, give the President support, and assist him in working out the defects in the rules and regulations which have been adopted.

Mr. President, that was the spirit demonstrated by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] in his address yesterday, but it is not the spirit displayed by some who have spoken today.

I thank the Senator from Iowa for yielding.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I want to make just one or two suggestions. With the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], I was on the Economy Committee. We brought in proposed legislation covering the very question involved in the transfer of the power which I have been criticizing this afternoon. We got 3 votes on the other side of the aisle.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. How many did you get on your side of the aisle?

Mr. DICKINSON. We got 11, which is an average of 3 to 1, pretty nearly 4 to 1.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In connection with what has been said by the senior Senator from Arkansas that the Congress could not be trusted, that the Congress was constantly piling up obligations for the Government, permit me to say that the Congress never began to think of piling up obligations for the Government to anywhere near the extent to which the President of the United States has piled them up during the past 3 months he has been in office, and God knows how much he will pile up in another 3 years and 9 months.

Not only that, but as soon as the so-called "economy bill" was passed, which was falsely labeled a bill to maintain the credit of the United States, he sent another bill to the Congress insisting that we divert $148,000,000 from the building program, which would take that much money from the building trades, where decent wages were paid, that we should divert it from that purpose and turn it over to able-bodied men for planting trees at a dollar a day; and the reforestation plan, so called, before the end of this calendar year, will have cost more than the entire amount that was squeezed out of the veterans who had worn the uniform in defense of the country. It will run to six or seven hundred million dollars, and everybody knows it, before this calendar year shall have ended.

Another measure was passed providing for the expenditure of $500,000,000 for general relief. Furthermore, there were vast schemes for the appropriation of money and the selling of bonds involving billions of dollars. Of course, it was not a bill to maintain the credit of the United States. That was a false label, and it has been proven to be false.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield, but I hope the Senator does not intend to make a long talk, because I understand we are to go into executive session at 4 o'clock, and I desire to say one concluding thing.

Mr. LEWIS. I will occupy but a second, and I trust to be able to correct an error into which the eminent Senator from Iowa has fallen.

The position taken here that some great wrong was committed by the President, or by the Congress, in the passing of the bill known as the Economy Act, is not an issue, nor is it justified at this time. The issue, I may say to the eminent Senator from Iowa, is whether the regulations which are authorized under the law, which themselves have been shaped and framed by officials of the administration, are just, and wherein they are wrong and oppressive. To the extent to which they are such, here in the Senate they may be disclosed in their separate instances and, by a resolution of this body, corrected at once, or, biding the time for a little while, when the President may do so, but to take advantage of these instances where injustices have occurred in the administering of the regulations as an excuse for condemning the action of the President partakes of a partisanship a little beneath the eminent Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Illinois that the fault in this whole thing was in ever putting it in the power of one man to make these regulations, to do the things which Senators admit are being done and which are being confessed on the floor of the Senate here by the score by Senators, and are shown by the various records they are bringing here.

The delegation of the power I think is wrong. A little while ago we delegated to the President the right to devalue the gold dollar. What happened? Someone has discovered that there is a Constitution somewhere, and they are afraid to base any action on that law, and so they are coming now and asking for the enactment of a statute which will debase the gold dollar and take us off the gold standard. How much further are we going in the delegation of power? How much longer is it going to take us to learn the lesson that we ought to do the things which we were sent here to do legislatively, and that we ought not to transfer the power to anybody; that we ought to be able to assume that responsibility and carry it out? That is one reason why I am making these few remarks this afternoon.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. LONG. While the mistake as to the gold dollar mentioned by the Senator might be corrected through action in the courts, the mistakes made in regard to these four disabled soldiers were buried. They have no such recourse.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me suggest this: That the mistakes made in the devaluation of the gold dollar might be corrected by the courts, but it might be in 10 months or 18 months after someone having a contract payable in gold had refused to make payment in gold on the theory that he did not have to pay in gold on account of the legislation passed by the Congress. It might correct the matter so far as the future is concerned, but it might deprive a party to such a contract of his remedy under his contract. We cannot correct the abuses which are now being inflicted on the veterans by reason of the fact that the soldier who has to bear the brunt of the abuse may pass to the Great Beyond, so that the remedy, when it comes, may be too late.

Mr. President, let me suggest just one more thing. When we vote to delegate a power, the act of the one to whom the power is delegated is our act if we voted for the bill. We may think we can escape the responsibility, but I believe that the voters in every State of the Union are going to fix that responsibility where it belongs, and that in the end they will say, "If you voted to delegate a power which you should have exercised, you are responsible for the results which come from that delegation of power."

EXTENSION OF GASOLINE TAX—CONFERENCE REPORT (S.DOC. NO. 66)

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to submit a conference report on House bill 5040, the bill providing for an electrical-energy tax and a gasoline tax. I ask that the report may be printed and lie on the table. I will seek to have it taken up tomorrow.

I may say, in the moment left before 4 o'clock, when we must go into executive session, that the Senate conferees were forced to recede and agree to the House provision that a 3-percent tax on commercial and domestic energy be placed on the producers, and the date for its effective enactment was fixed at September the first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be printed and lie on the table.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 6. (a) Effective September 1, 1933, section 616 of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 616. TAX ON ELECTRICAL ENERGY FOR DOMESTIC OR COMMERCIAL CONSUMPTION.

"'(a) There is hereby imposed upon electrical energy sold for domestic or commercial consumption and not for resale a tax equivalent to 3 percent of the price for which so sold, to be paid by the vendor under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe. The sale of electrical energy to an owner or lessee of a building, who purchases such electrical energy for resale to the tenants therein, shall for the purposes of this section be considered as a sale for consumption and not for resale, but the resale to the tenant shall not be considered a sale for consumption.

"'(b) The provisions of sections 619, 622, and 625 shall not be applicable with respect to the tax imposed by this section.

"'(c) No tax shall be imposed under this section upon electrical energy sold to the United States or to any State or Territory, or political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia. The right to exemption under this subsection shall be evidenced in such manner as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulation prescribe.'

"(b) Despite the provisions of this section the tax imposed under section 616 of the Revenue Act of 1932 before its amendment by this section on electrical energy furnished before September 1, 1933, shall be imposed, collected, and paid in the same manner and shall be subject to the same provisions of law (including penalties) as if this section had not been enacted."

And the Senate agree to the same.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement previously entered, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. VAN NUYS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of James R. Fleming, of Indiana, to be United States attorney for the northern district of Indiana.

He also, from the same committee, reported favorably the nomination of Val Nolan, of Indiana, to be United States attorney for the southern district of Indiana.

THE CALENDAR—THE ADJUTANT GENERAL

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order. The clerk will state the first nomination on the calendar.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of James Fuller McKinley to be The Adjutant General.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask that that nomination go over and come up after action on the Helvering nomination.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the nomination ought to be taken up in its order; it ought not to take very long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I object to the nominations' going over. I ask that it take the regular course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair misunderstood the Senator. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of James Fuller McKinley to be The Adjutant General?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] wanted a yea-and-nay vote on this nomination. I do not see him here. I can think of no reason why we should not have a yea-and-nay vote. I was one of those opposing this nomination, but the Senator from Maryland was apparently leading in the matter. I should not like to see it voted on in his absence.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, when this nomination came before the Senate on yesterday or the day before, it went over at my suggestion. The Senator from Maryland then expressed a desire for a record vote, and I ask, therefore, for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon demands the yeas and nays on the question of confirming the nomination of The Adjutant General. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METCALF (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. I understand if present he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. DIETERICH] on official business. If present, he would vote "yea."

I am requested to state by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] that he is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. Not knowing how the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote, if present, the Senator from Kentucky would withhold his vote, but wished it to be stated that if permitted to vote he would vote "yea."

Mr. NYE. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent for the afternoon on official business.

Mr. AUSTIN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who is necessarily absent from the Senate. I understand that, if present, he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] with the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO]; and

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN].

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] are detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I wish to announce that the following Senators are absent in attendance upon a meeting of the Committee on Banking and Currency:

The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS].

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business:

The Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

The result was announced—yeas 67, nays 5, as follows:

YEAS—67

So the Senate advised and consented to the nomination of James Fuller McKinley to be The Adjutant General.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President may be notified of the confirmation of General McKinley's nomination, in order that there may be avoided any complication which might arise from the notification of the confirmation of the Assistant Adjutant General before the notification of the confirmation of the Adjutant General.

Mr. LONG. I object; let it take the regular course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. BULKLEY. Then I ask unanimous consent that the notification of the confirmation of General Conley be withheld until notification shall be sent to the President of the confirmation of the nomination of General McKinley.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I believe I shall withdraw my objection to the President's being notified. I presume we might as well let it go ahead.

Mr. BULKLEY. Then, Mr. President, I renew my request for unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of the nomination of General McKinley.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, uniformly I have objected to such requests, but I think there is an emergency in this case, and for that reason I shall not make objection at this time, but I want it to be made clear why the exception is made.

Mr. LONG. I withdrew my objection as a courtesy to the Republican Party.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified of the confirmation of the nomination.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next nomination on the calendar.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Thomas Hewes, of Connecticut, to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I told the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] that that nomination would be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Guy T. Helvering, of Kansas, to be Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I presented to the Senate the views of the minority upon this nomination. My recollection is that there was a substantial vote in the committee against the confirmation of Mr. Helvering's nomination; but, in view of the fact that I had conducted most of the examination of the witnesses who were heard, I submitted the report for myself only, without submitting it to the other members of the committee who voted against the nominee.

Mr. President, the position of Commissioner of Internal Revenue is one of the most important positions in the Government. To my mind, it is almost as important, if not quite so important, as the positions occupied by several members of the President's Cabinet. Indeed, the opportunities offered to a person holding that particular office to grant favors are very much greater, in my judgment, than to any particular member of the President's Cabinet.

At the time this nomination was sent to the Senate I had never heard of Mr. Helvering. I did not know anything about the kind of man he was. So far as I knew, he was a suitable person for this particular office. My attention, however, was called to the fact by some person I did not know that in the office of the Treasury Department there would be found reports relative to Mr. Helvering which, if brought to the attention of the Senate, would warrant the Senate in refusing to confirm him. I was informed that a Mr. Irey, head of the Intelligence Division of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, was the man who would be likely to have those reports. I thereupon telephoned him and he told me that the reports had been sent to Mr. Gibbons, of the Treasury Department, and it would be necessary for me to call Mr. Gibbons in order that he might get the authority to turn the reports over to me. He stated, however, that he had recently gone over the reports and had written a synopsis of what was in them, and that he would be very glad to submit that to me. I told him I was anxious to get the original reports and I would, therefore, call Mr. Gibbons. I did call Mr. Gibbons and he promptly replied that he would have Mr. Irey bring the reports to me, and that was done.

Either that day or the day before, when the Finance Committee was considering some bill before it, the matter of the confirmation of Mr. Helvering was brought up by the chairman, and I told the committee that I was making this inquiry of the Treasury Department and requested that the matter go over until the next day so that I might have an opportunity to look at the reports. At my request, that procedure was followed, and the next day I took with me to the committee meeting those reports. I discussed generally with the committee some of the things occurring in the reports. I desire to call attention to a statement of the chairman, found on page 6 of the hearings, where he said:

> As I understand it from Mr. Helvering, what happened in that case is that he knew nothing about the facts that the figures were padded. He was acting in good faith. Then a motion was made to reopen the case; the Government lost out. There, then, came again the same people who had employed him and who told him this motion had been made. They wanted him to represent them, but he found out they had padded it, and he told them he would have absolutely nothing to do with the case and withdrew from it.

After some discussion in the committee, Mr. Helvering was called before the committee. I desire to quote from what he said with respect to this case. It was commonly known as the "Slim Jim Oil & Gas Co. case". Mr. Helvering was asked with respect to it this question by me:

> What was the controversy in that case as you remember it?

Mr. Helvering replied:

> I do not recall what the controversy was about the tax.

Then again on page 27 he was asked—

Senator HASTINGS. What are the facts in that case?

Mr. HELVERING. We had a hearing on the basis of an audit made by this company.

Senator HASTINGS. The firm of Washington, Henry & Co.?

Mr. HELVERING. Yes, sir; that audit revealed a tax liability of $450,000. We fought that through the department, through the advisory committee and it was fixed at a certain amount along about that figure. A year or so afterward they called me and wanted me to go back to fight that case over.

The CHAIRMAN. Who called you?

Mr. HELVERING. Washington, Henry & Co. They said there had been a reaudit down there. They came up, and, of course, I intended to continue to fight the case out for them, but they came up and admitted to me that the original audit which they had set up, and on which I had depended to make this settlement, had, with the cooperation of certain officers of the company, been padded, and I refused to have anything more to do with the case from that time on.

Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact, in order that the Senate may understand what the controversy was about, that Mr. Helvering was elected to Congress from the Fifth Congressional District of the State of Kansas in the year 1912 and was reelected in 1914 and 1916, making three terms that he served. He was defeated in 1918 and retired from office on the 4th of March 1919. According to his own testimony, he left here at that time and went to Kansas, where he organized and became the president of a bank. He had practiced law until he came to Congress, but had no intention as he left the Congress to engage in the practice of law in Kansas or in the city of Washington.

Some time in the fall of 1919 he was asked some question by some drygoods concern about a tax return and he became interested in it, because, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, he had helped prepare the laws. He advised the drygoods concern that they were entitled to make a consolidated return. He thereupon took that case for Henry, who was the auditor for that concern, and was successful in having the tax reduced. For that he charged a fee of $1,250.

Shortly after that he was approached by one Harry Washington with respect to the Slim Jim Oil & Gas Co. case. May I say in that connection that the record shows that the firm of Washington, Henry & Co., with offices at Wichita, Kans., and Kansas City, were engaged in the business of auditing tax returns. The records show that in that business they had representatives going about that part of the country soliciting business and saying to the persons whose business they solicited that Mr. Helvering represented them in Washington, that he had influence with the department, and that if they desired to have their taxes speedily and effectively reduced it was quite important that they employ that firm, who in turn would employ Mr. Helvering to get the tax reduced.

There is no evidence anywhere in the record to show that at the time Mr. Helvering knew these representations were being made and he distinctly and positively denied that he knew they were being made. But in that business the very second case that he had was the Slim Jim Oil & Gas Co. case in which the tax had been fixed by the Government at $1,211,000. The record shows, by the president of the company, Mr. Titus, that for more than 2 years a reputable firm of lawyers in Kansas had been working with the department in an effort to have that tax reduced, he believing at the time that the company owed no such tax as this. After spending some 2 years in that effort it was suggested to Mr. Titus, the president of the company, that if he wanted to get the job done it was advisable for him to get some person in Washington who knew the way about the departments and knew how to approach this subject with the Department. He said he had two names suggested to him, one Mr. Jouett Shouse, who was practicing in Washington, and the other, Mr. Guy T. Helvering. He does not remember who suggested Mr. Helvering's name, but he finally selected Mr. Helvering and put this matter in his hands. He made a contract with Mr. Helvering whereby he was to be paid the sum of $25,000 for handling the case.

In due time Mr. Titus, the president of the company, Mr. Taylor, the treasurer, and Mr. Washington, the head of the auditing concern, were requested by Mr. Helvering to come to Washington with reference to this matter, where it would be taken up with the Department. Mr. Titus said that Mr. Helvering talked to him, and took him and Mr. Taylor to see the Commissioner; that Mr. Helvering explained to the Commissioner that they had been trying for some 2 years to adjust the taxes and had not been able to make any adjustment; that the Commissioner replied to him that the taxes ought to be adjusted, that the Government needed the money, and that he would turn them over to a man who would have full authority to settle that particular tax; that either that day or shortly thereafter he and Mr. Taylor—he does not recollect whether Mr. Helvering went with him or not, as I recall the testimony, but at any rate the interested parties appeared before Mr. Darnell, with all the papers in his possession and in front of him at his desk. Mr. Darnell stated to all of them that he had been given full authority to settle the case and he was prepared to settle it.

They discussed it back and forth, and Mr. Titus, the president, said that he told him that, while they did not believe they owed any tax, the company had half a million dollars which they were willing to turn over to the Government in settlement of the case if it could be finally settled; that after some days' talking back and forth they reached the basis of an agreement, and Titus was requested to make an amended return upon that basis. He did make an amended return at the Washington Hotel, where Mr. Helvering was living at the time and where Washington was stopping at the time. It appears in the testimony that Titus was alone with the Department at the time he made the agreement; that he was requested to come there by Mr. Darnell and went there; that when he did go there and made the settlement with him, Darnell told him to make an amended return. He thereupon returned to the hotel where Washington was. He does not remember that Mr. Helvering was there, but he does remember distinctly that Washington was ill. Washington prepared the amended return in lead pencil, and he copied it, and he and Taylor signed it, and it was notarized by a clerk of the hotel on December 3, 1919. He took that return back to the Department, and the agreement had been reached; and, according to his own testimony and according to the testimony of Mr. Helvering, from the time the parties arrived here until they left was a period of about 10 days. While Mr. Titus had been more than 2 years endeavoring to settle this case, Mr. Helvering, by taking these parties to the Commissioner and having the thing referred to Mr. Darnell with full authority to act, had the whole matter disposed of within a period of 10 days, whereby the tax for the year 1917 had been fixed at $451,000 and the tax for the year 1916 at $8,000, making a total of $459,000 instead of $1,211,000.

That is the history of that case up to that point. There is not any positive evidence—I am not even certain that there can be found more than the mere suspicion of circumstantial evidence—that there was something wrong. It does seem a strange thing that competent lawyers in Kansas had spent more than 2 years in coming to Washington time and time again in an effort to adjust these taxes, and then the right man was found who could go to the Commissioner, who turned the matter over to a certain person, and settled the whole business within a period of 10 days; but that of itself, Mr. President, in my judgment, is not enough to warrant the Senate in refusing to confirm this appointment.

I desire, however, to call your attention to that which I read to you from page 27, in which Mr. Helvering, after having talked with the chairman, as I read to you from page 6 of the record, and after he had given to the chairman his excuse and his reason for not taking his case after readjustment and reaudit of the case had been started by the Government, explained the matter to the committee. I think, for the purpose of clarity, I ought to explain that some year and a half or two years afterward there were some stories printed about this case in the State of Kansas, and thereupon the Government began a reaudit of this case; and Mr. Helvering, according to his own testimony, was requested to take the case again and to fight it through for this Slim Jim Oil & Gas Co.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. As a matter of fact, as the record shows, this case was reopened at the instance of Mr. Curtis, at that time Senator Curtis, of Kansas, on an anonymous letter—at least, anonymous so far as the Department was concerned—which he sent to the Department, cutting off the name of his informant; and when the president of the Slim Jim Oil Co. came to Washington he was advised by a Republican Congressman from Kansas that if he wished to have the case settled the best way to do it was to employ the brother-in-law of the then Senator from Kansas. Is not that shown by the record?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true.

Mr. President, in that connection Mr. Titus, the president of the company, states that when this reaudit was about to be made by the Government, he wrote Mr. Helvering a letter asking Mr. Helvering with respect to the matter of representing him in that new case. Mr. Helvering says that he replied to him that he did not care to represent him any further.

The point I desire to make is that when Mr. Helvering was explaining this situation to the chairman of the committee privately, and not in the presence of the committee, he gave exactly the same explanation that he gave the next day when he was called before the committee; and here is his explanation:

The CHAIRMAN. Who called you?

Mr. HELVERING. Washington, Henry & Co. They said there had been a reaudit down there. They came up, and of course I intended to continue to fight the case out for them, but they came up and admitted to me that the original audit which they had set up, and on which I had depended to make this settlement, had, with the cooperation of certain officers of the company, been padded, and I refused to have anything more to do with the case from that time on.

I submit, Mr. President, that at that point, both to the chairman of the committee and to the full committee, Mr. Helvering deliberately intended to leave the impression that the Government had been defrauded out of large sums of money because this firm of Washington, Henry & Co., together with the cooperation of certain officials of the corporation, had succeeded in padding the books and deceiving him, and that is the way the reduction of $400,000 to $459,000 was obtained.

On page 28 of the record, Mr. Helvering was asked this question: I had referred to some of the reports of the investigators of this case, and I asked him about it. This was the question:

Do you know anything about a dispute with some persons who claimed they had a right to examine the books of the Slim Jim Oil & Gas Co. and have an accounting? This statement says:

"A few months ago Judge F. C. Wilson, attorney at law, Wichita, as counsel for a client who had brought suit against the Slim Jim Oil Co. for an accounting, reached an oral agreement with James Titus for an audit of the company's books for the year 1917, by Clinton, Montgomery & Co., certified accountants."

Do you know anything about that?

Mr. HELVERING. No, sir; I never heard of it. There was a good deal of complication about that case, down among them there. The officers were trying to get away with everything, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. This concern out there that was doing this auditing, you had confidence in them?

Mr. HELVERING. Oh, absolutely, at first, until this matter came up.

The CHAIRMAN. But when it was revealed they had padded it, you refused to have anything more to do with them?

Mr. HELVERING. I refused even to go to the Department to try to get them reinstated.

Senator HASTINGS. That was after they had admitted to you they had made false statements?

Mr. HELVERING. Yes. They both came to me and wanted me to go over to the Department and make a plea for them to be reinstated, or have the right to appear before the Department.

Subsequently to that a subcommittee was appointed; and when Mr. Helvering appeared before the committee he read a prepared statement in which he made the following explanation about the Slim Jim Oil Co. case: I read from the record, pages 36 and 37. Here is his explanation on May 9, the other being on May 5. He had had time to think about the matter, and this was his prepared statement:

I want to say in connection with the settlement of the case of the Slim Jim Oil Co., the complete record is in the file. That case was settled under what was known as section 210 of the revenue act of that year. I will say that after I presented the case the whole matter was conducted in the Bureau and adjustments made exactly under that section of the law which was in effect at that time.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I think the Senate would be enlightened if the Senator would tell them at this time what section 210 is.

Mr. HASTINGS. I will give Mr. Helvering's explanation of it in just a moment, because I asked him that question.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] asked Mr. Helvering:

Is that the case where the first claim for taxes was $1,211,000, and which they finally settled for $449,000?

Mr. HELVERING. Yes. If you will look in your files there—you told me you had the Slim Jim Oil Co. here—you will see the settlement of that case.

Senator BYRD. What was your compensation?

Mr. HELVERING. My compensation in that case was $25,000, $14,500 to me after I paid all my expenses. My income-tax return for that year shows $14,500. The whole complete file is in the case. The people in charge of the Department made all the orders and settled it under that particular provision of the law which was in existence at that time, which provided that arbitrary amounts, percentages, could be fixed for unusual profits in that year as the result of sales. That was the regular practice.

Then I asked Mr. Helvering a few questions with respect to the matter. On page 43 of the record I asked him this question:

I understood you to say the other day when you were testifying that that case was based upon false statements made by Washington and some of the officials of the company.

Mr. HELVERING. No. Well, I may have said that, but what happened, as developed in the rehearing of that case, is that Mr. Washington and the auditor for the Department, in order to reach this sum which the committee had said in that case should be the tax, had changed back into 1916 part of the income and 1917 part of the income, in order to make the total tax what that figure should be under the provisions of the committee.

Again, on page 47:

When did you first learn that there was about to be a reinvestigation of this Slim Jim Oil Co. case, or when did he—approach you asking you to take the case?

Mr. HELVERING. As I recall, it was in 1921, or along about that time. They didn't ask me—what they said was that there was to be a rehearing of that case. I fully intended to have a rehearing until I found out that Washington and Titus had indulged in a juggling of this income.

Senator HASTINGS. What do you mean by juggling this income?

Mr. HELVERING. Well, just what I said awhile ago, that over in the Department, instead of settling it under the order of Mr. Darnell, the head of that section, under section 210 of the law, they went further, and with the men in the Department put some of this income back in 1916 and some in 1917, so as to cut this tax down.

Senator HASTINGS. Wasn't that perfectly open and aboveboard, and didn't everybody know that was what was being done?

Mr. HELVERING. I didn't know it.

Senator HASTINGS. Wasn't it known in the Department?

Mr. HELVERING. I don't know whether it was known or not. You have in the records of the Department the order of Mr. Darnell, the head of that section—I read it just the other day—ordering the case settled under section 210, and after that order was received, I appeared no more in that case.

Mr. President, Mr. Helvering had an opportunity to examine that record thoroughly, and I examined it thoroughly to find out where that order of Mr. Darnell's was which he says was in the record. I could not find it; but I did find in the record this very significant affidavit made by Darnell when this matter was being reheard:

STATE OF GEORGIA,
County of Fulton:

James L. Darnell, being duly sworn, deposes and says that in the year 1919 he was head of the Natural Resources Subdivision of the Income Tax Unit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. That as head of such subdivision in the latter part of the year of 1919 there came before him in the regular order of business for settlement the tax case of the Slim Jim Oil & Gas Co. of Wichita, Kans.

That he personally examined the records in the case, and called before him Mr. James C. Titus, president of said oil company, Mr. Charles H. Taylor, one of the directors thereof, and examined them fully in regard to the sale of the properties of said company.

That with all the facts before him as shown by the records, and as stated by Messrs. Titus and Taylor, and after full consideration in the matter, both on the facts and the law, in his official capacity he determined that the sale of the lease owned by the Slim Jim Oil & Gas Co. was made in 1916, and that the sale of the crude oil and storage, and the steel tanks in which said oil was stored, both owned by said oil and gas company, was made in 1917, and that under his direction the case was audited and the income and excess-profits taxes assessed in accordance with his findings.

He believed at that time, and he believes now, that the facts and the law and regulations in relation to the case were fully and fairly considered, and that the action taken was the correct one to be taken in the premises.

This affidavit is dated July 24, 1924.

In other words, instead of finding what Mr. Helvering says was in the record—namely, that Darnell ordered this matter to be settled under section 210—there was no such order made; and Darnell says that was not the proper way to settle this case, but that the way it was settled was the proper way to settle it. When I had the letter of the Department dated December 9, 1919, showing how they arrived at this amount for the year, $451,000, and presented it to Mr. Helvering, and asked him the question whether that settlement was under section 210, he admitted that it was not; but, notwithstanding that fact, he insisted that although he had received his fee of $25,000 in this case, he never saw the final settlement of that particular case.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to invite the Senator's attention to a memorandum of the auditor of the Treasury Department on a review of this case dated November 28, 1921.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I inquire the page?

Mr. CLARK. Page 200. It was "blue pencil 35", which the Senator had in his possession throughout this hearing, and which he was not fair enough to put in the RECORD, which was introduced into the record by counsel for Mr. Helvering, and which now appears on pages 206 and 207 of the record. This memorandum in the last paragraph reads as follows. It is a memorandum of the auditor of the Treasury Department on a review of the Slim Jim Oil Co. case. I quote from the memorandum:

As the taxpayer's income has been abnormally increased by the sale of its capital assets and in consequence appears to be disproportionate to its invested capital, the taxpayer is evidently entitled to relief under section 210.

Precisely the section mentioned by Mr. Helvering.

Providing adequate relief cannot be granted under article 63, regulations 41, of a paid-in surplus at time of organization based upon a proven field, or a discovery.

Then follows the tabulation, which shows the basis upon which the settlement was arrived at.

Mr. HASTINGS. I shall let the Senator answer in his own time. My own understanding of that paper is that it does not say at all that it was settled under section 210, but it goes on and gives the details as to how it was settled. But assume, if you please, that it was settled under section 210, the thing Mr. Helvering undertook to convince the committee of toward the last was that he had been deceived because it was not settled under section 210, and that is what he meant when he was complaining about the books having been padded, and about his having been deceived by this auditor of the corporation. So that whatever way you look at it, whether it was under section 210 or whether it was not, I insist that we are entitled to believe that Mr. Helvering deliberately intended to deceive this committee by what he suggested with respect to these books.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Delaware will admit, I presume, that the testimony on the part of Mr. Helvering which the Senator is now criticizing was answers given by him in response to questions propounded by the Senator himself, based upon a report 14 years old which Mr. Helvering had never seen, had never known was in the Treasury Department, and which was turned over to the Senator by some underling in the Treasury Department and used by him as the basis for his attack upon Mr. Helvering, without even giving Mr. Helvering the right or the courtesy of looking at that report, or being advised of its contents before he was cross-examined upon it.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not know whether the Senator from Kentucky would call Mr. Gibbons, of the Treasury Department, an underling or not. My recollection is that he is one of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, and the Senator may call him an underling if he cares to. In further reply to what the Senator says, I want to say that Mr. Helvering, before he gave this testimony about which I am complaining, spent nearly the whole day in my office; and I gave him a private office, with the full record before him, so that he might take out of it whatever he pleased and use it in any way in which he saw fit to use it.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator does not claim that he showed this report to Mr. Helvering before the first day's hearing before the full committee?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is quite true; but what I am now talking about is the testimony that was given by Mr. Helvering after he had a full opportunity to fully examine the report.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Both in the beginning and in the later hearing of Mr. Helvering, did he not contend, from the very start, and does he not now contend, that the basis of the settlement of the Slim Jim Oil case, was section 210? Has he ever in any way, directly or indirectly, stated any other contention than that it was settled under section 210, and that he did not know what the calculation would result in, so far as taxes were concerned; that he was fighting for a principle before the Treasury Department; that he was contending that they had a right to settle it under section 210, and they agreed to settle it under section 210, and after they agreed to do that it was a matter of calculation as to how much the tax was, and he left, and paid no more attention to it; that after they had made the calculation they wrote a letter to the Slim Jim Oil Co. fixing $449,000 as the tax, and they sent a letter to Mr. Helvering, calling his attention to the fact that that was the tax calculated, and that they intended to pay it, and that they did pay it, and afterward, when the Treasury reopened the case and the Slim Jim people appealed to Mr. Helvering to represent them again, in the reopening he discovered that they had not made their return upon what he understood was their agreement under section 210, and because of that he refused to have anything more to do with it?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator I will say that I read the explanation given by the chairman of the committee, which was the explanation which had been given to him by Mr. Helvering about this case, in which nothing was said about section 210. I have read verbatim from the report as to what he said when he first came before the committee, when he was asked with respect to this case, and he distinctly stated that this company, which had been discredited by the Internal Revenue Department because of its action—he distinctly stated that that company, with the cooperation of the officers of the company, had padded the books of the corporation, which permitted him to make this settlement of $459,000. He said nothing in that instance with respect to section 210, and when he did mention section 210, he undertook to give the impression to the committee that the settlement was absolutely correct, that there was nothing to complain about, because they had settled under section 210. That was his prepared statement. Then when I asked what he meant when he said that these books had been padded by this firm, and what he meant by saying that the firm had juggled the account—he had said it was settled under section 210—he undertook to say that after he left the case these people, together with somebody in the department, had settled it in an entirely different way.

Further along in the same testimony Senators will find this very significant fact. They will find him saying that the reason why he refused to take this case when it was offered to him the second time was that he had gone to the Department and found that instead of it being settled under section 210, it was settled in some other way. He says that is the way he found it, but in his prepared statement he makes no such statement as that. He insists, in his prepared statement, that it was properly settled under section 210, and calls our attention to the fact that Darnell gave an order that it should be settled under section 210 as further evidence that he was correct in saying that it was settled under such section.

Mr. President, I desire to call attention to another matter. On page 202 of the record I find this:

Senator BARKLEY. And later the company sent you a letter which they received from the Treasury?

Mr. HELVERING. No; they did not send me the letter. They wrote me it was satisfactory and they were going to settle it. I might say that we had a long fight to try to make this on the basis of a 1916 sale.

A long fight of 10 days, bearing in mind what he said in this record in more than one instance, that it was only 10 days from the time they arrived until he got a settlement. That was a long fight he had.

This man Titus agreed if they could settle for the amount of money they had on hand they would settle it.

Mr. President, in his statement in the first instance he said:

They came up, and of course I intended to continue to fight the case out for them.

But before that he said:

We fought that through the Department, through the advisory committee, and it was fixed at a certain amount along about that figure.

That was his first talk. I want to call attention to the fact that in the second examination he had been sworn, and I want Senators to bear in mind this testimony of a man who is intelligent enough and honest enough to occupy the position to which he has been nominated. I want them to listen to this particular testimony, found on page 203 of the record:

Senator HASTINGS. You say here that you fought that through the Department through the income tax or advisory committee. Who were they?

Mr. HELVERING. I do not know, sir.

Senator HASTINGS. Was not there an advisory committee?

Mr. HELVERING. It was set up as a kind of appeals committee, I think. I think this case went to the Solicitor, if I recall correctly.

Senator HASTINGS. Mr. Titus, Mr. Darnell said he had authority to settle it, and Darnell settled it.

Mr. HELVERING. Yes, sir.

Senator HASTINGS. What do you mean by advisory committee?

Mr. HELVERING. It was a committee that had these special cases.

Senator HASTINGS. Can you name a single member of that committee?

Mr. HELVERING. No, sir.

Senator HASTINGS. You cannot remember a single one?

Mr. HELVERING. No, sir.

Senator HASTINGS. How many were on the committee?

Mr. HELVERING. I do not recall about that.

Senator HASTINGS. Were there as many as half a dozen?

Mr. HELVERING. I do not remember.

Senator HASTINGS. Were there as many as a dozen?

Mr. HELVERING. I don't know.

Senator HASTINGS. Were there as many as 25?

This man, on his oath, this man whom we are asked to confirm as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, intelligent enough and honest enough to be in that position, gave this kind of answers:

Were there as many as a dozen?
I don't know.
Were there as many as 25?
I don't know.
Were there as many as 50?

Then the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] broke in with this question.

"You do not think there were over a thousand, do you?"

And we got a definite answer, "No."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Simply that I may understand the reason, will the Senator explain the difference between a settlement under section 210 and a settlement under section 216½, or any other numbered section of the particular act? I cannot quite follow why a grave difference exists between a settlement under one section and a settlement under another section.

Mr. HASTINGS. I promised the Senator from Michigan to try to explain that, and if I can find it, I will let Mr. Helvering, the tax expert, explain it.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Helvering, the tax expert?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; he posed as an expert. However, I know enough to explain in a general way what the difference was.

Under section 210 it was possible, in extraordinary cases, to compare the income of a particular company with incomes of companies doing a like business, and in that way, as I understand it, the Government was given authority to fix a lump sum for that particular year instead of figuring the tax upon the income that was actually received by the company.

Mr. President, when Mr. Helvering was testifying before the committee he was asked with respect to the amount of fees in the Slim Jim Oil Co. case, and he stated that his record showed—he was quite well satisfied—that there was a fee of $25,000; that his record showed that he got $14,500, and that the other $10,500 must have been paid to Washington, Henry & Co. His attention later was called to the fact, however, that Washington, Henry & Co.'s books showed that they received in that case only $2,500. So that on the last day Mr. Helvering brought his income tax for the next year, 1920, which showed that he received an additional fee of $8,000, which, together with the $2,500 Washington, Henry & Co. had received, and that which he had previously reported, made up the difference of $25,000.

I merely mention that to show that, although this was the second case which this lawyer had after he had retired from Congress, a case in which there was involved $25,000, and in which he got $22,500, he could not remember without going back to his books how much of that fee he received for himself, and he left the committee with the distinct impression, in the first place, that there was only one $14,500 received by him. It makes no difference at all, of course, from my point of view, whether he received $14,500 or whether he received $22,500; but it does make a tremendous difference as to whether or not this nominee, who is seeking confirmation at the hands of the Senate, was deliberately and intentionally deceiving the Senate with respect to this important question or any other question about which we were inquiring.

Another thing. It will be found in the record that he said that he had heard some Senator had stated that he received during a few months the sum of $200,000 in the way of fees, and he laughed that off by saying that was absurd. He proceeded to give for the record what his actual fees were for a period of 5 years, and the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] promptly added that up and said, "For a period of 5 years you received $123,000." Mr. Helvering said, "That is correct." There is no particular point about it, except when he was urged to bring his books here we found that in 1 year he received, according to his tax returns, $119,000, and then he excused what he had said to the Senator from Virginia by saying that he was referring to the net tax that he paid to the Government and not to the net fees he received, because he admitted that in one of those years he had deducted more than $30,000 as a loss upon some other transaction. I merely call attention to that to inquire whether or not when he was before the committee he was fair with the committee; whether he was giving to the committee his honest and best judgment as to what happened.

This man is a trained lawyer. He ought to know that unless he remembered and could tell now what happened some 12 or 13 years ago he ought in some way to have qualified his answer. In many instances he did not qualify his answers at all, but spoke as positively as though the event happened yesterday. Then, when he came before the committee the next time, and was presented with some other complicated situations, from his point of view, he immediately changed front and modified his previous statement and told an entirely different story.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. If I understood the Senator, he stated that Mr. Helvering, when asked if he had made $200,000 in 1 year, said that was absurd. Then, the books later showed he had made a net sum of $119,000. Is that what the Senator said?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; in 1 year.

Mr. LONG. With a gross of $200,000 and a net of $119,000, it appears that his answer was somewhere about right, does it not?

Mr. HASTINGS. If the Senator will look at the record, page 213, he cannot possibly come to the conclusion that at the time he made this statement to the committee he did not intend to give the impression that $123,000 was the total sum he had collected from his professional practice during that period of 5 years. One cannot possibly read the record and reach any other conclusion. Later, when he was confronted with his tax statement, which showed that in 1 year he received as much as $119,000, then he modified his previous statement and said he was talking about the net that he paid to the Government.

Mr. President, I must not take any longer on that particular case. I want to say to the Senate that so far as I am concerned I should not have been able to have found in the Slim Jim Oil Co. case sufficient evidence against Mr. Helvering to complain at all, except for his own explanations and his own contradictory statements every time he came before the committee. My own theory is that when he told the chairman that this arose out of a padded book account by the firm that he was repudiating, at that time he believed that that would be the end of it. When he came before the committee and made the same statement to the committee that he was imposed upon by the auditing firm and by the officers of the corporation he again expected that to be the end of it, but when we attempted to examine witnesses and to call witnesses here it was entirely a different story and he found a different way to excuse himself, namely, under section 210.

What happened, Mr. President, with respect to this man Washington whom he had repudiated and who, he stated, had imposed upon him so that the Government had lost nearly $800,000 by the settlement? What happened? When Washington was subpenaed to come to the city of Washington on a Tuesday he got here on Monday morning, and the first thing he did was to go to the Washington Hotel, to Mr. Helvering's room, where all the testimony was gone over in which he was interested or about which he was to testify. I asked Mr. Washington why he did that, and this man whom Mr. Helvering had undertaken to brand as the man who had been responsible for the Government losing thousands of dollars, and who went to Mr. Helvering, the man by whom he had been branded, he said, "I was a friend of his, and I saw by a Kansas newspaper where he was in trouble about his nomination, and I was anxious to go to see what I could do to help him."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. In just a moment. And what does Mr. Helvering say with respect to it? Helvering says he came; that is true. "I telegraphed him or telephoned him and tried to find him; I tried to find somebody else, the president of the company, and could not do it, so I got in touch with Washington. I did not ask him to come to my hotel, but he did come." What happened when he came? "He hopped on to me," he said, "for making the statement that he, Washington, had padded the books and the Government had thereby lost large sums of money." I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, the Senator certainly does not intend to leave the Senate under the impression that Mr. Helvering was trying to get in touch with Mr. Washington for the purpose of having him come before the committee and testify in accordance with that conversation, when Helvering specifically explained in the record that his purpose in trying to get in touch with Mr. Washington was to find certain records that he thought might be in his possession; and Mr. Washington did not testify before the committee that he had seen in the newspapers about Mr. Helvering being in trouble, and was anxious to come here and help him. He testified that he went to see Mr. Helvering because he had read in the newspapers certain statements that Mr. Helvering had made about him, at which he was indignant. The impression the Senator is seeking to leave with the Senate of a conference between Mr. Helvering and Mr. Washington for the purpose of fixing up the testimony is not only unwarranted by the record, but is deliberately in the face of the record.

Mr. HASTINGS. All right. I will tell the Senator the impression I want to leave with the Senate. I want to leave with the Senate the impression that this kind of testimony left on me. I obtained the distinct impression that all this stuff that he was saying about Washington padding the books was pure bunk, and that is shown by the fact that when Washington, whom he had condemned before the committee, reached the city of Washington, he not only was not unfriendly with him, but he went to Helvering's room at the Washington Hotel as soon as he could, for the purpose of seeing whether or not he could do anything to help Mr. Helvering in this situation. That is the impression I desire to leave with the Senate; and if that impression be true, if I am correct in my interpretation of the incident, I respectfully submit that this man is wholly unfit for this important office.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, what happened on the reopening of the case?

Mr. HASTINGS. As to the reopening of the case, Mr. Titus said that when he found this case was to be reopened he was living in the State of California. He also stated that at the time he settled it he had a definite, fixed understanding with Mr. Darnell that, under no circumstances, should it be reopened. When he found the case was to be reopened, he sought Mr. Helvering's advice as to what he should do, and Mr. Helvering suggested to him that he secure additional counsel. Following that advice, he came here and saw a Member of Congress, a friend of his father. That Member of Congress, whose name he gave, and whose name I do not now recall, said that he would think it over until the next day. The next day he suggested that he get Mr. Colladay and Mr. Gann, because he believed this was a political case, and he suggested that those lawyers be employed, to see if they could readjust the case. That course was followed; there were some such adjustments whereby a compromise was reached, and they paid, as I recall, something like $200,000 or $250,000.

Mr. HATFIELD. That was in addition to the other amount?

Mr. HASTINGS. That was in addition to the $459,000 which had been paid.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator could not remember the name of the Congressman to whom Mr. Titus went. I think it was the Honorable J. M. Tincher, ordinarily known as "Poley" Tincher, of Kansas, and it was suggested, I believe, by Mr. Tincher, that Mr. Gann, who was the brother-in-law of the Vice President, or of the Senator from Kansas at that time, and Mr. Colladay, who was the Republican national committeeman from the District of Columbia, should be employed as attorneys.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire now to go to the one case that attracted my attention when I read this report. It is known as the "Trapshooters Oil & Gas Co. case." I desire first to read from the report of Mr. Partridge, on page 8 of the record, one of the old employees of the Department. I read from this report because it gives some of the history of that case. After reciting the facts, he says:

The foregoing is another fishy transaction, comment upon which would seem to be superfluous. The taxpayer corporation at the time of dissolution set aside $25,000 to pay the income and excess-profits tax believed to be due, and after the lapse of months urged the Department to take the entire amount and close the case. An examination had been made by an internal-revenue agent who recommended $160,365.35 tax, but the result of his examination was not made known to the taxpayer at the time. Presumably the field agent's report was audited and carefully reviewed in the Bureau by men qualified to pass upon cases of the character. Some time after the corporation offered the Government the $25,000 it received notice that the tax due from it was something over $152,000. The officers of the corporation then retained Harry Washington and Guy Helvering, who, after getting the secretary-treasurer to come to Washington for the purpose of a hearing, brazenly attempted to hold him up for $10,000 in addition to the retainer agreed upon. Failing in this purpose, and with full knowledge that the Bureau had fixed the tax at more than $152,000, Helvering drew up a contract which he and Mr. Edgecomb, the secretary-treasurer of the corporation, signed, under the terms of which Helvering was to receive "an amount equal to the amount by which the tax finally assessed against the said Trapshooters Oil & Gas Co. is less than the sum of $25,817.50", and then had a hearing before Mr. Powell, natural resources section, as the result of which the tax was reduced to $7,258.27. That is what the Government ultimately received out of an original claim of $160,000. Counting their retainer, the "tax experts", Washington and Helvering, received about $19,000.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator make any contention that that settlement was not a proper one?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not know that I do. I do not think there is any evidence of it.

Mr. CLARK. I will ask the Senator if it is not a fact, as shown by the record, that that case has been three times reviewed by the Treasury Department and the settlement found to be correct?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not remember the number of times; but it is not what was actually done that I complain about; it is what Helvering tried to do that I complain about.

Mr. CLARK. As a matter of fact, what the Senator really complains about is the fact that Mr. Helvering has been chairman of the Democratic State committee in Kansas?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is not true at all. I do not care what his political position was; I have no prejudice against him because he is a Democrat; the present administration is entitled to have a Democrat in that position; but I insist that, with all the good Democrats there are in the country, who are capable and honest, no effort should be made to try to impose this man upon the Senate and the country.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator, having been one of the instruments in imposing Mr. Robert Lucas on the country as Internal Revenue Commissioner, would doubtless be very much concerned about the character of man at the head of the Internal Revenue Bureau.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. The thing that struck me about the Trapshooters case was that with an assessed tax of $153,000 these people came down to Washington on a Sunday, and at the very first meeting with Helvering he agreed to go ahead with the case, and made a written contract with them by which his fee was to be the difference between the final tax and $25,000. In other words, he had to reduce that tax from $153,000 down to $25,000 before he began to get a cent.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania to the fact that there was subsequent testimony with reference to that matter to the effect that there was a good deal of parley back and forth between those parties as to the fee. At first he demanded a straight fee of $10,000. There is no dispute about that. Whether the first conversation occurred in Washington or in Wichita, Kans., I think, is of no consequence, but after parleying back and forth and disputing about the amount of the taxes assessed and the amount of money they had set aside to pay the tax, and after Mr. Helvering had demanded a straight fee of $10,000, they finally agreed to pay him $2,500 as a retainer, which they did, and compromised the rest by agreeing to pay him whatever he might save out of the $25,000 they had set aside for the tax.

Mr. REED. Let me start again, because the way that was done formed an impression in my mind that Mr. Helvering had some sort of inside track at the Bureau of Internal Revenue which we could not discover but which was not creditable.

Here is what he did. He did get the $2,500 retainer; that is true. When these people came from Kansas to Washington on a Sunday, the first thing Helvering said was, "You have got to have an expert appraiser to make an affidavit as to the value of this oil property at the time of the discovery of oil. I know a man in New York who will make that affidavit, only you will have to pay him $10,000 for doing it." The client said, "I am not such a sucker as that. I will not do anything of the sort." They had a little wrangle about it there on Sunday morning.

Mind you, Helvering knew nothing about the case. He said the facts would have to be developed through an expert, but that being so, on that same Sunday he made a written contract by which his compensation, over and above the small retainer, depended entirely on his cutting down the tax to one sixth of the assessed amount. He must have known that it was possible for him to accomplish that in the Bureau. He could not have known the facts, because he said himself that he had to hire $10,000 worth of experts to get the facts. Then he told us, when his client would not agree to that, that he had a sort of tame expert in his office who was paid a monthly salary and that he sent him to Kansas to make the appraisal.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield for the purpose of making a correction? The Senator from Pennsylvania evidently was not at the hearing.

Mr. REED. I was at a good many of the hearings. That is the story he told at a hearing at which I was present.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that when this man Edgecomb appeared before the committee in his own proper person, three times he testified, until his memory was finally refreshed by the Senator from Delaware that Helvering sent this man from Washington to make the investigation, which perfectly corroborated Helvering's own testimony; that he first charged a fee of $10,000 which would include the services of an engineer that Helvering had permanently retained in his own office.

Mr. REED. I do not care where the expert was or what fee it was Helvering demanded. What I say is that there is something very "fishy" about a lawyer who says he needs an expert to find the facts and, without waiting for anybody to find the facts, makes an agreement that will give him next to nothing unless he cuts the tax down below $25.000.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to call the Senator's attention further to the fact that he is in error, as shown by later testimony before the committee, in his statement that Mr. Helvering at the time of the Washington conference at the Washington Hotel knew nothing about the case, because the record shows, corroborated by Mr. Edgecomb, that in that conference at the Washington Hotel Mr. Helvering was with them and there was advised of the whole case and there tried to make a contract.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that what the Senator from Missouri says is correct, but I want to say also that any person could find in this record, with respect to what Helvering said about the Trapshooters case, anything that he desires. In other words, he made so many statements that were false, so many statements that were contradictory, that anyone can find anything he wants in the record with respect to it.

When he first came before the committee he was advised of this affidavit from Edgecomb. Edgecomb gave the history of the company, that it had been sold out for $50,000, and that they had set aside $25,817.50 to pay the taxes; that he had written to Washington to know why the tax had not been settled, and within 2 weeks after he wrote the letter offering the Department $25,817.50 he got a letter from the Department saying the tax had been fixed at $152,000, and shortly after that Harry Washington was approached with respect to settling the matter.

The directors of the corporation, the corporation itself having been dissolved, got together and borrowed $2,500 to pay a retainer to Harry Washington & Co. Edgecomb was not present, but they communicated with him by telephone, and he agreed to send his share of that particular $2,500. The next he knew he was requested to come to Washington. He declined to come unless his associates in that company agreed to pay their shares of the expenses of the trip. He did come. He came with Harry Washington and they met Helvering at the hotel.

There is in the testimony, in opposition to what the Senator from Missouri has just said, a statement by Helvering himself that at that time he did not know anything about the case and had never been consulted about the case. Later he said, when his recollection was refreshed about it, that he had entered into a written contract in Kansas and that what this man Edgecomb said is not true.

In addition to what impressed the Senator from Pennsylvania, I was particularly impressed with this fact. I was impressed with the fact that, having made a contract in Washington with Helvering, this corporation that was in trouble and had this money ready to turn over to the Government, had raised $2,500 of its own, the secretary-treasurer of the company being the one man, according to the testimony, who had the right to give a check, whose name was required on the check to deliver the amount in the bank. These two tax experts got him in this room, one of them a skilled lawyer, and the other a former employee of the Government—and by the way, he was the same man who adjusted the Slim Jim Oil Co. tax and who, when he was in the Government, had fixed it at $1,211,000.

Then they said what? They said, "We cannot operate under the contract made in Kansas. It will be necessary for you to pay us $10,000 more money in order that we may employ an engineer in New York who will sign the necessary affidavit." According to his own testimony he said, "I may look like a hayseed, but you cannot put that over on me."

The Senator from Pennsylvania attended the hearings and will remember that in the record there is a copy of the letter written by this man Edgecomb to his associates in which he set forth the original contract. He set forth the original contract to be a payment of $2,500 in cash and a further agreement to pay another $2,500 and in addition to that they would have 50 percent of what they could save out of the amount of money that had been set aside and deposited in the banks for this purpose. It was that kind of a contract under which Helvering said they could not operate.

Having that in mind and having this demand before him to pay the $10,000, what did he do? He made a new contract and took a chance on getting his associates to agree with him. The record shows that they asked him what authority he had, and he explained that the corporation was dissolved and that he had drawn the contract so that every member of the board of directors would be compelled to sign it. That was the contract agreed to on Sunday morning.

Now, what happened on Monday? Washington took Edgecomb to the Department and they had a little hearing and they went on to New York. According to his own testimony, by the time he got back to Kansas the $152,000 tax had been reduced to something like seven thousand and odd dollars.

What does Mr. Helvering say when confronted with that? When he was asked the question about the engineer what did he say? Senators ought to read the record to see what he said. He said, "That was not my policy at all." Then he went on to say why it was necessary to employ an engineer, and he gave as the reason that it was not true that he had his own engineer, employed by him, and paying him a monthly salary. On page 17 of the hearings he gives a history of the case, showing why it was necessary to have an engineer examine the property. He said:

> The Trapshooters Oil Co. was a company that brought in the biggest gusher that was produced in Kansas. It was a surprise to them, as everybody else, and they had no pipe-line connections. They made temporary receptacles out of earthwork for the oil, ran the well for some 40 days, and then had to shut it down. After shutting it down the oil well went to salt water, and that was the end of this big gusher. There was an adjustment of taxes on the matter of what they had actually taken out of the well and what they had paid for expenses.

Then I asked him the specific question, "As a matter of fact, was there any physical examination made?" He said positively there was. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the chairman of the Finance Committee, was impressed with the fact that it did not make very much difference whether it was a New York engineer or whether it was a Washington engineer, because on the last day he asked Edgecomb the question. But he had not read the testimony given before the subcommittee in which Helvering said no engineer was employed at all, not his own engineer, not a New York engineer, but no engineer was employed at all. He said it was not an engineer's job. That is his own testimony in this record. That is what he said about it. The Senator from Mississippi was impressed with the idea that it did not make much difference, that he might very well have gotten mixed; that whether it was an engineer in New York or an engineer in Washington did not make any difference. He asked the question, and I had to call his attention to the fact that at a meeting of the subcommittee he denied that he employed an engineer on this job at all, or that the job required an engineer in any of its aspects.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. REED. Is it not correct that in the hearing before the full committee he testified that he sent his Washington engineer to Kansas to make an examination?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is true.

Mr. REED. And then before the subcommittee he testified, also under oath, that he did not have anybody go to Kansas or have any examination made.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is exactly true. When he testified before the full committee when the Senator from Pennsylvania was present, he stated definitely that he received as his fee in the case $10,000 for himself and his engineer. When he came before the subcommittee he admitted the amount that he received was more than $18,000 and that he was mistaken with respect to the fee, mistaken with respect to employing an engineer, and that it was not an engineering job.

Mr. REED. I can understand that a man could forget a good many incidents after a dozen years; but one thing in his testimony stuck tight in my craw, and that was his testimony about his fee arrangement in this case with Washington, Henry & Co. He told us in my hearing that his relations with them were substantially like those with any other client. Sometimes he got a straight-out lump-sum fee; sometimes he worked on a contingent basis.

Mr. HASTINGS. And, just there, did not the Senator get the distinct impression that he paid Washington, Henry & Co. for the auditing work that they did in all the cases they sent to him?

Mr. REED. I got that impression; yes; but I do not remember his words. Then subsequently it was brought out that he had a contract with Washington, Henry & Co. by which he split his fees on a fixed percentage basis with them, all in writing. First the contract was that 33⅓ percent of all that came from the clients went to Helvering, and 66⅔ percent to Washington, Henry & Co. Later, that was changed so that Helvering got 40 percent. Throughout his long dealings with that firm, however, all these cases were governed by that written contract for splitting the fees with them. He could not have forgotten that; and when he told us the contrary, as he did in his first testimony, he must have been consciously trying to deceive the committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, there are numerous instances like that in this record, where he said one thing at one time and said another thing at another time. I respectfully submit that you cannot get out of this record a story made by him solely upon his testimony, and ascertain from it what the true facts are.

Clark R. Edgecomb was brought here from California. He was put upon the stand without any inquiry at all being made of him, so far as I know, with respect to this case. In order that his recollection might be refreshed, I read to him this affidavit that he was supposed to have made. His recollection was that he did not make an affidavit, but that he did make a statement a year or two afterward.

I read Mr. Edgecomb a copy of the letter that he wrote his associate, and I asked him specific questions. He went into detail then. He spoke about this contract that was made in the hotel, and said Washington wrote it by hand; and he did not remember having taken a copy of it himself, but he remembered distinctly that on that Sunday morning it was written by hand. I asked him about the question of the engineer and the $10,000. He said, "I could not forget that. It made a lasting impression upon me. The question of the $10,000 and the engineer from New York made a great impression upon me and I could not be mistaken with respect to that"; and you cannot point out anywhere in it where Edgecomb could possibly be prejudiced. Toward the end of his testimony he said he had no complaint to make; that he was not complaining now. He said, "They charged me a fee. We paid the fee. We got results, and I have no complaint to make about it."

Mind you, Helvering never went to the Department at all on this case, according to the testimony, except Helvering's testimony, and he says he cannot give any details. He said he may have gone a half dozen times; but there is in the record a statement made by Powell, directed to Mr. King, and a memorandum written, saying, "I have concluded to settle this case upon the figures submitted by Mr. Washington." That substantiates Edgecomb's statement that Washington went to the Department with him to see Powell, and that they settled the case then and there, and that, as the Senator from Pennsylvania points out, they must have known at the time they made this contract that this $152,000 could be reduced, or they would not have made the kind of contract they did and would not have got the thing over as quickly as they did.

Mr. President, it is necessary to read this testimony carefully if we are to get out of it all there is in it that is objectionable. I submit that, if we were sitting as a jury and could hear the testimony given by this man, we would be bound to reach the conclusion that we would have to decide the case without considering the testimony given by him. I repeat that, so far as the Slim Jim Oil Co. case is concerned, I would have had no particular complaint against him if I did not have almost a half dozen contradictory explanations made by him as to his conduct in that particular case.

Mr. President, the committee decided that we should not go into the question of other objections that have been made, and are in the record, relative to this appointment. We had letters complaining that as chairman of the Democratic State Committee of Kansas Mr. Helvering was guilty of compelling 5 percent to be contributed by the officeholders for the benefit of the Democratic Party; that no accounting was ever made of that sum; that he was guilty of selling post offices while he was in the Congress; and that he was guilty of various other things that ought to make him unfit for this place; namely, that as president of the road commission he was now being investigated, and the result of that investigation would thoroughly disqualify him for this place.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. Who makes these charges?

Mr. HASTINGS. One of the allegations is made by a former treasurer of the Democratic committee, and the others are made by people that I did not know anything about; but the committee reached the conclusion that these complaints grew out of his political activities, and that it was not necessary to spend the time of the Senate in investigating those charges.

However, after that decision was reached, after I had submitted to the committee the names of the persons I desired to interrogate regarding these transactions in connection with the settlement of these tax cases, I received from Kansas an old file relative to the sale of post offices in the State of Kansas when Mr. Helvering was in the Congress. It was of such a serious character that I deemed it important that the committee investigate it. I went to the chairman of the committee and told him that I desired to have these witnesses subpenaed, and he consented that they be included in the list.

The one complaint made was by Frederick D. Lamb, of Manhattan, Kans. Frederick D. Lamb was appointed postmaster in Kansas April 1, 1919. At the time he was appointed postmaster he was the head of the chamber of commerce of that town, composed of about 10,000 people. He was a director of the Rotary Club. He was the owner of a Democratic newspaper published semiweekly. It seemed to me, therefore, that the statements made by Mr. Lamb might be of some importance.

In this letter of Mr. Lamb's were the names of certain people that I thought it desirable to subpena. I desire to read to the Senate a part of the letters written by Lamb to the Post Office Department. This particular one was to the post-office inspector, and was dated October 13, 1919. Here is what he says:

> On August 13, 1918, examination papers were filed in Washington in the matter of post-office appointments at Manhattan, Kans. There were 14 candidates. In May 1919 I received my grading. I later learned that my markings were the highest of the candidates. I was later informed that I had been appointed postmaster. Owing to the failure of Congress to confirm appointments before adjournment of the last Congress, I received a recess appointment effective April 1, 1919. Before I received notice that I had been appointed, William Castle, of Manhattan, came to me in my office (the Riley County Chronicle) and stated that I would have to put up $1,000 before I would receive this appointment. He did not state from whom he came or to whom the money would be paid. He came to see me to the same general effect four times and was told emphatically that there was nothing doing.

Later on he says:

> He came to see me to the same general effect four times and was told that "I do not know whom you represent, but if Mr. Helvering is sending you to me, you may tell him that I said to say to him that 'he could go to hell', that there would be nothing doing."

In a statement to the First Assistant Postmaster General under date of October 13, 1919, Mr. Lamb had certain things to say which I desire to read. I will say, in this connection, that he explained why this statement was written to the First Assistant Postmaster General. He says that he received this appointment, and he received these communications from Castle and from the president of the Citizens' State Bank of Manhattan, Mr. Pratt, and he had made up his mind that he would not pay this amount and that Helvering had thereupon said to his friends that he was going to "get him", or words to that effect.

Having that in mind, he came to Washington and laid the whole matter before the Post Office Department. Subsequently he received his appointment in February 1920 and was confirmed.

In this statement he says that Mr. Pratt, the president of the Citizens' State Bank of Manhattan, informed him that Helvering wanted a certain amount of money. He continues as follows:

My recollection is that the amount named was $1,000, although I am not absolutely sure. According to Mr. Pratt's statement to me it was intimated that the money was to be used to pay a member of the Commission for placing me at the top of the list. I refused to pay a cent, and Mr. Helvering was told I had no money. Mr. Pratt further reported to me that Mr. Helvering then asked that I make the payment monthly. I refused to do this but did offer to release Mr. Helvering from the payment of a bill for advertising, incurred during his previous campaign. Mr. Pratt reported back that Mr. Helvering stated he would not accept this, and, on the other hand, he was not through with me.

In that connection, William Castle was subpenaed and denied that he ever had this conversation with Lamb. Pratt also appeared; but before he appeared on the stand, by cross-examination of some members of the committee it was ascertained that while he was president of the bank he was convicted of embezzlement and had served a certain length of time in prison. In his testimony he says that he did approach Lamb at Helvering's request, but, as he recollected the matter, it was for campaign purposes, and not because it was necessary to have Lamb pay that money in order to keep the post office.

There appears in this correspondence to the post-office inspector, however—I tried to find the original papers in the Post Office Department but was told they had been destroyed—a letter which Helvering wrote Mr. AYRES, a Member of Congress from the adjoining district. Lamb explains this letter by saying that Helvering had recommended some other person, a man by the name of Frank, for the post office, and had requested Frank to write a letter to the Civil Service Commission and to AYRES, requesting that he be appointed. Frank, who was at that time friendly with Lamb, instead of mailing the letters, as he had been requested to do by Helvering, Helvering not wanting them to go through Lamb's post office, took a copy of the letter which Helvering had written to AYRES, the Congressman from the adjoining district. In this letter he called attention to the fact that Frank "is the salt of the earth, and would make an A-1 postmaster, while the man at the head of the list is a double-crosser and has handed me several packages." He admitted writing the letter, and insisted that he had had no trouble with Lamb. Of course, he denied that he had ever directly or indirectly requested Lamb to give him any money because of the favor of this appointment, but he insisted that he could not explain what he had meant in this letter by saying that he was a double-crosser, and that he had handed him several packages.

Mr. President, in that connection there was another letter in this file which, to my mind, was of the greatest importance, a letter written by one W. D. Vincent. W. D. Vincent was described as the president of the W. D. Vincent Hardware Co. at Clay Center, Kans. I had had a subpena issued for him, but the witnesses who appeared here said that Mr. Vincent had died. This letter was written to Lamb. I asked that it be put into the record, but the committee would not permit it to be put into the record because he was dead. To my mind, this letter speaks a great deal stronger and more emphatically than letters which have been written since this appointment was made and have been permitted to be put into the record. Here was a man who had nothing to gain, who was not trying to hurt anybody, who was writing a friendly letter to Lamb, telling Lamb how he might be certain to secure this post office. He was replying to a letter which Lamb had written to him.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator say that Mr. Lamb, after he learned of Mr. Helvering's opposition to his reappointment, deliberately entered into correspondence, on his own admission, with every sorehead he heard of in the State of Kansas who had been refused an appointment by Mr. Helvering for the purpose of finding out and getting any abuse of Mr. Helvering that he could get from any of these soreheads?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; but what has that to do with the matter?

Mr. CLARK. It is certainly a fine reflection on the character of letters the Senator from Delaware insists on putting into the RECORD.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me read this letter, and see what the Senate thinks of it.

Mr. CLARK. I have heard it several times. I know what is in it.

Mr. HASTINGS. It reads:

Mr. F. D. LAMB,
Manhattan, Kans.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your letter of the 27th inst. You will find me in Clay Center all this week and next, and would be pleased to talk matters over with you any time. Will also be glad to do anything in my power to help you. However, I do not know of anything I could do. I appreciate your position and think I understand where the difficulty is. I know the man you have to deal with. If he still aspires to political honors, you may bring such pressure to bear that he will hardly dare to go back on you. Otherwise there is only one thing that will count: Money. I have not the slightest doubt that if you should promise to divide the salary, the matter would be favorably settled immediately. I know by actual experience that he is that kind of a man. Purely mercenary. The dollar is the only thing he can see in politics. He is no doubt looking for a man who will divide up with him.

It is humiliating to realize that the Democrats of this district have been represented (or misrepresented) in Congress 6 years by this kind of a person. He is positively the crookedest man I ever had any dealings with. If you can convince him that he cannot afford to turn you down, you may come out all right yet.

Sorry I can offer so little encouragement. If you think of anything I can do, let me know and I shall gladly do it.

Trusting that you may be successful, I am,

Very truly yours,

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is reading now from a letter which the committee refused to allow to go into the record, because the man who is alleged to have written it has been dead for 15 years, and nobody proved that it was his letter, nobody who read it ever saw his handwriting, there is not a word of evidence in the record to show that this man wrote the letter, and the Senator himself does not know that he wrote it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, suppose he did write the letter; is that the kind of a case the Senator is going to try out here? This man Helvering has been in politics out in Kansas and probably had to do with hiring and firing 10,000 men. Every time he hired and fired a man, every one of them he had fired would be willing to write a letter that he was a scoundrel for firing him. I was impressed with the kind of a showing the Senator was making on the other testimony, but I do not understand that a case should be hinged on letters that people write.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I may say that I am not certain that what the Senator says would not be correct if the whole case hung upon that single letter, or upon any other one thing that had been proved in the case, but I say that it is impossible for an unprejudiced Senate to take the combination of circumstances and the combination of cases without reaching the conclusion that this man is wholly unfit for this position.

Mr. LONG. I think that is the weakest argument the Senator can make, and I had that thought the other day during the Louderback case, where it was said, "Charge no. 1: There is nothing in it. Charge no. 2: There is nothing in it. Charge no. 3 and charge no. 4: There is nothing in them." But on the combination of "not guilties" find him "guilty." I think that is the slimmest case one can make out.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield to me?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I should like to address an inquiry to the Senator from Mississippi. May we not enter into some form of agreement so that the Senate may recess at 6 o'clock and convene tomorrow morning at 10?

Mr. HARRISON. I understand there are several Senators on the other side who might desire to speak. So far as I am concerned, I should be very glad if we could fix a time definitely for a vote tomorrow on the nomination.

Mr. McNARY. Let me suggest to the Senator that we recess at this time until 11 o'clock tomorrow, in executive session, and vote upon the confirmation of the nominee tomorrow at 3 o'clock.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I am anxious to have this case disposed of; but if several Senators on the other side are to speak, as indicated by the Senator from Mississippi, and they are to take all the time until 3 o'clock, and then we are to vote, I could not enter into any such agreement. I want at least time enough to reply to this stuff being dumped into the RECORD.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to make a few remarks myself.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, would the Senator from Oregon be willing that we recess until 11 o'clock, and that the time tomorrow be equally divided between the proponents and the opponents of the nomination?

Mr. McNARY. That is very fair. That would give each side 2 hours.

Mr. President, I propose that we recess in executive session, after we conclude the session today, until 11 o'clock tomorrow, and that we vote upon the pending nomination at 3 o'clock, the time to be divided equally between those opposing and those supporting the nomination.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does that take into account the 2 hours which have already been occupied by one opponent of the nomination?

Mr. McNARY. Certainly not. There would be 4 hours tomorrow. I thought 2 hours would be an abundance of time for the Senator and his associates.

Mr. BARKLEY. I myself think 2 hours will be all that is necessary to answer 4 hours of argument on the other side.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that arrangement will be satisfactory.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I suggest that in the unanimous-consent agreement the Senator from Oregon indicate by whom the time is to be allotted on each side?

Mr. McNARY. I did not indicate any individuals. I specified that it should be equally divided between those supporting and those opposing the nomination.

Mr. REED. I suppose we can agree, when the time comes, as to whether a Senator is speaking on one side or the other. Sometimes it is hard to tell. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No one ever has any difficulty in determining on which side the Senator from Pennsylvania speaks.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. I submit the request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent proposal offered by the Senator from Oregon? There being no objection, the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I suggest that the clerk proceed with the call of the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the next order of business on the calendar.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Alexander W. Weddell, of Virginia, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Argentina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate take a recess, in pursuance of the order heretofore agreed to, until 11 o'clock a.m. tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p.m.) the Senate, in executive session, under the order previously entered, took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, June 1, 1933, at 11 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MAY 31, 1933

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, maker of all things, judge of all men, we beseech Thee to heal our infirmities; grant that we may love, fear, and serve Thee with all faithfulness; direct the tides of our affections, and may they rule our daily conduct. Blessed Father, accept us and, in the performance of public service, crown us with courageous perseverance. By pure motives and sincere convictions, couched in understanding, may we seek the everlasting good of our Republic and merit the esteem of our fellow countrymen. In the holy name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Monday, May 29, 1933, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 5329. An act creating the St. Lawrence Bridge Commission and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Ogdensburg, N.Y.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 285. An act to authorize the addition of certain lands to the Ochoco National Forest, Oreg.;

S. 317. An act authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make advances to the reclamation fund;

S. 324. An act to provide for the establishment of the Everglades National Park in the State of Florida, and for other purposes;

S. 510. An act to provide for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such system, and for other purposes;

S. 696. An act to authorize Frank W. Mahin, retired American Foreign Service officer, to accept from Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands the brevet and insignia of the Royal Netherland Order of Orange Nassau;

S. 1103. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with certain public works at the Naval Air Station, Pensacola, Fla.;

S. 1104. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with certain public works at the Naval Air Station, Pensacola (Corry Field), Fla.;

S. 1513. An act to amend Public Act No. 435 of the Seventy-second Congress, relating to sales of timber on Indian land;

S. 1536. An act giving credit for water charges paid on damaged land;

S. 1648. An act to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, to provide for loans to closed building and loan associations;

S. 1738. An act authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to irrigation districts for certain purposes; and

S.J.Res. 54. Joint resolution limiting the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code.

FANNIE E. WRIGHT

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 139

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Fannie E. Wright, daughter of J. W. Wright, late an employee of the House, an amount equal to 6 months' compensation, and an additional amount, not exceeding $250, to defray funeral expenses of the said J. W. Wright.

The resolution was agreed to.

MEMORIAL DAY

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, in the past, when practical, on Decoration Day the House has paused for a moment to pay tribute to the memory of our soldiers in past wars. Owing to pressing duties before the various committees, this year it was impossible to do that. I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes in connection with revived memories of war and sorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I think it is eminently fitting and proper that the Congress in special session should set aside a few moments of its crowded program and in this public manner return to the men who served her so valiantly and so victoriously in the most stupendous war in the entire history of the human race; but American men, women, and children have already demonstrated their gratitude and pride in every way which human ingenuity could devise. We are only doing in solemn and official manner what the great, proud, pulsing, loving heart of America has expressed in enthusiastic and impromptu fashion. What we say will matter little, but what our soldiers did will never fade from human memory so long as the world endures. They demonstrated American prowess in arms to all the nations of the earth and raised our country's fame to a pinnacle of exceeding glory.

America is proud of her soldiers, but not because they constitute a part of a military machine. The pride of Rome in her legions, the pride of France in the disciplined troops that followed Napoleon, the pride of Germany in her vast military machine has never been hers. The pride of America in her soldiers has ever been that they were citizen soldiers, called from the peaceful pursuits to serve and sacrifice for the preservation of their liberty, the safety of their country, and the security of their homes. They served not for military distinction, not for fame or glory, not for place or power, but in fulfillment of their obligations as a citizen, because they believed that any sacrifice was better than the surrender of all they held dear. It is this that has ever lent distinction to their service. It is this that has ever made their supreme sacrifice so solemn and so sacred.

Sixty-eight years ago this month, after the close of the great Civil War, this city witnessed the greatest parade that has ever passed down historic Pennsylvania Avenue, when our victorious soldiers of the Armies of the Tennessee and of Georgia, 200,000 strong, marched down the Avenue in the great review before President Johnson and General Grant and other famous men of the Nation. The victory had been won; the Union had been maintained; rebellion had been crushed; but in the flush of victory there was grief profound that so many of the comrades of the marchers had made the supreme sacrifice and yielded up their lives on the battlefields of the South and that the great emancipator, Abraham Lincoln, had passed over to the other shore only a little while before that historic and victorious parade. On that occasion a great banner was hung across the front of this Capitol Building, and on it was this inscription:

"The only national debt we can never pay is the debt we owe the victorious Union soldiers."

Today I repeat that the only national debt we can never pay is the debt we owe to the gallant soldiers, sailors, and marines of past wars, as well as those of the World War; the young heroes who have added new luster to the American flag. And may I turn aside to say just here, Mr. Speaker, that I know but one thing more beautiful in all the world than the American flag; that is the American boy in uniform, who was willing to die to keep that flag floating over your home and mine.

But my time has expired, and I think perhaps I have suggested quite enough for the time being, and will only say in closing that today we have for our heroic soldiers, sailors, and marines of all wars but one sentiment: "Cheers for the living, tears for the dead."

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House now stand at attention for one half minute out of respect to the memory of our dead soldiers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Members of the House stood in silence for half a minute.

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE—LEAVE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF HOUSE

Mr. MAJOR. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be permitted to sit today and tomorrow during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NEWSPAPER CENSORSHIP IN WISCONSIN

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PEAVEY. Mr. Speaker, since the publication of my speech on newspaper censorship in Wisconsin under date of March 29, 1933, in which I answered the carping criticism of the reactionary Milwaukee Journal, Superior Telegram, Ashland Press, and Merrill Daily Herald of my absence on leave due to illness during the first 10 days of the present session of Congress, the following significant events have taken place.

First, the Superior Telegram published a 4-column editorial defending itself against the charges I made. It published part of my speech, leaving out the two most pertinent sections; the one defending the soldiers against the Economy Act and the program I suggested that they adopt for the good of the people of Wisconsin.

The Superior Telegram used more space in an effort to answer some of the charges made in my speech than they have given me or my office since I was first elected to Congress. They made a specious plea for fairness when everyone knows that under cover the Telegram is the most bitter, partisan, reactionary influence in Superior.

That is why they fight me. That is why they always foster a second progressive association to split labor, the farmers, and the progressives generally that the representatives of "special privilege" may be elected.

In its editorial the Telegram said I was an inveterate publicity hunter. What a lie! The Telegram convicts itself; either it has suppressed publicity regarding me and my office or else very little has been issued because it has never been published. The Telegram's own files prove this. Does the Telegram think its flat statement is going to be accepted as a fact when the Telegram's own files prove beyond argument that either I send out very little publicity or that the Telegram and other daily newspapers suppress it. The files of the Telegram prove to anyone interested enough to look that the county coroner and his office have received more publicity than the Congressman of the Tenth District since I was elected to office.

The Telegram's files show that every reactionary assemblyman from Superior has been given double and triple the space allowed the Congressman. As for State senator, every occupant of that office since I was elected to Congress has been publicized by the Telegram until many people have been led to believe that the State senator's office is much the more important of the two. As for actual publicity, the Telegram's own files prove that their present State senator receives more publicity than the President of the United States.

Here are some things the Telegram has not told the people of Douglas County, and they have all the facts. The Telegram should tell its readers why the Telegram's State senator started the investigation of the Wisconsin Grain Commission. He knows and so does the Telegram that W. R. McCabe and Charles W. Peacock are honorable men; that they have conducted the affairs of the commission efficiently and in the public's interest. They all know that McCabe and Peacock are conducting the commission as well or even better than it has ever been run since it was established in 1911. Why did the Telegram and its State senator want them investigated? Would this investigation have been called if the State senator had not refused to appear in court and testify as to his connection with J. W. Leverich and the small-loans lobby investigation begun by the district attorney of Dane County? Does the Telegram think that bribery and political corruption already disclosed about the small-loans lobby should not be investigated? Does the Telegram approve of such bribery and corruption in legislative affairs? I am impelled to ask these questions because nowhere have I seen or read the Telegram's attitude on these matters. As a daily newspaper, I am sure the Telegram must have an opinion. I am not like some critics of the Telegram who believe the Telegram fostered the recent investigation of the Wisconsin Grain Commission because McCabe and Peacock had found it necessary in the interests of economy to cut off the two or three thousand dollars a year formerly paid the Telegram for advertising, when the State had nothing to sell which the readers of the Telegram would buy.

The Telegram would like to have its readers believe that they are fair in publishing the news. Let us see. Will the Telegram deny that there was any purpose in the action of their State senator's private examination of J. W. Connor, a biased, political enemy of mine, held after the other committee members had returned to Madison than to elicit malicious slander against me under the color of a quasi-legal proceeding? A more flagrant case of manufactured political slander to suit the purposes of a prejudice-interested publisher has never come to my attention. Does the Telegram think the people of Superior are dumb, devoid of a sense of justice, that they will believe such a falsehood? The Telegram knows that there is not a store in Superior, Ashland, or Washburn but that welcomes any charge account that I give them. The Telegram knows that I have paid every just debt contracted in the 25 years I have lived in northern Wisconsin. They know my credit is good wherever I am known. Then why publish these villainous falsehoods?

What a reflection on the State of Wisconsin, under whose authority this political bushwhacking was conducted, all to direct attention from the State senator who had become contaminated with the notorious small-loans lobby at Madison!

Some Superior citizen might like to know how much "paid advertising" the Telegram received from those loaning money to the unemployed citizens of Superior at the munificent interest rate of 42 percent permitted by the present small-loans law?

ASHLAND PRESS

The Ashland Press has suppressed all news pertaining to me and my office ever since the last campaign, when I refused to support Hoover or to support Chapple's candidacy for the United States Senate. The Press denies this and vents its spleen in some vicious editorial criticism of me personally. The Press has convicted itself of every charge I made in my recent speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I refer to the manner in which the Press has handled the news pertaining to the Ashland bank failures and all the negotiations toward a reorganization or starting a new bank.

Practically all these negotiations between the citizens' committees on reorganization, the depositors' committees and the comptroller's office were carried on through me and my office; the telegrams, long-distance calls, and letters show this. Everyone connected with the reorganization knows it, but the Press would not publish it. Why? They made vociferous denials that they suppressed the news when attacking me editorially. What do they say now?

The Press calls itself a daily newspaper. They enjoy their share of a subsidy (second-class mail) that cost the taxpayers of the United States $102,000,000 last year. It seems to me the people of Ashland are entitled to some other answer than just another tirade of personal abuse against me.

MERRILL HERALD

Editor Chilsen, in a recent Herald editorial tirade against me, made the bald assertion, quoting from the Herald of March 29, 1933: "The Congressman is noted for his absenteeism." Mr. Chilsen and the Merrill Herald have aided and abetted the Superior Telegram and the Ashland Press for years past in spreading this falsehood to the public. The Herald, the Telegram, and the Press are afraid to face the issues, they do not dare attack my record votes in Congress, so they lie about the number of my votes. Why do they not print the roll calls? The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is reliable. It is accurate. I challenge these protectors of "special privilege" to print the record roll calls as they are made. I challenge them to print the roll-call records not only of Congress but of the State legislature.

Why do not these daily newspapers give the people the facts and show who is absent on important roll calls and how the people's representatives vote? I challenge them to do it. I will put my record for voting and for being present to vote on important measures against that of any reactionary Mr. Chilsen or these other "privilege-protecting" daily newspapers can name.

That the people may have the facts, I have compiled a table of the list of votes for the last two sessions of Congress to this date, May 24. Here it is: Last session, December 5, 1932, to March 4, 1933, 37 yea-and-nay votes, 12 quorum calls, total 49. Of this number I was present and answered 41; of the 8 that I missed, 2 were quorum calls, 4 were unimportant, and the other 2 came while I was at home for the Christmas holidays. During this special session from March 9 to May 24 there have been 35 yea-and-nay votes and 8 quorum calls; total 43. Of this number I was present and answered 35; of the remaining 8 that I missed, 2 were quorum calls and the remaining 6 were made during the first 10 days of the session when I was home on leave of absence because of illness.

No man can represent his constituents faithfully and well and take up their hundreds of different cases with the several departments at Washington and not miss an occasional roll call. I challenge these daily newspapers to name a single reactionary member of the State legislature or Congress who has a better record. These are the facts as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is my record. I am proud of it, and I resent this deliberate attempt on the part of unscrupulous daily newspapers like the Herald, the Milwaukee Journal, the Superior Telegram, and the Ashland Press in not only suppressing the actual facts as to my voting record, but also by deliberate falsehoods and insinuations try to make the people believe that I am derelict in the performance of my official duties.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows just who is present and absent and how they vote on every roll call. So does the journal of the State legislature. Why does not the Herald and its "privilege-protecting" associates publish these roll calls? I will tell you why, because they do not dare do so. If they published the roll-call records, they would have to show how the reactionary supporters of privilege vote, and that would make it difficult, if not impossible, for these reactionary representatives to be reelected. Why not give the people the whole truth about the roll-call records of all the Members of Congress? Ours is a representative form of Government. How can the people govern themselves when they are unable to know how their Representatives vote? For years the daily newspapers have suppressed this vital information. Why? It is suppressed at all times and on all occasions, except when some newspaper wants to attack or injure some Member of the House or Senate. Why this censorship of the most vital information necessary to carry out the functions of representative government?

Not every citizen can buy the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but he can and does subscribe to the newspapers privileged under the law to circulate free within the county where published. Why protect the privileged few in Government at its source? Why not publish the whole record as to those absent and how those present vote on important roll calls. Are the daily newspapers afraid to tell the people how their representatives vote at Washington and Madison? Do the daily newspapers thus protect the friends of "privilege and graft" in the public business? Why permit free looting and political racketeering in this vital function of representative government? If daily newspapers will not publish the facts pertaining to roll-call records of their representatives, they should be made to surrender their franking privilege of "free postage" within the county where published.

ECONOMY BILL

Wisconsin newspapers for weeks past have carried on a propaganda campaign for the program of the National Economy League—the big Federal income-tax payers—to cut Government expenses, cut wages, slash pensions and benefits paid disabled soldiers. "Balance the Budget" is the burden of their cry. Why do not the daily newspapers do something themselves to this end? They unbalanced the budget to the extent of $102,144,290.83 last year. That is the exact amount of the Government's deficit on second-class mail—newspapers and magazines—last year.

Income-tax payers, like the four newspapers mentioned, are for the national economy bill, of course; it balances the National Budget, keeps their tax-exempt securities at par, and the poorly paid Government employees and disabled soldiers drawing from $12 to $24 per month can carry the burden.

There are 13,000,000 able-bodied men out of employment now. What chance have the ex-soldiers, many of them the most loyal, the most patriotic men to wear the uniform during the World War, to get a job? None. The passage of the Roosevelt economy bill as it pertains to the disabled World War veterans is economically unsound and patriotically unjust. These men, because of their loyalty to duty, their officers and their country's cause, carried on in the trenches and on the field, sacrificing their lives and health without regard to preservation of their Army records, now find themselves penalized for their patriotism.

Everyone familiar with soldier claims knows that most of those men now drawing disability allowances are doing so because they did not press their claims in time. Most of them have service-connected disabilities in fact, but they either sacrificed their soldier records for the good of the service or they, through a sense of patriotism, refused to press their claims until the economic necessities, 1929–32, to get a living for themselves and their families forced them to seek justice.

It is my earnest hope that President Roosevelt will be more lenient and generous in administering the law as it pertains to slashing the soldiers' pay in the economy bill than the harsh terms of the measure itself warrant.

The economic effect of this is that these disabled veterans, unable to work and turned adrift by the Federal Government, will become a direct charge on the communities where they live, and this means increase of local property taxes, both real and personal.

Had I been present the first 10 days of the special session, I would have voted "aye" on the beer bill, which passed by a vote of 316 to 97, and I would have voted "nay" on the economy bill slashing the soldiers. This measure passed by a vote of 266 for to 138 against.

Through the cooperation of the postmasters for the whole district I have secured the total number of soldiers drawing Government benefits who will be affected by the administration of the Economy Act. There are 2,063 disabled veterans in the Tenth District now drawing $653,462.40 annually. More than one half of these soldiers will be cut off entirely on July 1. Of the remaining half, their compensation and pension will be reduced 25 percent or more, making approximately a reduction of 75 percent or $490,096.80 annually. That is what the passage of the economy bill means to northern Wisconsin. The people of the Tenth District will lose $490,096.80 annually.

THE DYNAMITE SITUATION

When I succeeded in securing the passage of my dynamite bill at the last session of Congress, I supposed the farmers of my district would have Government explosives at low cost early this summer. The biggest obstacle in securing the passage of a bill of that nature usually comes from the executive department concerned with its administration after it becomes a law. The War Department, the holder of the deteriorated surplus explosives to be reconditioned for use in land clearing, cooperated with me through the Committee on Military Affairs, the committee to which my bill was referred, when the measure was being considered by the committee. The Department of Agriculture, the Department responsible for the administration of the law, once the bill was enacted, offered no objection during the time the bill was before the committee and Congress, finally becoming a law on March 3, 1933.

A few days after March 3 the Agriculture Department informed me that a memorandum was being prepared to be submitted to the Director of the Budget for a reimbursable fund of $15,000 for the administration of the law, to be returned to the Treasury as the explosives were sold to the farmers. After waiting 3 weeks for further word, I consulted the Department and was then informed that they were unable to administer the law because these surplus explosives in the possession of the War Department were so badly deteriorated it would be extremely dangerous to rework them for stump-blasting purposes. They said that at the present time explosives for land clearing can be purchased at $10 per hundred pounds in carload lots. Few farmers want to buy more than 500 or 1,000 pounds at a time. Buying retail in small quantities, the farmers pay from $18 to $20 per hundred pounds. The Department of Agriculture further advised me that the passage of the production-credits bank bill would, in their opinion, meet the situation and make the administration of my bill unnecessary.

Under the terms of this bill the farmers of any community can organize a local association and secure money and credit with which to buy dynamite in car lots for distribution. Those without the cash can in this manner secure funds for dynamite on time at 5- or 6-percent interest. The production-credits bank bill passed the House this week, and I hope it will work as recommended by the Department of Agriculture and that the cut-over land farmers of northern Wisconsin will be enabled thereby to secure cheap explosives on credit.

Should conditions change and the price of dynamite become excessive, my bill for the distribution of Government explosives can then be invoked.

I have advised the Department of Agriculture that I will oppose the repeal of my bill until such time as it is demonstrated that the cut-over land farmers are being supplied with cheap dynamite with which to clear land.

ALCOHOL-GASOLINE

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House are familiar with the agitation that has been carried on for some time with reference to the blending of alcohol manufactured from domestic-grown grain with gasoline as a motor fuel, as a measure of agricultural relief. Much attention has been given to this subject on both sides, and response thereto has come from various organizations. I have arranged, tentatively, that on the 7th of June in Washington, D.C., under the auspices of the Bureau of Standards, the American Motorists Association, the American Automobile Association, and various agricultural agencies and interested people in my State, to have a public demonstration of the merits or contended demerits of alcohol-gasoline as a motor fuel. All those Members representing agricultural States I know are vitally interested, because some 4 or 5 bills on that subject are pending now in the House. Anyone wanting any more detailed information can receive the same by keeping in touch with my office. I hope that a substantial delegation of Members may be in attendance at this demonstration.

FARM CREDIT ACT OF 1933

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5790) to provide for organizations within the Farm Credit Administration to make loans for the production and marketing of agricultural products, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, to provide a market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 5790, with Mr. SHALLENBERGER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this measure for the most part merely provides for implementing the Executive order which combined all of the agencies engaged in lending money for agricultural purposes under one head. It will be recalled that there are some 5 or 6 agencies in the different departments of the Government which were engaged in different forms of lending. Some 60 days ago the Chief Executive issued an order consolidating all of these agencies and placing them under one head, to be known as "the Farm Credit Administration." This measure provides for the necessary regional and local banks, corporations, and associations for proper functioning under that Executive order.

The measure provides for taking the unexpended balances and collections under the crop-production and seed loans, consisting of a fund estimated to be around $80,000,000 or a little more, and undertaking to have a system of production credit based on a sounder system than has heretofore existed. In addition to this $80,000,000 there is an appropriation authorized of some $40,000,000, which will create a revolving fund of $120,000,000. It is hoped that the system provided for under this portion of the bill will take the place of the present crop-production method which has been necessary in the great emergency and which, in its essence, cannot be on a very sound basis. This $120,000,000 is used as a revolving fund for establishing a production corporation in each Federal land-bank city, with a capital stock of not less than $7,500,000.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, you are going to establish some new production associations in each land-bank district in the United States?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. I thought as a result of the Executive order we were going to contract all of those loaning agencies instead of establishing new ones?

Mr. JONES. Well, it is not establishing new agencies centrally. They will all be under one head; but there are different forms of credit, and this will provide for the necessary harness or agency to carry out the activities that have been placed under the central head. It is estimated by those in charge that they will save at least $2,000,000 annually in administrative costs.

Mr. SNELL. Was there evidence to that effect placed before the gentleman's committee?

Mr. JONES. Yes. They assured us that with this set-up they would save at least $2,000,000 every year in administrative costs.

Mr. SNELL. As I read the report, to a certain extent this takes the place of the seed-loan organization?

Mr. JONES. Yes. As I had just stated to the Committee, it is hoped that this will substitute a sound basis of credit for the emergency credit that has been arranged heretofore from year to year in the distress period.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman really believe that if we have another emergent situation this will take the place of those seed loans?

Mr. JONES. That is a very difficult question to answer. That would depend upon how desperate the emergency might be. I have every hope that this measure will make unnecessary the future so-called "crop-production loans", at least, of a general nature.

Mr. SNELL. Well, there are a great many modifications in the gentleman's statement.

Mr. JONES. Of course the gentleman understands that in great emergencies like an earthquake or a storm there might be local situations which would require emergent attention, but as far as concerns the general demands of agriculture, country wide in scope, I hope that that will be unnecessary.

Mr. SNELL. Now, how many different organizations will there be in the Government to loan money to the farmers when you pass this bill?

Mr. JONES. There will be just one, with different branches. Of course, we have the land-bank system.

Mr. SNELL. That is one.

Mr. JONES. They are all under one head in Washington.

Mr. SNELL. They may be under one head, but I am wondering how many different organizations are going to loan money to different individuals connected with farms?

Mr. JONES. Then we will have the cooperative credit. They will not loan to individuals. They will loan to associations of individuals, and the gentleman understands that is an entirely different type of credit from the land-bank credit. Then we will have this production credit corporation, which will, through the local associations, loan to individuals. The production credit banks themselves will not loan to individuals, but the production credit corporation will furnish the major portion of the stock for the local associations, which will enable them to secure credit through the intermediate credit bank, which is the functioning agency.

Mr. SNELL. In my hasty examination of the report this morning it seems to me this sets up two different organizations in each of the 12 land-banks divisions of the country.

Mr. JONES. In each of those regions they will have the same directors and the same officers. It is a fact that they would probably put them all under one name in this region, but if you put the production credit and the cooperative credit as a part of the land-bank credit, it would probably make it much more difficult for the land bank to borrow its funds and dispose of its obligations.

Mr. SNELL. You appropriate $120,000,000 to start this?

Mr. JONES. We appropriate $40,000,000 and utilize the unexpended balances and collections.

Mr. SNELL. Well, it is practically an appropriation of $120,000,000.

Mr. JONES. It utilizes $120,000,000 but authorizes an appropriation of $40,000,000.

Mr. SNELL. But it all comes out of the Treasury just the same. Can the gentleman give the House any information as to the number of additional employees necessary to carry out the provisions of this bill?

Mr. JONES. They assure us that not only will it not be necessary to provide additional employees, but that they will be able to very materially reduce the present number of employees. As a matter of fact, under this head, instead of several members of the Farm Loan Board, for instance, they will only have one, the Farm Loan Commissioner. Then these different lending agencies in each region are to have the same directors, and really, instead of being separate organizations in the regions, they are directed by the same people, but for the purpose of financing; that is, endeavoring, for the most part, to finance themselves through the regular credit structure of the country rather than through the Government, but they keep them separate so that one will not handicap the other in the process of financing.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know whether or not they have taken on a great number of additional employees in connection with this new financing in the Agricultural Department at the present time?

Mr. JONES. I regret that I am not able to furnish the gentleman full information on that. It is my understanding that so far they have not taken on a great many new employees because they have not fully developed their plans. How many may be necessary when their plans are fully made and in operation I am not in position to tell the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman and his committee really understand this measure, I am sure the House does not.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is asking a question clearly outside the purview of this bill now.

Mr. SNELL. Perhaps so far as the last question was concerned, but not my original question.

Mr. JONES. Yes. The last question of the gentleman was far removed from the situation.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate that, but the other questions were directly connected with the bill.

Mr. JONES. I have tried to give the gentleman information.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. If the gentleman from Texas will permit, as I understand the testimony before our committee the net result of this bill, in the first place, means that you will resolve back into the different district units, agencies that are now in effect, that you will reduce the number of employees, that you will make these local agencies contact local conditions instead of having them come down here and working from here back to the agencies, and that the net result of it will be a saving in the administrative end of the proposition of about $2,000,000. Is this right?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is correct, and I thank him for his contribution.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Do I understand if this bill is passed that a farmer who wants a seed-grain loan will have to join an association in which he will associate himself with other farmers who have the same need?

Mr. JONES. He will be compelled, in order to secure advantage of the production loans, to purchase stock in a local association, whether it is technically called membership or not, to the extent of 5 percent of the amount of his loans. This bill provides that there shall be no double liability, and it also does away with double liability on stock under the national farm-loan association system. So that the man simply is given this additional interest in the success of the local association.

Now, these local associations are not just banded together for the purpose of securing these particular loans. With this $120,000,000 the Government will furnish four fifths of the stock of the local association and the man who secures the loan will put up 5 percent. If he borrows $100, he will leave $5 there in the form of stock subscription. If there are dividends after the payment of certain expenses provided for, certain reserves, then he will get a dividend on his stock. If the associations are successful, as it is hoped they will be, he may get his money back, but in any event he would only be out the additional $5.

Now, I wish to state that we had before the committee evidence that in some of the small lending agencies borrowers paid as high as 30 or 40 percent on some of the small loans through a combination of expenses.

The method provided in this bill will put the credit system on a more sound and cheaper basis than at present.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I do not want the gentleman to believe that my questions imply opposition to the bill, because I intend to vote for it, but I do want some information.

Does the gentleman not believe that in times of emergency when speed is highly essential this will slow up the operation by which a farmer may get such relief? For instance, if a farmer has to find other people who have the same need and associate himself with them in order to get a seed loan is it not possible that the harvest will be on before money is provided with which to buy the seed?

Mr. JONES. It is hoped that in practically all the communities if proper interest is taken the system will furnish a continuing type of credit so that they will be able to meet any emergency. This same plan, or a very similar plan, has been in operation for some 2 years in 1 or 2 of the States of the Union, notably Arkansas, I believe, where it has been very successful and has worked out very satisfactorily, and in certain parts of my own State it has done so and has proven a very worthy type of credit.

If a continuing agency is established emergencies probably will not ever get quite so great. It is because of an accumulating condition frequently that the emergency becomes very intense and severe.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. On the other hand, is it not possible that farmers not anticipating such an emergency will fail to organize themselves into a loan association and then, finally finding such an emergency thrust upon them, will be unprepared to avail themselves of the facilities which the Government is offering through this legislation?

Mr. JONES. I know that in 1 or 2 places the people have been able to organize and receive assistance in from 2 to 4 days. It all depends, of course, on how necessary it is to make haste. Under normal conditions it will probably take longer than that.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Since 1921 we have loaned hundreds of millions of dollars to the farmers in the form of seed loans and crop-production loans. I do not think we have collected 50 percent of these loans. Will this new organization continue to collect the outstanding loans?

Mr. JONES. This organization is authorized under Executive order and under this legislation to continue to make collections; yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the money they collect go into this fund or into the Treasury?

Mr. JONES. The money they collect up to $80,000,000 will go into this fund. After that it will go into the Treasury.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I notice that loans are to be made to cooperatives or associations. Is this going to get us into the same position as the Farm Loan Act got us into?

Mr. JONES. No. As a matter of fact, this measure repeals several features of the Farm Board and it continues only the lending features. It avoids all the difficulties that arose in the lending features of the Farm Board Act in that instead of being able to make loans for practically nothing there is a maximum and minimum margin of from 3 to 6 percent that must be paid as interest, and no stabilization activities can be engaged in.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. If the gentleman will permit one further question: The farm relief bill had as one of its purposes a reduction in crop acreages, did it not?

Mr. JONES. Yes; that was one of the hopes of it, anyway.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Now, the purpose of this bill is to increase production, is it not?

Mr. JONES. No. The gentleman realizes that however desirable it may be to have the country on a cash basis, but there is practically no line of industry that is on a strictly cash basis. The effort of this measure is to try to get the loans and the credit activities on a sound basis. I believe that as a rule you do not favor a man by lending him money that he is not entitled to, and so far as it is practicable to do so I should like to get the credit structure of this country along all lines on a sound basis and get the interest rates lowered.

Mr. COCHRAN of Misssouri. I fully agree with the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. High interest rates have been the curse of agriculture, and without being joined to the commercial system they have not had a method of obtaining credit, and I hope this will be a long step toward securing a credit system, dissociated and independent of the regular commercial banking system of the country.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I am very much interested in the agricultural credit corporations. We have one in my State and it has rendered excellent service. As I read the language of this bill, there is nothing in the bill that would, per se, abolish or interfere with the functions of these corporations.

Mr. JONES. Nothing whatever. They may continue those corporations for a time or as long as they see fit. It may not be necessary to continue them indefinitely if the other types of credit furnished by this measure work out satisfactorily; but there is nothing in the bill which directly interferes with the functioning of them, and I understand it is their purpose to at least continue some of them.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Certainly those corporations ought never to be abolished until this act has been in operation long enough to prove it is feasible and completely satisfactory to the farmer.

Mr. JONES. Of course, that is a question of administration; but I am sure that is correct.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I hope the gentleman can assure the House to that effect.

Mr. JONES. That is my understanding.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That is the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. JONES. It is my understanding that for the present it will at least be necessary to continue some of them. . How long it will be necessary I do not know, but this bill does not directly forbid the exercise of those functions.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. In other words, the corporations can go along in spite of this bill.

Mr. JONES. If the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration sees fit to continue them, yes.

Mr. ARENS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ARENS. The gentleman from Texas is aware of the fact that up to the present time local cooperatives, such as elevators and creameries and oil stations and shipping associations, have not been able to receive any Government credits. The Federal Farm Board up until now has lent to regional cooperatives or Nation-wide cooperatives but not to locals.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. ARENS. Under this bill, will a local creamery or elevator be able to get credit direct from this new agency?

Mr. JONES. Yes; one of the purposes is to enable local credit to be had for local institutions of this character. As a matter of fact, in my judgment, that, perhaps, is more important than the other type of production credit.

Mr. ARENS. In order to make perfectly clear what I mean, under the present Federal Farm Board——

Mr. JONES. The Federal Farm Board could make such loans, but they had tied their money up so much in stabilization and other activities that they did not have the funds.

Mr. ARENS. I was just going to explain to the gentleman that it was not able to do it. The organization of which I am a member, Land O'Lakes Creameries, had set aside by the Federal Farm Board $300,000, and, as the gentleman knows, Land O'Lakes is an organization of 480 cooperative creameries.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. ARENS. This $300,000 they were instructed to relend to cooperative creameries, but they would not lend to them direct. However, conditions were such that Land O'Lakes could not make a single loan to a cooperative creamery.

Mr. JONES. Perhaps, they were cases of refinancing, and we make a change here in that regard. They are not only able to make original loans, but refinancing loans also.

Mr. ARENS. The condition was that they could make no loans for refinancing, but could make original loans.

Mr. JONES. We have provisions in this measure whereby they can refinance loans because refinancing loans are, of course, just as important as original loans in some cases.

Mr. ARENS. More so.

Mr. JONES. The Farm Board, however, could, prior to this act, make original loans, but they could not make refinancing loans.

Mr. ARENS. As I understand, this organization can lend direct to a cooperative creamery, but it will have to join the central bank by taking 5 percent of the loan as an interest in the bank.

Mr. JONES. They will have to make that contribution.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE] a few minutes ago referred to the real purpose of setting up this parallel agency throughout the United States or a practical duplication of the Federal farm-loan system, and I hope if the gentleman is allowed to make a continuous statement, his remarks may include an explanation of why it is necessary to set up this thoroughgoing duplication of the Federal farm-loan system for the purpose of making production loans and loans to cooperatives.

Mr. JONES. I may state to the gentleman it is not a duplication of the farm-loan system. The Federal land banks are already located in each of the 12 districts. The Federal land banks finance themselves through the medium of their obligations.

The intermediate credit banks sell their debentures and obligations. Then we have the production credit feature and the cooperative bank feature. They are really for all practical purposes simply a part of the other activities, but if they were tied together integrally they would complicate and confuse and hamper the financing and functioning. These will have the same directors in each region as the Federal land-bank system. So for administrative purposes they will have the same directors.

Because of the fact that production credit is entirely different from mortgage land credit, it is felt that one should not be tied to the other in financing, so that if there was little call for production credit it would not entirely defeat the other types of credit. So they are kept essentially different, although practically under the same management.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman mean a liquidation of the Federal land banks, or is it an absorption into the farm credit?

Mr. JONES. It means placing of the entire credit system under one central head, the Farm Credit Administration.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does this bill in any respect make any material change in the Federal land-bank system?

Mr. JONES. It makes some minor changes in the Federal Land Bank Act. It provides that there shall not be double liability on stocks, but it makes no essential change in the Federal land-bank structure.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to understand the gentleman clearly. This bill in nowise makes any fundamental change for the liquidation of debts?

Mr. JONES. No; it makes no essential change in the set-up or the law on this point.

Mr. DARDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DARDEN. This bill is confined to production credit.

Mr. JONES. No. It also provides for utilizing the balance of the old Farm Board for the purpose of establishing cooperative agencies and credit. There is a central agency and then an agency in each Federal land-bank district.

Mr. DARDEN. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. Does this bill finance land under its provisions?

Mr. JONES. This bill does not make any stipulation as to that. That is provided for in other ways. This is to breathe life into the Executive order to enable it to function.

Mr. SANDLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. SANDLIN. In the gentleman's opinion, if this law is passed, and the operation of it becomes well known to farmers, will it encourage or discourage them in making applications for loans?

Mr. JONES. I do not know that I get the full purport of the gentleman's question, but I think it would enable them to get a type of loan if they can offer the proper security, and that the law will be liberally administered.

Mr. SANDLIN. I have discussed this subject with the gentleman from Texas before. Of course, we all realize that under the conditions that existed, the breaking down of the banking system, the inability of the merchants to furnish credit to the farmers, nothing could be done except what has been done. The Government had to step in. But does not the gentleman believe that as soon as possible the Federal Government should get out of this kind of business, and does not the gentleman believe that if the prices of commodities increase, as we hope they will—cotton and wheat and other commodities—it will be possible for the farmers of this country to finance their affairs without having to come to the Federal Government to set up these agencies?

Mr. JONES. Yes; and this bill makes it possible for them to do so. It is hoped that that result will be achieved.

Mr. LANHAM. Then the committee does not assume that it is going to be permanently necessary for the Government to make these loans?

Mr. JONES. The Government under this measure is not making production loans, but furnishes a part of the capital to make them. It provides for a system whereby through rediscount with the intermediate credit banks they may provide the essential funds for carrying on lending by the association, and it is hoped that it will work out so that the system will be self-operating.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SWICK. What percentage of these seed loans have been repaid?

Mr. JONES. There are varying percentages. The gentleman will find that in the RECORD—and I have them over at my office—when we had the matter up for discussion through the short session. It varies in different localities, and in different years. I think the highest amount that has been paid back was perhaps 92 percent, and the lowest average outside of the last two was 56 percent. They are continuing collections even on the old ones. I do not recall the amount on these last two, and up to the time those figures were furnished there had been so small an amount collected, because cost-collection time had not passed, that one could not get any idea. Outside of the last two, it has probably averaged 60 or 70 percent.

Mr. SWICK. As I understand, there are now some seven agencies to which farmers may go to get help, and the greatest difficulty seems to be to know to which agency they should go. In response to a question asked by the gentleman from Louisiana, I should say that this will facilitate, if this should become a law.

Mr. JONES. This will help in securing the essential credit.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will it be possible to get a chart that would show the entire settlement of all these agencies under the Federal Farm Loan Act and this act? As far as I am concerned, it looks as if it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to get even an inadequate picture of it.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman will understand that this is a very big country, and there are a great many different types of activity in the country calling for different kinds of credit. It may be clear to the gentleman, but I have had to do a great deal of study to understand the Federal Reserve System and how the finances of this country work generally.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I would be willing to pay for a copy of a chart if I could get one.

Mr. JONES. I have here a chart of the set-up which I think will furnish the gentleman some information along that line.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. GILLETTE. Section 2 provides that the Governor is directed to organize one of these organizations and one bank in every city where there is a Federal loan bank.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. GILLETTE. Does that dispose definitely of the set-ups, the regional credit banks and seed-loan offices, where now located?

Mr. JONES. No; the present seed-loan offices have been taken over by the Farm Credit Administration, and they will probably continue those seed-loan offices. That is, of course, in the hands of the Farm Credit Administration, just as it has been heretofore in the hands of the Department of Agriculture. They can do as they see fit. It is my understanding that they will function until they finish their present loan.

Mr. GILLETTE. And the same remarks apply with reference to the R.A.C.C.

Mr. JONES. Probably, unless some of them are not able to function. There is nothing in the bill which would do away with those things necessarily.

Mr. McFARLANE. Do we understand that this is a part of the administration program?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The chairman of the committee has prepared a very succinct report for the purposes of this bill. Would he mind extending his remarks in the RECORD by incorporating that report?

Mr. JONES. I should be happy to do so, but it is already available in the document room to Members, and if that is not sufficient we could do the other later.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I want to ask a question about the rate of interest. I am in sympathy with the necessity of having a low rate of interest to the farmer on loans obtained. I read the bill very hurriedly but I did not discover any limitation relative to the rate of interest. Does the chairman of the committee not think that the bill should provide some limitation as to the maximum amount of interest that should be charged upon these loans?

Mr. JONES. I really think that can be done if it is found necessary. There is a limitation in the present acts that they cannot get more than a certain percent above the rediscount rates.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not understand what act the gentleman is referring to.

Mr. JONES. The Intermediate Credit Act provides that not more than 1 percent above the rediscount rate shall be charged. They hope to keep the interest rates low.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I know that; but the farmer who obtains a loan for $100 must subscribe 5 percent of that for stock. Of course, he may get that back, and he may get dividends, but he may lose it. If he loses it, he loses 5 percent of the amount of the loan.

Mr. JONES. A great many of the crop-production loans will be small; and if he can get the longer-type credit, even though he should lose that 5 percent, he will be getting a lower rate of interest than he gets now on loans made by commercial banks and other agencies.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think that it true, provided their rate is not too high.

Mr. JONES. They assured us that they hoped to keep this low, and the present restrictions, I feel, are all that should be put on at the present time; but if there is any abuse, I shall be glad to join the gentleman in having a limitation placed.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. These loans do not apply to private dealers in farm products, do they?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; they do not.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Under the set-up there will be no direct applications for loans, and all applications will have to be made through the local crop-production associations. Will it be necessary for the prospective borrowers to subscribe to any stock other than the 5 percent?

Mr. JONES. No other stock.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 38 minutes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE].

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, this bill is not as intricate and complicated as may appear from a casual reading of it. You will all recall that shortly after the beginning of the present administration a consolidation was effected, by order of the President, of the Federal land banks, the intermediate-credit banks, the Federal Farm Board, the regional agricultural credit corporations, and the division in the Federal Department of Agriculture which was engaged in making crop-production loans. This measure is simply putting into effect and reorganizing the powers that were given the farm-credit administration under that consolidation order. It is true it does set up different machinery, but the purpose and effect is really to continue the loans that have been made by the various agencies that were consolidated.

The Federal land banks, of course, will continue to make loans just as they have, and under the additional authority which they have been given by the act which was recently passed by Congress as a part of the general farm bill. Heretofore loans to cooperatives have been made by the Federal Farm Board. They have all been made from a central agency in Washington. Under this bill that agency is, to a certain extent, decentralized. There will still be a central cooperative bank, which will make loans to national and regional cooperatives. In addition, there are set up 12 regional cooperative banks, one in each Federal land-bank district, and the directors of the Federal land bank for that district will, ex officio, be directors for the cooperative bank in that district, thus necessitating no new set-up as far as the directors of the banks are concerned.

The regional cooperative bank will make loans to local cooperatives within the territory served by the Federal land bank in that district.

Now, there has been taken, for the purpose of creating a revolving fund for these banks, the funds which are now in the hands of the Federal Farm Board, or which have been loaned by that board and which will, of course, be repaid from time to time. That revolving fund will constitute the fund from which loans will be made to cooperatives by the central cooperative bank in Washington and the regional cooperative banks throughout the country.

Now, to take the place of the loans which have been made in the past through the regional agricultural credit corporations, which, as you know, were set up by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, one in each Federal land-bank district, and to a certain extent to take the place of the crop-production loans, there has been set up an organization of 12 banks known as the "Production Credit Corporations", one in each Federal land-bank district. Those banks will not make direct loans to farmers, but they will be used to furnish the capital for local production credit associations. The local production credit associations will be organized in any community where 10 or more farmers get together and decide they want to take advantage of the provisions of this act. When they do so, the initial capital of the association will, upon request, be contributed by the regional production credit corporation. The local organizations will be organized, as already indicated, in exactly the same way as the local farm-loan associations. That is, they will be under local management and control, the only difference being that in this case the central production credit bank will furnish the initial capital. Each farmer who gets a loan from the corporation will be required to leave 5 percent of that loan for the purchase of capital stock in the local association, just as the farmer who now secures a loan from the Federal land bank must leave 5 percent of that loan for the purchase of stock in the local farm-loan association.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Briefly, yes.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman explain what collateral those loans will be secured by?

Mr. HOPE. I will go into that in just a moment.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will this regional credit corporation have any State agency in the several States, or will it all be concentrated at this one corporation?

Mr. HOPE. The bill does not provide for State agencies. That question was asked the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration when the committee was considering the bill, and I think his answer was that it was something that had not been worked out, yet it might be advisable and advantageous to have a State agency.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. How is it contemplated that the cotton, corn, wheat, and other agricultural products will be marketed after the loan is obtained through these local associations?

Mr. HOPE. I do not understand that this will have any connection whatever with marketing.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is there any connection now between these loans and the cooperative associations? Will it be necessary to have a cooperative association to market the products after it has been raised as a result of the money borrowed?

Mr. HOPE. There is no such connection. There is a provision in the bill to the effect that cooperative associations may organize production-credit associations for the purpose of obtaining credit for their individual members, but there is no connection between the production-credit associations and the marketing organizations.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. They can market their crops just as they see fit?

Mr. HOPE. Yes; there is no connection whatever between the two.

Now, your local production-credit association will finance the loans which it makes for its members through the intermediate-credit banks. We have had the intermediate-credit bank system for a number of years, and I have always felt that it was not rendering the service which it ought to render to the farmers of this country. I think this has partly been due to a lack of interest on the part of the farmers themselves, because under the system as set up it is necessary for the farmers to organize their local associations to make the loans which are rediscounted by the intermediate-credit banks, and that has not been done to a very large extent.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Briefly.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman say just exactly what new machinery is necessitated by this act?

Mr. HOPE. I am trying to do that as I go along. I would rather not depart from the continuity of my remarks just at this time to do that, but I will endeavor to do it before I conclude.

The intermediate-credit banks raise the money which they loan to these organizations by selling their debentures. Now, at the present time intermediate-credit debentures carry an interest rate of about 2½ percent. They have to get about 1 percent more in order to pay the expense of operation when they make the loans. That means that today at the rate of interest that the intermediate-credit bank debentures are bearing it would be possible for them to make loans to local production-credit associations for from 3 to 3½ percent.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. HOPE. It is provided that the local organization borrowing from the banks shall not charge more than 3 percent additional rate of interest. In other words, if money can be borrowed today from the intermediate-credit bank by a local credit association, the maximum rate which could be charged to the members of that association would be 6½ percent. Whether it is necessary to charge this maximum or not will depend largely upon the size of the association. I understand that the Producers Livestock Association, which fianances itself through the intermediate-credit bank, makes a charge of only 1½ percent above the rate at which the money is borrowed from the intermediate-credit bank, whereas small associations, which have a large overhead compared with the amount of business they do, must necessarily charge the full 3 percent in many cases. This will answer the inquiry which was made a while ago as to what the interest rate will be on these individual loans. On the basis of present interest charges by the intermediate-credit bank, it could not be more than 6½ percent and might perhaps be as low as 5 percent.

I am not sure how far the farmers of this country will avail themselves of this method for production loans. They have not done so in the past, and one reason is that in many cases they have been able to get local credit for this purpose. I think the necessity of setting up local associations and going through that machinery has deterred many farmers in the past from getting this type of loan. Probably it will be something which will have a discouraging effect upon the progress of this program in the future, but I do think that we are perhaps approaching a time when a method like this is going to be the only avenue of credit which will be left to the farmers in many sections of this country.

If we are going to go ahead and centralize our banking system and drive out our little banks in the rural districts throughout the country through legislation which is now in process of being enacted, it may be that there will be no avenue left to the farmers of this country to secure production credit except through the medium of these local associations and the intermediary-credit banks. If this should be the situation, as I hope it will not, then I would expect that these facilities would be used to an extensive degree.

Now, as to this set-up and organization taking the place of the present crop-loan facilities, I can only say that I have my doubts as to whether it will take the place of the crop loan as we know it today, for the reason that our present crop loans are distress loans. In order to get a crop loan a man has to prove that he has no money, that he has no credit, and no way of getting any money or credit. If this system is going to work, if it is going to be a success, if the stockholders, the farmers themselves, are not going to lose the money they put into it, then it must, of necessity, confine itself to good loans. It cannot therefore take the place of the type of crop loan which the Government has been making for the past 5 years.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. Under this system, when a great cooperative organization is organized and the men subscribe for the stock, the secretary and president are endorsers on every loan and this makes each individual liable to the extent of his stock for the loans to the other individuals, does it not?

Mr. HOPE. That is true, in exactly the same manner that the local farm-loan association is now liable for the loans made by its members.

Mr. WHITE. And this would tend to discourage operations under the act, because such a man has to be good for all the loans to the members of the organization.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman understands there is no double liability. He simply loses the 5 percent he has put in the stock.

Mr. WHITE. If the fund becomes impaired, he is liable for just that much.

Mr. HOPE. Yes; but there is no double liability. The bill takes care of that specifically and also does away with the double liability of members of Federal farm-loan associations as to future transactions.

Mr. WHITE. And by the endorsement of the officers of his organization, they are security for each loan up to the amount of the 5 percent of stock to which he has subscribed.

Mr. HOPE. Up to the amount of his stock; yes.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that in the last analysis the farmer will have to pay 6½ percent for the money borrowed?

Mr. HOPE. That would be the maximum.

Mr. FOCHT. And we are framing a bill here to relieve the farmers at 6½ percent.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman understands there are a good many farmers in the country paying a good deal more than 6½ percent.

Mr. FOCHT. That is what has ruined them, and that is why we want to relieve them. I should like to ask the gentleman another question. A while ago we gave the national banks the right to issue notes. Why cannot this whole thing be done through the national banks of the country instead of involving us in setting up machinery like this, where the farmer in the last analysis will have to pay the bill? Why do you want 3 or 4 different kinds of machinery, when you have already experimented and found that they have all failed? You are setting up here another piece of the same kind of machinery.

Mr. HOPE. I may say this is not a new piece of machinery. It is taking the place of two agencies which we now have—the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporations and the Crop Production Loan System.

Mr. FOCHT. And they have all failed, have they not?

Mr. HOPE. No; I would not say that; but we hope the new plan will work better and be of greater assistance to the farmer.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY].

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] have explained to the Committee the general provisions of this bill, the gentleman from Texas stressing the individual loans to the borrower for production purposes and the gentleman from Kansas going more into detail with reference to the set-up in regard to the banks that are for the purpose of lending to the cooperatives. Both of these gentlemen have explained the situation in such a way that I may say to the Committee that I shall not attempt to add anything of general information with respect to what they have said. However, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, speaking frankly, we have given this proposed bill, even though it is highly technical and complicated, a great deal of thought, and in the brief time I have I want to take up with you and give you, as I see it, a picture of the set-up and discuss it in a practical way.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question at this point?

Mr. DOXEY. I shall be pleased to yield; but I have noticed from some of the questions of the speakers who have preceded me that they have talked about the chart or the picture, and if you will just go along with me I think I can tell you what this bill proposes in a practical way and we will consider title I and title II in the beginning, which has reference to the individual loan to the farmer, and this seems to be what you are interested in.

We all agree that distressed agriculture must be financed. Knowing conditions as we do, we readily understand that this Government must do a major portion of this financing, either directly or indirectly. It has for the past few years, and it will be necessary in the order of events for it to continue to do so for some time. Just how long this must of necessity continue is purely a matter of speculation. It depends upon the future developments of our economic life.

The methods employed and the system used by this Government in the past to a great degree have been, to say the least of it, unsatisfactory and resulted in loss to the Government and in many instances disaster to the farmers, individually and collectively.

It is a gigantic undertaking, which of necessity must result in many mistakes, both as to the provisions of the law and the administration thereof.

But, my friends, we have reached the stage in "the new order" of things brought about by this present administration where we are going to correct some of these mistakes which experience has shown and taught us. We can do it, and we will do it to a marked degree, by this proposed legislation.

Those in authority in our present Department of Agriculture, together with your Committee on Agriculture, have labored long and hard to bring to this Congress a real, constructive piece of legislation designed to extend relief to agriculture and at the same time be a protection to the Government if properly administered.

We know the Federal farm board is dead. It passed away on the night of Friday, May 26, 1933. We are informed on good authority that there will be no more direct crop-production or seed loans under the present system after 1933.

Most of the credit banks and regional agricultural credit corporations set up during this emergency to extend credit to the farmer for production purposes are insolvent. They will through necessity cease to function unless most of them are reorganized, resystematized, or revitalized through governmental activity.

However, I want to say to you, my friends, that the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation in my State, located at Jackson, Miss., and handling loans for Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi, has given very satisfactory service indeed, as has the one at Montgomery, Ala., in which my friend from Alabama [Mr. HILL] has shown such an interest. The business of the Jackson office has been handled in a most efficient manner and from the reports I get most of the loans that they have made will in all likelihood be paid in full. Therefore, I trust that the very excellent showing this Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation has made will cause my friend, Mr. Henry Morgenthau, Jr., Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, to continue this institution at Jackson, Miss., and use its facilities there in furthering his plans for extending financial relief to the farmers, as it has at all times rendered conscientious, common-sense service to both the borrowers and the Government.

I hold in my hand a short application and loan report of the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation at Jackson, Miss., as of May 12, 1933, which to my mind is a most creditable showing. I feel it gives valuable information with reference to the work of this Corporation in our section. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that this short report be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

Mr. DOXEY. This historic and extraordinary session of Congress is now driving to complete its program, finish its labors, and adjourn within the next 10 days. Unless an unexpected emergency arises and our great President again calls us into a special session, we will not meet after adjournment of this special session until January 3, 1934. No one at this time can visualize what pressing and momentous problems will await us when we again convene here. We all know it takes time to prepare and enact legislation and that agricultural-relief measures should be enacted and the set-up perfected and the machinery put into operation by early spring in order for the farmer to obtain the full benefits and the operation of the law to accomplish the purpose prompting its enactment.

A practical illustration and striking example of this fact is evidenced by the recent omnibus farm bill just passed by this Congress. In order for it to have had a fair chance in bringing the hoped-for relief to the farmer for the crop year 1933, it should have been enacted so the machinery would have been ready and functioning before crop-planting time.

Before that law was finally passed, most all the spring crops were planted, were up, and worked out.

The thought I am trying to impress upon you is, in order to obtain the best results, do not let us put off doing for agriculture until next year what we should do now. Let us look at the situation in a practical and businesslike way and do the job now and not put it off. Do not make the mistake of waiting until the patient is dead and then trying to revive him. It is too late to send for the doctor after your friend has passed away. All of us realize that agriculture is desperately ill and needs relief now and will need it next year.

With that thought in mind, this administration through our Committee on Agriculture has brought to you for your consideration this measure known as the "Farm Credit Act of 1933", H.R. 5790, which provides—

For organizations within the Farm Credit Administration to make loans for the production and marketing of agricultural products, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, to provide a market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes.

The limited time in which I have to speak to you will not permit me to give you facts and figures in detail or present to you the picture as it really exists. However, briefly, I want to analyze this bill and explain some of its major provisions in your presence and answer questions as best I can.

It is within the knowledge of all that this bill is exceedingly complicated and extremely technical. Yet the foundation and groundwork upon which it is based is sound business, economical administration, good banking, and mutual helpfulness and benefits to both the lender and the borrower through cooperative efforts of the Government and the farmer. The theory of it is, by extending to the producer financial aid so essential in the production and marketing of crops, the Government as a unit will be repaid and the taxpayers generally protected through a safe, sound, and economical administration of the law.

To say the least of it, surely it will be an improvement over the present system under which we are operating.

Generally speaking this Farm Credit Act provides as follows:

The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is invested with broad powers and is a most important factor in the administration of this law.

The Federal land banks in each of the 12 Federal land-bank districts as they now exist are the parent banks. As subsidiaries, other necessary banks, corporations, and credit associations are to be set up and operated within the districts and as circumstances demand spread out until almost each county within the various districts will be organized into associations to extend credit to the farmers for production and marketing purposes.

A revolving fund not to exceed $120,000,000 is to be used to finance these various institutions. It is estimated that about $80,000,000—represented by collections and unexpended appropriations—will be salvaged from the present set-up. The additional $40,000,000 necessary to supply the total $120,000,000 will be appropriated out of the Treasury.

The sum of $2,000,000 is also appropriated which shall be available for administrative expenses and purposes in establishing the 12 corporations to be known as "production-credit corporations" and also 12 banks, known as "banks for cooperatives."

This sum compared with the $9,000,000 that was testified to, as shown by the hearings before our Committee on Agriculture as the sum spent in the administration alone of the present seed-loan set-up shows quite a saving and a resolve on the part of the present efficient Governor of the Farm Credit Administration to administer this law on a business basis and at a great saving to the Government in cost of operation alone.

Each of the 12 production-credit corporations is to have initial capital of $7,500,000. The farmers are to organize themselves into what is known as "local production-credit associations" and secure loans for general agricultural purposes from intermediate-credit banks, all associations to be incorporated under a Federal charter, approved by the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration.

The farmers do not obtain their loans direct from the production-credit corporations, but said corporations provide each local production-credit association with not less than $5,000 capital and up to 20 percent of volume of loans.

These local production-credit associations are formed by the farmers themselves. When 10 or more farmers each desire a loan, they can organize a local association and the capital is represented by two classes of stock—A and B. Class A stock is a nonvoting stock preferred as to assets and sharing equally with class B stock in dividends. Class A stock is originally purchased by the production-credit corporation serving that respective district out of the corporation funds provided by this act.

I judge this class A stock will be sold and held mostly by investors and people who want to help their community and have money to spare and invest.

B stock is to be absorbed and held by the borrowers who are the only class privileged to vote in matters pertaining to their local organization. This class B stock is acquired by each borrower taking 5 percent of the amount of his loan and purchasing that amount in stock class B.

For every dollar the borrower puts up, the Government matches it with four, and $1 capital makes possible about $5 of sound production credit.

These local production-credit associations can rediscount notes of farmers up to about 4 to 8 times its capital.

These local production credit associations are to run their own business subject to the approval of the production-credit corporation as long as the production-credit corporation holds stock in the local production credit association. The local production credit associations are required to build up a guaranty fund to at least 25 percent of the paid-in capital before the payment of any dividends. A limitation of dividend payments is placed at "not to exceed 7 percent."

These local production credit associations deal with the production credit corporations through the established intermediate credit banks. It is prescribed that no loan can be made by a local production credit association for less than $50 nor more than 20 percent of the capital and guaranty fund of the production credit association unless approved by the production credit corporation. A loan can be made in excess of 50 percent of the capital and guaranty fund by the local production credit association if secured by collateral and approved by the credit commissioner of the Farm Credit Administration.

No definite rate of interest has been provided in the bill, but we are assured by those who are going to have charge of the administration of this act that the farmers are going to be given as low a rate of interest as it is possible under prevailing circumstances.

My friends, I see that my time has about expired. I have in a general way been discussing with you only titles I and II of this act. This bill, as you know, contains eight separate and distinct titles, some more important than others, yet each of them embracing important legislation bearing on the general subject of extending credit and amendments to existing laws.

I have been mainly dealing with and endeavoring to explain the set-up and machinery provided in this act relating to loans to individual farmers for production purposes.

Time will not permit me to dwell upon title III of this act which relates to the establishment, powers, and purposes of the "Central Bank for Cooperatives."

These banks as the name suggests are created to make loans to cooperative associations, as defined in the Agricultural Marketing Act, as amended. They deal with the cooperatives as a unified borrowing association much like the production-credit corporations through the local production-credit associations deal with the individual farmer. The ultimate purposes are the same—financial relief to the farmer—but the type of banks and their respective set-ups and methods employed in extending loans operate in somewhat different fields.

Title V repeals and amends certain provisions of the Agricultural Marketing Act.

Title VI relates to "provisions common to corporations created under the act."

Title VII amends the Federal Farm Loan Act.

Title VIII is "Miscellaneous" and relates mainly to details of organization of Farm Credit Administration.

Now, my friends, as we are to consider this bill and read it under the 5-minute rule of the House, I trust that whatever amendments are adopted will be helpful and will strengthen the bill instead of hurting it and hampering the administration of it.

I believe if we pass the bill substantially as it is written and it is administered by those in authority in the manner they indicated to our committee they planned to administer it the act will be a saving to the Government and the means of rendering most beneficial service to the borrowing class of our farmers and prove a great help to agriculture in general. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY].

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOXEY. Yes; I shall be glad to.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I think it is generally conceded that the weakness of the Federal land bank system has been the local associations. What has the gentleman to say about the cost of overhead of these local associations, with just 10 members?

Mr. DOXEY. That is a matter that your local associations have to work out. Necessarily they are going to look after it in a businesslike way, because the members of your local association are responsible and they will have to meet all losses entailed. In other words, this set-up protects the Government and is intended to be a saving to the Government over the present set-up and an improvement over the method they are now using in financing agriculture for crop production and marketing purposes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. There is no comparable arrangement suggested in this bill whereby a borrower can go direct to a crop production regional loan office for a direct loan.

Mr. DOXEY. The gentleman means a central office as in New Orleans?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes.

Mr. DOXEY. None at all. He has to go through the association or not at all.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The overhead of the local associations bothers me a good deal. These associations must be efficiently managed or the system will fail.

Mr. DOXEY. My friend must realize that we cannot regulate overhead and administration expenses by legislation, because that is a matter that has to be handled in the administration of it.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I submit that we might, if we thought it desirable, require at least 100 borrowers instead of 10 borrowers, because you would get a better local management if you paid a man for his services than you would from somebody who works for nothing.

Mr. DOXEY. This bill is wide open for amendment. Your Committee on Agriculture has brought you a bill here that we hope each one of you will not only feel an interest in, but will contribute something worth while to it and assist us by adding anything that is constructive in making this as good a piece of legislation as possible. This is the bill of the committee, but I do ask you before you seek to amend to let it be an amendment that will strengthen and help the bill to carry out its original purpose and not hamper it in the administration of the measure.

Let us pass this bill today and not wait until the next session. It means much to agriculture. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, after sitting here for weeks listening to the different proposals, one's good American citizenship rises to a fever heat. We continuously hear legislators advocate different measures, but the great majority of the time they seem to lose that which is fundamental, namely, the true representation of the greatest American industry, agriculture.

It has been the practice, for many years, of politicians to extol the greatness of the farming industry, but we have seen no results, except the deliberate exploitation of our many good farmers. Those in power for sessions past have apparently done nothing except to bow down in humble submission to the plunderbund of Wall Street headed by the gentleman who is now paying a Senate committee an indefinite visit.

It is disheartening indeed to be a participant of some of the actions of this present Congress when Members will rise and take the floor denouncing some of the parts of these farm bills, and pleading the cause of the farmer and the desire to once again see the farmer get better prices for his products and then watch these same Members when the roll is called and have them vote against the farmer's interest. I often think that if the RECORD were not a part of the daily actions of Congress, we would not hear so many of the Members tell how they are so desirous of wanting to do something for the farmer.

I believe that the legislation today is meritorious, and although I do not want Congress to take up so much time in establishing a machinery for farmers to borrow money, I believe that this bill will offer some real relief for immediate loans, and I am going to vote for this bill.

Congress should concern themselves with establishing a fair price for farm products and then the great majority of the obstacles will be removed. The farmer does not want to continue to borrow, and pay interest and principal all the days of his life. Give him a cost of production, such as John Simpson has advocated and he will make a profit and will be able to maintain his home, farm, and family.

If the farmer is going to get a real benefit out of this legislation he must have a lower rate of interest so that whatever little he makes from the sale of his products will not be eaten up in paying interest rates on his loan. We have been fighting for years for a decent rate of interest and I am happy indeed that there is a general trend toward lowering the discount on loans for the farmers.

Reasonable interest rates and fair prices for the farmer will bring him out of the chaotic condition that thousands of them are now in. Without reasonable prices on farm commodities it is hard to say whether this so-called "breathing spell" the administration spoke of in the last farm-relief measure will do much good. The interest will possibly be paid but the principal will still hang as a rope around their neck, and there will be no escape.

Many bills have passed this House and I have not been insisting on taking up very much time, but I remember 19 years ago I was sent here by the farmers of the State of Minnesota to work on a committee asking for farm legislation, for something that was going to better the condition of the farmers in the great agricultural Northwest. I remember we asked for Federal grain grades. Pardon me for detouring for a moment from the bill under consideration.

But after some fight we finally got Federal grain grades, but I say to you, we got it in the neck [applause], and ever since that time we have been coming to Washington and most of the time we have been getting the same kind of treatment. I am satisfied that most of the legislation that has been enacted in this special session of Congress is going to be beneficial. I have not tried, nor have the other members of the Farmer-Labor Party tried to put any obstacles in the way. I have confidence in the Membership of this Congress and I know that you have passed legislation that will certainly help us. However, in connection with it, let me say to you, you are trying to create one organization after another to loan us money. The trouble with the American farmer today is that he has been borrowing too much money. Therefore, we got it in the neck right there again. [Applause.] There are thousands of bankers and other organizations that have been loaning money to the farmers. Our great trouble is that we have not got the cost of production and have not had an honest price with which to pay our obligations. That is everything in a nutshell.

I am not against this bill. I have confidence in the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], chairman of the committee. The gentleman means well and I know that you all have good intentions. Now, to create a local cooperative organization may be all right as far as it goes, because there are some farmers who need assistance, especially in the communities where we do not have a local bank. I know several of those communities in the State of Minnesota today, and this would help considerably in those places. I would like to see the farmer who goes there to obtain a loan get all of it; but there may be another side of the story. Probably if these organizations are formed, they can look up the farmer who wants a crop loan of $100 or $200 and see that he does not take that money to pay some other obligation, or that he does not need that much money to plant a crop. We have new farmers starting all the time.

A young man and his wife who want to start farming, and they need a little money, and they can go there and get it. That is all well and good.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I say to you that we farmers know how to raise grain and other commodities on our farms. We know how to raise it if you will give us the price. There is no question about that at all. But if you let the cooperative organizations or individuals be forced on the market to sell their products below the cost of production, you will never get out of this difficulty in which you are today. Here are the great chain stores in this country with cash, and they offer cash, and they get the products because they have the medium of exchange. They have the consumers in their mind and not the producers of the products.

During the last few years I have tried to assist the farmers in getting a fair, honest price. Therefore the Congress of this country ought not to take up so much time about loaning us money, to create the machinery through which we can borrow money, but to see to it that we can have an honest, fair price for the things that we produce on the farms. Therefore we fought to have a certain amendment put into the bill that passed a few weeks ago, the cost-of-production amendment, but were defeated. This would have gone far to help the farmers stay in business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON] has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 4 additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, we realize full well that farming is the basic industry of this country. You have tried to help us by loaning money, as I stated before, but how are we going to pay our obligations unless we have the cost of production?

Most of you statesmen are lawyers and bankers, and you mean well. There is no question about that at all. I have sat here and listened to your discussions and listened to one who made a speech this morning, for yesterday was Memorial Day. I am pleased to know that the gentleman voted against the economy bill. Those are some of the things which we should take into consideration because we vote on these measures and put them into law, but maybe after a few weeks or months we will find that it was an error. Of course, we cannot expect to be right at all times. I have made mistakes, but I have voted against gag rules because it has always been my principle to look into those bills. I am willing to vote for this bill because I have confidence in the chairman, and I hope it will do considerable to help agriculture, and by helping this industry you will help the rest of the people in this great country of ours. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON] has again expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad this bill is thrown open for every Member to offer such amendments as he thinks will help perfect it and make it a good bill.

I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON], who has just spoken, that we should have a high commodity price that will soon prevent the borrowing of money by our people. I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota that too much borrowing may have been some of our troubles, but without borrowing we could not have existed at all. In my opinion, no money has been used by the Federal Government in the past 3 years that has borne better fruit than that loaned to the people engaged in agriculture.

This bill simply creates a manner of loaning that is perpetuated from year to year with a $120,000,000 revolving fund and the responsibility of loaning and collecting this money placed upon one head. I believe that with the set-up provided in this bill money will be loaned and it will be collected and the Government will not lose any of it.

Necessity sometimes is the mother of invention. When great trouble came on us a few years ago in the form of the drought it forced us to look to our own doors for relief. In my State in that year we set up a loan agency with a million dollar capital to be expanded to 10 times that amount and to be loaned in addition to what we borrowed from the Federal Government, which was $9,000,000. A set-up similar to this was adopted in that State, and the report at the end of the years was that most of the entire amount in that set-up had been paid. Why? Because it was loaned in a careful way.

If 10 of your neighbors, or 20 of them, organize into a group to loan money, they know everything connected with a man applying for a loan, his ability to pay, his disposition to pay; and they are careful about taking people into their organization when they are partly responsible for the paying back of the loan. This is the reason that no losses are going to be had through this character of loan. The farmer has only 5 percent withheld for this purpose; and if he pays, he takes credit for that on the amount that he has borrowed. Then, too, the next year he does not have to wait, like he did this year, until March or April to know whether or not Congress will pass another bill so he may do any borrowing. With this set-up he knows just where to go and when to go to get his crop-production loan. Money loaned in this way is placed on a safe and sane basis. As expressed by one of the Members this morning, there has been considerable difficulty in the past, due to the character of loans that have been made; they were in many instances unsafe and unsound. Yet the emergency has been on us, and we have had liberal loaning of that kind, because it was necessary.

Now we are about to pass a law, as stated by a speaker who preceded me a little while ago, that will further put us on the road toward a stable prosperity. We have already seen the fruits of legislation passed by this Congress. We have seen corn go to three times the price it was when we began our agitation for farm-relief legislation. We have seen wheat go to three times its price. We have seen cotton nearly double in price. We have seen rice go up three times in price. We have seen beef double in price. We have seen the fruits and effect of legislation passed by this Congress before these acts got into full force and effect. I believe that after this law we are now considering and others we have passed get into full operation, and since we have gotten off the iniquitous gold standard, we are going to have prices that will make the farmer independent and put him in a position where he can finance his own farm without going to any organization or to any bank to borrow money to make a future crop. This is what we hope to do—to put the farmer in a condition where he will not have to borrow at all. That is the day to which I am looking forward, and which I believe is here, or soon will be here.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, as I interpret this act it provides the machinery for the administration of farm credits, and perhaps ought to have been called "the farm credit administration act" instead of what it is now called, namely, Farm Credit Act. This is because it does not really involve new credits except in a small way and it does not involve or require any new methods of extending credits to farmers. It simply provides a new set-up, a new deal, a new administration; and I like to think of it, therefore, as being a farm credit administration act.

In this connection there happens to be going on at the present time in my part of the country, an agitation designed to change the method or machinery by which the Federal farm-land banks are set up.

Now, the Federal farm-land bank set-up is not involved directly by the bill, but it is involved indirectly because section 2 of the bill provides that directors of the Federal farm-land banks shall be ex-officio directors of these new banks that we are incorporating under this act. Therefore, since the directors of the Federal land bank are ex-officio directors of the new banks under the present bill we find ourselves interested in the method of their appointment. At the present time, or at least up until the 28th of the month when the Farm Board went out of existence, three of these directors were selected by the local farm associations, three by the Federal Farm Loan Board, and the seventh by the Farm Loan Board from a list of three nominations made by the several farm-loan associations. The seven so selected make up the directorate of each Federal farm-land bank. In this way neither side had a preponderance because the seventh and deciding man was selected from a list of three men who would be satisfactory to each of the groups. Now, we are perpetuating this system in substance in this bill although, of course, the governor of the Farm Credit Administration, Governor Morganthau, will under this new set-up have the selection of these three members. I think none of us are objecting to this, but there is just now going on a propaganda or agitation whereby it is hoped in some quarters to give the entire control of this board to the governor by allowing him to select four members of this board. I think if this were done it would be a serious mistake.

I have in my hand a dispatch that went to the New York Times, Sunday, May 28, and I should like to revise and extend my remarks by putting into the RECORD certain excerpts from it and ask unanimous consent to do so, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the request is granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. GILCHRIST. This dispatch states that certain influential gentlemen in the dominant party out in the district where I live hope to be able to control this Board by causing a change to be made in the law under which the members of the Federal Farm Loan Board out there at Omaha will be appointed.

It will be a very serious thing if the farm credits of this country are allowed to degenerate down to the level of ward politics. The directorate of a great bank should not be selected on the basis of pie-counter politics. It may be all right to pass around the fleshpots but the spoils of office in a farm banking institution or in any other banking institution should not be put into the pot and the efforts of any partisan leaders in this direction ought to be noted, observed, and curbed.

Republicans and Democrats alike certainly ought not to allow this thing to degenerate into partisan politics. [Applause.] This is all I am asking. When farm credits become a football to be kicked around as a party or political matter, it will be a sad day for the farmers affected by the bill or any other bill.

The dispatch referred to is from the New York Times of May 28, 1933, and is as follows:

[From the New York Times May 28, 1933]

LAND BANK CHANGE LAID TO POLITICS—SPOILS SYSTEM SEEN IN PROPOSAL TO ALTER RULES FOR OMAHA INSTITUTION—AIMED TO OUST PRESIDENT—DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEEMAN SEEKS TO SUPPLANT REPUBLICAN OFFICIAL—TO CONTROL PERSONNEL—NEW WAY TO SELECT DIRECTORS WOULD BE APPLICABLE TO OTHER UNITS OF THE SYSTEM

(By Roland M. Jones, editorial correspondence, the New York Times)

OMAHA, NEBR., May 24.—When the patronage activities of Arthur F. Mullen, Democratic national committeeman for Nebraska, reached out for the Federal land bank at Omaha they stirred up a hornet's nest and the buzzing can be heard all over the eight land banks districts which includes Iowa, Nebraska, South Dakota, and Wyoming. Doubtless it will extend much farther, for the Omaha bank is only one of 12 such institutions and the method by which he seeks to accomplish his purpose involves them all.

Specifically the national committeeman proposes a fundamental change in the rules governing the selection of land-bank directors. At the present time 3 are chosen by the local farm-loan associations which hold stock in the parent bank, 3 by the Federal Farm Loan Board, and a seventh by the Board from a list of 3 nominated by the local associations. The change contemplated would vest the appointment of this seventh man unreservedly with the Board, giving it an absolute preponderance of power and the ability to dictate the personnel of the banks.

Mr. Mullen makes no attempt to conceal the fact that one of his purposes is to effect the removal of Dennis P. Hogan, president of the Omaha bank, and to restaff the institution to a large extent with Democrats and Progressives who supported the Roosevelt ticket in the last campaign. He justifies it, however, on the ground that it is in line with the President's policy to consolidate all the Government's farm-loan activities under the new Farm Credit Administration, administered by Henry Morgenthau, Jr. It is necessary, he says, that all the local units of this organization be in perfect harmony with the President's aims and purposes.

SPOILS PLAN RESENTED

While he is supported by Senator BULOW, of South Dakota, and some of the Nebraska Congressman, there is a wide-spread feeling back where the mortgages are made that it is not necessary to apply the spoils system to the land banks in order to secure this sympathy and cooperation. It is believed that so far as the local bank at least is concerned it has been excellently managed free from political influence. Protests have gone forward from individuals and from the local loan associations, one group of 14 in South Dakota having joined in a strongly worded resolution.

The most noteworthy, perhaps, and certainly the one which has stirred up greatest interest, is the personal protest of former Senator Gilbert M. Hitchcock objecting to the "attempt to drag the bank into partisan politics after the splendid record made under the present management." The Senator was an active participant in framing the law which brought the land banks into existence. He feels it to be one of the outstanding achievements of the Wilson administration, and he has watched the progress and growth of the local institution with pride and satisfaction. How deeply he feels on the subject is apparent from the fact that this protest against Mr. Mullen's activity represents the first serious disagreement between the two in a political and personal friendship of a quarter of a century.

HOGAN'S POLICY SUCCEEDED

Mr. Hogan, the subject of this controversy, is a soft-spoken Iowa banker and farm landowner, who has been president of the bank ever since it was organized in 1917. His present term will expire January 1, 1935. Under his management the Omaha bank has become the largest of the 12 institutions, although that perhaps is attributable primarily to the territory in which it does business. Politically he is a Republican, but the matter of his politics did not enter into his appointment during a Democratic administration, nor had it been raised until now. Mr. Mullen charges that a majority of the 150 employees of the bank are also Republicans. That, however, is not strange, in view of the fact that until last November the territory in which the bank operates was overwhelmingly Republican.

The bank is considered to have weathered the deflation of land values in its territory exceptionally well. Its percentage of delinquencies has not been alarming, with its foreclosures comparatively few considering the state of the farm debt in the Middle West. It has been President Hogan's policy to encourage the farmer to make every effort to hold his land rather than to surrender it. To that end the bank has accepted chattle mortgages in lieu of interest and principal installments in many cases. This practice has given rise to the chief criticism which has been made against him.

In spite of Mr. Mullen's justification of his course as in harmony with the administration's plans, it does not square entirely with Mr. Morgenthau's explanation of the purposes of the refinancing portion of the farm relief bill. In his radio speech on the subject he pointed out that one purpose was to provide a better means, on a permanent basis, for meeting the farmers' land-loan needs, and the policy adopted for accomplishing this purpose was to put land credit so far as possible on a cooperative basis. Shifting the balance of land-bank directorate power from the borrowers to the Government would destroy the keystone of the cooperative feature of the whole land-bank set-up

Now, I do not pretend to know the truth concerning the statements made in this article. But the matter is certainly of interest to us in connection with this bill, and I submit it to you with the hope that any financial institution which is to preserve the farmer from impending ruin shall be kept free from partisanship.

Wholly aside from this question, may I speak of another thing that seems to me to be of importance? There has been a controversy over the jurisdiction of State and Federal courts in the set-up of this bill. Under the language of the first three lines on page 26 full jurisdiction is given to Federal courts to handle litigation that may arise as between the corporations which we are now chartering and farmers or other litigants. This question is one that is coming more and more into public observation and consideration. Litigation in the Federal courts is very expensive and is very unsatisfactory to many citizens who are compelled to attend upon those and defend in them. A feeling has arisen that the common man is further forgotten there. I hope at the proper time to present an amendment which will preserve the right of the local organizations and the local citizens to have redress in State courts and not be compelled to go into the Federal courts, as the last three lines of section 60 of the bill would force them to do. It seems to me that neither a farmer nor any other citizen should be compelled to go away a great distance and at great expense in order to defend himself in Federal courts. The effect of these three lines would be to compel him to do that very thing. I am preparing an amendment to correct this, and it is now under discussion, and I hope it can be agreed upon. There was something said about it in committee and the principle of the proposed amendment was favored there, although the language has not yet been agreed upon exactly. I will present it when section 60 of the bill is reached.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I hope when this bill goes into effect, we will not be confronted by the extremely hard-boiled tactics that have been used with respect to seed and feed loans under Secretary Hyde. I hope a number of these extremely embarrassing questions, as well as the third-degree methods that have been used in the past, will be set aside and that this bill will be of some real value to the farmers who are compelled to negotiate small loans for short periods of time.

Another thing I like about the bill is that the committee has estimated approximately $80,000,000 of the $120,000,000 will come from payment of loans that have already been extended.

The best feature of this bill is that it has a tendency to encourage cooperative organizations by lending to cooperative organizations, whereas the Federal Farm Board of the past has had a tendency to wreck and smash practically every worthwhile cooperative organization in the United States of America. This has been the experience of the Farm Board, and it has really shown a hostile spirit toward the cooperative movement.

Another thing about this bill is that it sets a minimum interest charge of 3 percent and a maximum of 6 percent, and it does not create, especially in the local organizations, any high-salaried officials to conduct the affairs of the local borrowing units within the district.

While it may not be possible to lend to all the farmers through this bill, and it may also not be possible that the 5 percent in stock will make up losses that may accrue, it will affect business in general from this standpoint.

I know that in my State and throughout the Northwest it has been common practice, especially among the chain bankers, when a farmer comes to make a loan or get $100 or $200 for a production loan, or for a crop loan, to be invariably told that the money must come from the East, and the banker charges the farmer ordinarily a 10-percent commission for making the loan, which he says that he must pay his representative in the East. Then a mortgage is given and many times the interest rate runs up to 10 or 12 percent by contract. The commission is immediately deducted from the loan as well as the interest in advance, in many instances. I feel that this bill, if it does nothing more, will have an influence upon the bankers throughout the country and make them meet the conditions and the interest rates as prescribed in this bill.

I hope the administration of this measure, after it is passed—and I feel it will pass—is going to be a benevolent administration, rather paternalistic, if you please, and I feel that the administration is duty bound to make it so, and I hope our ambitions and hopes along this line will be realized and I hope the bill will be passed. I shall support several amendments, especialy the amendment referred to by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST], for I feel that the local organizations and the local units of these organizations should have something to say with regard to the directors who exercise the power of control over these organizations.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SWICK].

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Chairman, in 1929 the value of the agricultural products of the United States was $11,908,000,000. In 1930 the value was $9,414,000,000. In 1931 the value was $6,911,000,000. In 1932 it was $5,143,000,000.

So you see there has been a gradual drop in the value of agricultural products to less than one half of what it was in 1929. I hope this bill will do something to encourage the 32,000,000 persons in farm industry.

Several weeks ago Congress enacted the emergency agricultural relief measure, which was intended to be the dawn of a new day for all those engaged in farming. That measure was the result of intensive study by the agricultural section of the "brain trust", the members of which are responsible for leading the farmer to prosperity. The Secretary of Agriculture was made guardian of this "new deal for agriculture", and raised to the degree of dictator.

Ignoring the time-honored principles of the Democratic Party, the framers of this legislation provided for higher tariffs, camouflaged under the title of compensatory taxes. These tariffs were necessary to balance the processing taxes levied on the manufacturer which were intended to assure the farmer a reasonable profit on his crops. Recognizing the evil of overproduction, acreage reduction was provided for in the bill, the farmer to receive payment for his idle acres. With the passage of this legislation the agricultural problem was solved.

The Secretary of State, a profound advocate of free trade, was floundering in the sea of diplomacy, preparing for the International Economic Conference to meet in London June 12, 1933. Overlooking the provisions of the farm bill, and with the approval of the administration, he obligated the United States to enter a tariff truce, pending the outcome of the conference.

Since it was impossible to retard the advance of spring, the President was compelled to instruct the Secretary of Agriculture, so it is reported, that the acreage reduction and processing-tax provisions of the farm bill would be inoperative until further notice. He had previously let it be known that the collection of compensatory taxes on imports would be held in abeyance until after the conclusion of the Economic Conference.

The Secretary of Agriculture, now armed with a piece of legislation intended to restore prosperity to agriculture,
